ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVELS and SKETCHES.

In crown 8vo, in tasteful cloth binding, price 6s.
MY CHANGE OF MIND:
A Story of the Power of Faith. By Mrs. ATKEY, Author of 'School of Faith,' &c.

The power of mind over matter is a subject much discussed in the present day. MY CHANGE OF MIND, in the form of a tale, treats it from a scriptural standpoint.

It is believed that the book is one which must arouse helpful thought and impart something of its atmosphere of optimism and triumph over adverse circumstances to the reader.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.
AT NOON: Where Two Ways Meet. A Novel by 'MAISEY.'

"Maisey" is a keen observer of human nature as well as the possessor of a ready wit and graceful way of expressing it. The authoress has a pleasant, interesting story to tell, and she handles it in delightful fashion.—Pelican.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.
BLUE BLOOD and RED.
By Mrs. L. E. WADSLEY, Author of 'The Lady Algive,' 'His Wife by Force,' &c.

'A painstaking effort, in which a child's beneficent influence on a hard man's nature, is suggested with feeling.'—Outlook.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.
BYGONE DAYS: a Story of Village Life. By JNO. T. PROCTOR.
'An unambitious story of Lincolnshire village life a century ago.'—Outlook.

Messrs. Methuen's Newest Books

I.

BY HIS MAJESTY'S COMMAND.

Messrs. METHUEN HAVE THIS WEEK PUBLISHED

THE CORONATION OF EDWARD VII.

By J. E. C. BODLEY.

This Important Volume, written by the King's Command, by the Author of FRANCE, includes not only a description and a detailed Historical Study of His Majesty's Coronation, but it deals with the subject in relation with European and Imperial History. An Appendix contains the Official Lists of all the Persons invited to the Ceremony. The size is demy 8vo, and the price One Guinea net. The elaborate Heraldic Binding has been Designed by Mr. DOUGLAS COCKERELL.

There is also a ROYAL EDITION on Japanese vellum. A few copies are for sale and the price is Twenty Guineas net. This fine Edition is specially bound in Levant Morocco by Mr. COCKERELL.

II.

The Definitive and Standard Edition of CHARLES LAMB must be for many years that Edited by Mr. E. V. LUCAS, and now in course of publication by Messrs. METHUEN. It will contain all the Works and Letters of Charles Lamb and of his Sister, and it will be complete in 7 Volumes, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. each. It has a very large amount of new material, and it will contain 200 Letters not given in other Editions. No other Edition can compare with it for completeness.

Mr. Lucas attempts to explain every allusion in CHARLES LAMB, and LAMB is the most allusive of authors. Mr. Lucas's Notes to Volume I. cover 160 pages.

This Edition has been received with enthusiasm by the critics and the public, and the following are a few extracts :—

"It will satisfy the most exacting of Elians."—Westminster Gazette.

"Mr. Lucas's edition will be the first complete one which has yet been given to the world. His notes are almost as interesting as the text which they elucidate."—Standard.

"This edition will for many years be the indispensable one to all students of Lamb."—Academy.

"Mr. Lucas's edition of Lamb has been eagerly awaited, and the first volume convinces us that it was worth waiting for."—Times.

III.

Messrs. METHUEN have just published a very complete and highly interesting book entitled THE NORFOLK BROADS, by W. A. DUTT. It contains a complete description of all the Broad, of every river and stream in the district, together with chapters on bird life, entomology, pond life, botany, geology, archaeology, fishing, wild-fowling, and yacht-racing. It is finely illustrated with 48 Coloured and 29 Uncoloured Illustrations by FRANK SOUTHGATE. Any good Bookseller will show you a copy of this book or the Publishers will send you a Prospectus. The price is One Guinea net.

IV.

Another charming book on a beautiful district of England is A BOOK OF EXMOOR, by F. J. SNELL. This also is profusely illustrated and the price is 6s. The following criticisms will describe the excellence of this book.

Punch says it is "charming and valuable"; the Academy says that "all lovers of Exmoor should possess it"; and "genial and instructive" is the verdict of the Bristol Mercury.

For all Tourists the best and most tasteful Guides are the "LITTLE GUIDES," delightfully illustrated by E. H. NEW and other Artists. These little books are small in size and low in price, 3s. each, and they contain everything that the average Tourist requires, and they can be slipped into the smallest pocket. The Arrangement is Alphabetical and saves much weary searching in the Index. Kindly write to Messrs. Methuen for a Prospectus of this Series.

V.

THE ILLUSTRATED POCKET LIBRARY OF PLAIN AND COLOURED BOOKS promises to be one of the completest successes in modern publishing. It is a series of Reproductions in Miniature of the Famous Illustrated Books of past generations, especially of those books which contained Coloured Illustrations by ALKEN, ROWLANDSON, CRUIKSHANK, and LEECH. Thus for a few shillings you may buy a copy in little of a book which fetches from £5 to £50 at an auction.

Two books which will increase the success of the series are about to be published. The first is THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD, with 24 Coloured Plates by T. ROWLANDSON, price 3s. 6d. net, and the second is HANDLEY CROSS, by R. S. SURTEES, with many illustrations in Colour and Line by JOHN LEECH, price 4s. 6d. net. Please ask to see these books at your bookseller's, and read the following :—

"A really brilliant idea brilliantly carried out."—Sphere.

"The charm of these little volumes, admirably printed, neatly bound, and cheaply priced, is that they are exact reproductions of old, now unattainable editions."—Punch.

"We shall be surprised if these excellent volumes fail to achieve an instructive success."—Athenæum.

"Such a series may be welcomed without reserve. The books are all well known, were all famous in their day, but in their original forms are now hardly procurable by the collector of small means. The little volumes are excellent, and the reproductions have been carefully made."—Academy.

VI.

Kindly write to Messrs. METHUEN for Prospectuses of their many new and interesting projects. They have in preparation a large number of Reprints of some of the rare and splendid books on which the old printers lavished their skill and industry, books which are now unobtainable by readers of moderate income. THE FOUR FOLIOS OF SHAKESPEARE, THE PARADISUS OF PARKINSON, the splendid HYPNEROTOMACHIA, THE MICROCOSM OF LONDON, a Reproduction in Folio of ALKEN'S NATIONAL SPORTS—these are some of the books which Messrs. METHUEN have in the press.

VII.

Kindly write to Messrs. METHUEN for a List and Description of the New Six-Shilling Novels which they will Publish during the Coming Season.

CAUTION TO THE PUBLIC.

The success achieved during the last few years by Messrs. METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS has, perhaps not unnaturally, induced some other publishers to adopt Messrs. METHUEN'S methods of Advertising and to imitate the Covers of their Novels. It is necessary, therefore, to beg the Public to examine carefully all Advertisements and Covers. Any Advertisement drawn up after the fashion of Messrs. METHUEN'S well-known Advertisements does not necessarily emanate from this House, nor is a Cover exactly imitating the Covers of Messrs. METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS a proof that the Novel thus covered is published by Messrs. Methuen.

In short, the Public are urged to look for the imprint of "Methuen" at the head or foot of all Advertisements and for the same Name on the Cover or on the Title page of Popular Novels.

VIII.

Messrs. METHUEN'S SIXPENNY BOOKS are the best in existence, and can be seen at all booksellers', newsagents', and bookstalls. Kindly ask for them everywhere, and do not accept other books in their place. Kindly write to Messrs. METHUEN if there is any difficulty in obtaining their SIXPENNY BOOKS, and they will endeavour to make arrangements for the supply of these, in the places where they are at present unobtainable.

NOTE.—Most of the booksellers will show specimens of Messrs. METHUEN'S new books, and if there is any difficulty in thus seeing them they are on view at Messrs. METHUEN'S Offices. Messrs. METHUEN are always glad to show specimen pages and illustrations, &c., of their forthcoming ventures to any callers who are interested in books.

Stafford, Warwick, Westmoreland, Worcester, Yorkshire.

Morning Post.—"This simple and clear reprint of Dr. Creighton's work is most welcome, and will be a useful addition to many a library and bookshelf."

Times.—"The Bishop was never more happy than when dealing with local history. He gave it a breadth and vitality which made it almost a liberal education in itself."

Athenaeum.—"Fine scholarship, adequate knowledge, and an easy style of writing are rarely combined. All these qualities were conspicuous in the late Dr.
Creighton's work, and we therefore welcome this re-issue."

Spectator.—"A happy combination of accuracy and picturesqueness."

The Literary Week.

THIS week has naturally seen little movement in the publishing trade. Books, indeed, there are upon our table, but they are largely reprints, minor verse, or such reference volumes as come in with the New Year. The tide of novels has commenced to flow, however; this week we have received nine. From the serious literature before us we select the following volumes as being of interest:—

RUSKIN ON PICTURES. Vol. II.

The second volume of Ruskin's "not heretofore reprinted" Criticisms contains "Academy Notes," and "Notes on Prout and Hunt." The book is made up of seven pamphlets, ranging in date of original publication between 1855 and 1879-80. A few additional notes from other sources have been added. The mixed enthusiasm and rancour which the "Academy Notes" aroused is now matter of artistic history. When the notes were suspended in 1859, Mr. E. T. Cook tells us in his admirably concise preface, Ruskin said: "Henceforward it seemed to me useless, so far as artists were concerned, to continue criticism which they would esteem dishonourable unless it was false." Of a picture by a certain deceased Royal Academician he wrote: "It is interesting, especially, to see that, in the present state of British science, one may write R.A. after one's name, yet not be able to paint a gutter." No wonder Ruskin was not loved by some of his painting contemporaries.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF CORMAC THE SKALD. Translated by W. G. Collingwood.

The first volume of the "Viking Club Translation Series." The motive of the book is thus described in the Introduction: "The story of a poet, poor and proud, with all the strength and all the weakness of genius. He loves a fine lady, a spoiled child; who bewitches him, and jilts him, and jilts him again. He fights for her, rhymes for her, and rises for her sake to the height of all that a man in his age could achieve. Then, after years, he has her at his feet, and learns her heartlessness and worthlessness. He bids her farewell; but dies in the end with her name on his lips." This is the first English translation. Mr. Collingwood's rendering has simplicity and distinction.

THE POETRY OF GEORGE WITHER. Edited by Frank Sidgwick.

Mr. Sidgwick writes in his preface: "The title of this edition of 'the Poetry of George Wither' has been selected to indicate its contents as closely as possible. The satires 'Abuses Stript and Whipt' and the 'Motto' might fill a companion volume, but there is little of literary interest in the rest of Wither's voluminous works." The biographical introduction is full and interesting. Many original title pages are reproduced, and there are a few photographic and other illustrations.

Mr. JOSEPH KNIGHT comes forward in chivalrous defence of Thackeray, whose autograph verses he quoted last week. "Some mischievous elf," he thinks, "must have meddled with them. I will wager that Thackeray wrote:—

I am Miss Perry's faithful Phil,
And my picture thus I send her,
Don't I look as if I'd kill
Any rogue that dared offend her,— not approach her. Halting enough are the lines in any case. If Thackeray wrote 'approach her' he was temporarily dozing. I know unpublished lines of Thackeray which are not very—formed, shall I say? But he never erred in the matter of rime." We quoted the lines from the official announcement of the sale of the autograph verses, and pictures. But we hope Mr. Knight will win his wager.

The article by Mr. Swinburne in "Harper's Magazine" on "King Lear" is the first of a series of articles on certain of Shakespeare's plays which are to be written by various hands. Amongst the writers who will discuss the plays of their choice are Mrs. Meynell, Mr. Austin Dobson, and Mr. Andrew Lang.

WE were puzzled the other day by a reference in a French contemporary to "the eternal Bob." It gradually dawned on us that the writer had no distinguished soldier in his eye, but was thinking of "the immortal memory." Whether the phrase was merely complimentary to Burns or a slight upon those of his compatriots who make too persistent allusions to him we had not time to discover. But "the eternal Bob" strikes us as happy.

THE "Burial of Sir John Moore at Corunna" is a most unfortunate poem in its treatment at the hands of fact. Some time ago the prosaic investigator discovered that the "struggling moonbeams" could not have been real, but only, so to say, moonshine; for there was no moon that night. Now we find that it was not night at all when Sir John was buried. To the Museum of the Royal United Service Institution in Whitehall has just been added the prayer-book from which Dr. Symons, the chaplain, read the service. With this there is a memorandum in which the chaplain says that "it now being daylight the enemy discovered that the troops had been withdrawn and embarking during the night, fire was opened by them shortly after upon the ships that were still in the harbour. The funeral service was therefore performed without delay, as we were exposed to the fire of the guns." As the month was January it appears that the burial took place at about eight in the morning.

THE Literary Lounger of the "Sketch" devoted the greater part of his last week's article to answering our question as to the two books which had most interested him during the year. Of literary criticism M. Merejkowski's "Tolstoi as Man and Artist" and the "Memoir and Essays of Whitwell Elwin" are selected as the best. In fiction "O. O." has been best pleased by Mr. Seton Merriman's story "The Vultures" ("at once the deepest and most interesting book Mr. Merriman has written") and Mr. A. E. W. Mason's "The Four Feathers." As a good third comes Miss Cholmondeley's "Moth and Rust." "Among biographical books," continues the writer, "the 'Life of James Martineau' should have been the most remarkable, but the authors have given so much attention to Martineau as a writer and as a public man that personal details fall far into the background. I doubt whether it is any part of a biographer's business to give accounts and summaries of the books written by his subject. If anyone wants to know he should refer to the books." And as the second biographical book of interest "O. O." selects Mrs. Russell Gurney's "Letters." "Altogether," he concludes, "the season has not been at all disappointing in the way of good books."

In connection with the statement that two volumes are to be collected from the mass of journalism and magazine writing left behind by Sir Walter Besant, the same writer makes a very good suggestion. Very little of what is written as journalism deserves to live as literature. But Sir Walter Besant wrote in the "Author" and elsewhere many short stories of the literary life in which he was so intensely interested. These, we understand, were nearly always based on facts, and should thus have a double interest, from the literary and the practical point of view. It would be a pity not to preserve in permanent form these sketches of a side of life in which Sir Walter Besant was an admitted expert, and a small volume of them would certainly find a welcome.

MR. W. D. HOWELLS' article on Zola in the "North American Review" has stirred the fury of the Philadelphia "Church Standard," which labels him as "the apologist of Zola's vilest productions." While admitting that Zola is often indecent, Mr. Howell denies that he is ever immoral. The following estimate of the influence of nationality is noteworthy:—

I think it has been the error of criticism not to take due account of his [Zola's] Italian origin, or to recognise that he was only half French, and that this half was his superficial half. At the bottom of his soul, though not perhaps at the bottom of his heart, he was Italian, and of the great race which in every science and every art seems to win the primacy when it will. The French, through the rhetoric of Napoleon III., imposed themselves on the imagination of the world as the representatives of the Latin race, but they are the least and the last of the Latins, and the Italians are the first. To his Italian origin Zola owed not only the moralistic scope of his literary ambition, but the depth and strength of his personal conscience, capable of the austere puritanism which underlies the so-called immoralities of his books, and incapable of the peculiar lubricity which we call French, possibly to distinguish it from the lubricity of other people rather than to declare it a thing solely French.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York "Nation" writes thus as to his experience of the duty levied by the United States on books printed in England:—

If Congress begins to lessen the surplus in the Treasury by cutting off sources of revenue, or if a "scientific tariff revision" takes place, the duty on books printed in England might be spared without loss to infant industries. The following is an example of the present working—not an isolated case, as I, and doubtless many others, can testify. As a member of the British Congress of Tuberculosis, the printed transactions of the Congress were recently sent to me. I do not know the market price of the four small volumes, but, as they are given to each member who paid the fee of five dollars, it is not likely to exceed this amount. The customs charges were $2.50, with sixty cents more for "warehouse." An examiner once remarked to me, when putting me through the Custom-house, that it was "no sanitarium." This recent experience makes me think he was right.

"THE Hampstead Annual" once more lies upon our table. It is one of the most welcome of the annuals, largely because it is frankly local. But it is happy, too, in the wealth of material at its disposal; much has been written about the literary and artistic associations of Hampstead, but these are so wide and varied that even old material is worth a new dress. Thus Dr. Garnett writes of "John Linnell and William Blake at Hampstead," and the article is readable, even though it contains nothing new. Mr. H. B. Wheatley's contribution, "Coleridge's Marginalia in a Copy of Robinson Crusoe," is particularly interesting. Coleridge adorned his own and other people's books with equal impartiality; he jotted down whatever came into his head, and his notes are full of knowledge and character. At the end of the first volume is this generalisation of his views on the book and its author:—

One excellence of De Foe among many is his sacrifice of lesser interest to the greater because more universal. Had he (as without any improbability he might have done) given his "Robinson Crusoe" any of the turn for natural history, which forms so striking and delightful a feature in the equally uneducated Dampier—had he made him find out qualities and uses in the before (to him) unknown plants of the island, discover a substitute for hops for instance, or describe birds, &c.—many delightful pages and incidents might have enriched the book; but then Crusoe would cease to be the universal representative, the person for whom every reader could substitute himself. Even so very easy a problem as that of finding a substitute for ink is with exquisite judgment made to baffle Crusoe's inventive faculties. Even in what he does he arrives at no excellence: he does not make basket work like Will Atkins. The carpentering, tailoring, pottery, are all just what will answer his purpose, and those are confined to needs that all men have, and comforts all men desire. Crusoe rises only where all men may be made to feel that they might and that they ought to rise—in religion, in resignation, in dependence on, and thankful acknowledgment of the divine mercy and goodness.

Another interesting article is Mr. Sidney Colvin's "Robert Louis Stevenson at Hampstead." Mr. Colvin and R. L. S. jointly occupied a set of rooms in Hampstead in 1874; Stevenson was then in his twenty-fourth year, "in the full glow—a glow that mounted sometimes near fever heat—of his brilliant and unquiet youth." "At Hampstead," says Mr. Colvin, "his ways were regular, and his apparel neat and normal. He even had with him a black frock coat and tall hat, which he had once worn at a wedding." Mrs. Shorter contributes some graceful verses to the "Annual."

"SCIENTIFIC men, Christian philosophers, and historians of all nations" are invited to compete for a prize of six thousand dollars, which is offered for the best book on the coincidence of science and revelation, the divine origin and authority of the Christian Scriptures, the existence of God, submitted to President Harlan of Lake Forest College, Illinois, on or before June 1, 1905. The successful treatise will be issued in book form and initiate the "Nathaniel Bross Library," so called from the son of the founder of the fund, William Bross of Chicago.

IN "Cornhill" for this month there is an article by Madame Sarah Bernhardt on "The Moral Influence of the Theatre." Madame Bernhardt is naturally enthusiastic over her progression. The theatre, she says, "is the temple of all the arts which beautify life, and it is in this that its power lies. For whereas a library, a picture-gallery, or a concert hall, each enthroning its respective art, has each its particular admirers, the theatre by the service of literature, the fine arts, and music, has a stronger claim upon human sympathy, and thus obtains a wider hearing." Madame Bernhardt deplores the lack of interest shown by the Latin races in pure drama. "The French," she says, "seem to like going to the theatre merely to amuse themselves, if it is not a question of going elsewhere." The English audience is beloved by the great actress; she has never found it cold or unsympathetic; to her we are a "fine race"; "nothing is more touching than the proud and ardent affection of the English for Shakespeare." Perhaps Madame Bernhardt rather exaggerates our national appreciation of Shakespeare; he is accepted by most people as a tradition, and is often neglected accordingly. To Madame Bernhardt the theatre is everything. "Ah! the beautiful theatre!" she cries; "it is there that our educators should be sent, for it is there that they would see the mistakes into which they too often fall. What a lesson might they not learn from the evolution of the character of 'La Fille Sauvage'!" A solemn row of "educators" watching a performance of "La Fille Sauvage" would be really excellent comedy.

WE are shortly to have a new comedy from Mr. John Davidson, a composition in a lighter vein than anything he has written for some time. In a prefatory note Mr. Davidson says, "This play was written in 1900, and after various adventures is now published—twenty-five years having come and gone since, in 'An Unhistorical Pastoral' I first wrote of the Maypole." The Comedy is entitled "The Knight of the Maypole," and is in four acts.

WHAT is somewhat vaguely known as the Celtic Movement is being discussed in America as vigorously as over here. The editor of the "Harvard Monthly" has been writing in that journal about the work and tendencies of Miss Fiona Macleod, whose name, he says, "is one of the mysteries of contemporary literature." The article concludes thus:—

It is then hardly too much to say that with qualities such as these—of clear style, strong feeling, and vital imagination—Miss Fiona Macleod should hold her own in the literature of the day; and that the Celtic Movement, whatever its other success or unsuccess may be, should be credited with having produced at least one writer of really lasting worth.

But the Celtic Movement did not produce Miss Fiona Macleod; no literary movement can really be said to have "produced" anybody. The fact that Miss Macleod is a Celt has nothing to do with any movement; she merely expresses her own personality.

MISS ELIZABETH McCracken, a Boston Settlement worker, has been investigating the literary tastes of the dwellers in the slums, and giving her discoveries to the "Atlantic Monthly." She finds the uneducated reader has an unerring literary intuition. Miss McCracken tells of a "scrub-woman," who supports her drunken husband and her children by scrubbing the public stairways. Miss McCracken lent her "The Talisman," "The Scottish Chiefs," "Kenilworth," and "The Prisoner of Zenda." She read them all with the keenest joy. "If I'd known," she said one night, "what a 'mount of pleasure, an', more still, real comfort, books has, I'd er took to readin' 'em long before I did."

ONE day this same "scrub-woman" selected Ibsen's "Ghosts" for borrowing:—

In less than a day she returned the book. "What did you think of it?" I inquired.

"Well," she replied thoughtfully, "I don't know. I didn't read it all. I read the first part, an' it was that gloomy! Then I read the last, an' it was gloomy too—so I didn't read no more. I don't mind books to begin gloomy, if they end all right. But what's the use readin' things that begin gloomy an' end gloomy too? They don't help you—an' you can't enjoy 'em." This was her criticism of Henrik Ibsen's dramas. She had read not more than half of one of them; but have not other critics who have read all of them expressed a somewhat similar opinion?

THE latest volume issued in the "Red Letter Library," to which we referred not long ago, is "Poems by William Wordsworth." The selection, considering its necessarily narrow limits, is admirable. In her introduction Mrs. Meynell says:—

It is not necessary to dwell much on the familiarities and trivialities by which Wordsworth irritated and defied his readers. It seems obvious enough to us to-day that there was something of a mare's nest in the novelty which Wordsworth thought he had discovered by the use of simple and homely words in poetry. The fact is Wordsworth was for thirty years of his life an eighteenth-century man, and, with his contemporaries, he gave an inordinate importance to that century. A revolt against eighteenth-century ways seemed to him a revolt against literature; whereas he had only to go to the seventeenth century and to the sixteenth to find as much familiarity as is good for poetry. . . . The true and great Wordsworth . . . is majestically the man of his own time, busied neither with imitation nor with revolt, but the natural heir of the language and the literature as it was in his own appointed day.

THE current number of the "Monthly Review" prints some anonymous satirical verse called "Le Byron de nos Jours, or the English Bar and Cross Reviewers." It is a piece of excellent fooling; light, terse, and neatly turned. We quote the opening lines:—

Still must I hear?—while Austin prints his verse
And Satan's sorrows fill Corelli's purse,
Must I not write lest haply some K.C.
To flatter Tennyson should sneer at me?
Or must the Angels of the Darker Ink
No longer tell the public what to think—
Must lectures and reviewing all be stayed Until they're licensed by the Board of Trade?
Prepare for rhyme—I'll risk it—bite or bark
I'll stop the press for neither Gosse nor Clarke.

THE cradle and the old home of "Punch" are disappearing almost simultaneously; for now the "Shakespeare's Head" in Wych Street is falling before the housebreakers. In the forties the tavern still performed the function of the modern club, and a small circle of friends, among whom were Henry Mayhew, Sterling Coyne, and W. H. Wills used to meet at the "Shakespeare's Head." In the large upstairs room the idea of a new comic paper was first talked over. It was to be called "Pen and Palette." But Henry Mayhew prevailed with the present name. It was from the "Shakespeare's Head" too that the first sole editor of "Punch" came; for Mark Lemon (who long had to endure the nickname of "the literary potman") had assisted his mother in the management of the house.

THE personal sketch of Mme. Sarah Grand which the "Literary World" publishes, is very personal:—

Amongst the Christmas cards flying about lately was one of snap-shots taken at George Meredith's charming house at the foot of Box Hill, and amongst those figuring in the group was that veteran novelist, Sarah Grand, and her step-son. A woman who is a brilliant conversationalist, a courageous thinker, and a keen observer is naturally a welcome member of any literary circle, and there are many of us who would be glad if Sarah Grand would leave her house at Tunbridge Wells and reconsider the question of living at Richmond.

After describing her as a "bright, pretty woman in the prime of life," it is not quite nice to call her a "veteran."

Bibliographical.

REVIEWS of the year, I think, are very tiresome things; but it is difficult to isolate one's self from one's kind, and a bibliographer may as well "tattle" up his accounts as his neighbours do. And, looking back upon the past twelvemonth, bibliographers must feel special cause for satisfaction, for unquestionably the practice of, and the interest in, their art have shown signs of growth. The number of books to which a bibliography is appended is increasing; and that is something. True, some of the efforts in this direction have been modest in aim and meagre in result. That, however, was to be expected in the early popular stages of an art which hitherto has been almost wholly in the hands of experts. One grave disappointment has been the non-inclusion of bibliographies in the schemes of "Modern English Writers," and the new series of "English Men of Letters." The books are cheap at the price, but an extra sixpence on each would readily have been paid had a bibliography been a feature of it. I believe that the "Great Writers" series was bought largely for the sake of its bibliographical appendices, which were sometimes more valuable than the text they supplemented.

The publication of Mr. Laurence Housman's version of "Aucassin and Nicolette" has brought me more than one inquiry as to his previous volumes. Of these there have been ten at least. Mr. Housman's first venture appears to have been made in 1894 with "A Farm in Fairyland." Then he held silence for a year, making up for it by producing in 1896 three books—"The House of Joy," "Green Arras," and "All-Fellows: Seven Legends of Lower Redemption, with In-sets in Verse." In 1897 he produced "Gods and their Makers." To 1898 belong "Spikenard: Devotional Love-Poems" and "A Field of Clover"; while in 1899 we had from Mr. Housman "The Little Land, with Songs from its Four Rivers," "The Story of Seven Young Goslings," and last, but not least, "Rue."

New editions of the English classics, if scholarly and neat in format, are always welcome; and a kind reception will no doubt be accorded to Messrs. Treherne & Co.'s "Poets of the Renaissance," which, it seems, is to cover the period between Surrey and Herrick. That, obviously, is a long and important period, which has been much exploited, though I see it described in a weekly paper as "a period not commonly drawn upon." Indeed! Messrs. Treherne's first volume, we are told, will present selections from Surrey, Wyatt, and Sackville. Well, it was only the other day that Mr. Arber gave us a "Surrey and Wyatt Anthology," and Aldine editions both of Surrey and of Wyatt appeared so recently as 1894. No matter; the more the merrier.

It is said that Mr. Temple Scott will wind up his edition of the Works of Swift with a volume containing a new biography of the Dean. This is rather good news for purchasers of the edition, though of late years students have done very well with the "Life" by Mr. Henry Craik (1882, new edition in 1894) and the biographical study by Mr. J. C. Collins (1892). To these may be added the "Letters and Journals," edited by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole in 1885, and the "Unpublished Letters," edited by Mr. Birkbeck Hill in 1899. On the whole, Mr. Scott can hardly have much more about the Dean to tell us, though no doubt his biography will be "handy."

The announcement of a volume of "Golden Sayings of Epictetus" suggests that the cult of that philosopher is spreading. A good deal was done for his popularity when Messrs. Dent reprinted, three or four years ago, Elizabeth Carter's translation of the "Moral Discourses." Prior to that, Messrs. Bell had published in this country (in 1891) an American translation of the "Discourses, Encheiridion, and Fragments," brought out on "the other side" in 1890. In 1891, also, Mr. T. W. Rolleston, who had edited the "Encheiridion" ten years previously, issued an English version of Epictetus' moralisings.

Mr. C. G. Compton, who writes on Alfred de Vigny in the "Fortnightly," is a son of the famous comedian, and made his literary début as part-author of a biography of his father. That was so long ago as 1879. It was not until 1890 that Mr. Compton published a volume wholly from his own pen, and that was a novel called "Scot Free." This was followed in 1896 by another novel entitled "Her Own Devices." Since then, I believe, Mr. Compton has devoted himself more to journalism than to literature.

Hazlitt is to be represented in Messrs. Macmillan's "Library of English Classics" by the "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays" and the "Lectures on the English Poets." This is all very well as an instalment, but it should be followed by the lectures on our Comic Writers, the "Age of Elizabeth," the "Spirit of the Age," and at least a selection from the miscellaneous essays. One despairs of getting in a single volume the whole of Hazlitt's comments on the stage of his time. Messrs. Archer and Lowe gave a selection from these, but selections do not always satisfy.

Messrs. Chatto will include shortly in their "St. Martin's Library" a little volume of "Sketches" by Mark Twain. No particulars are given, but it is to be hoped that an effort has been made to comprise within the book only the cream of Mr. Clemens's humorous papers. Of these, a good many are to be found in the "Choice Works" of Mark Twain, still issued by Messrs. Chatto.

Referring to my recent paragraph on Cellini's autobiography, Messrs. Dent kindly inform me that the translation they will publish will be a new one, from the pen of Miss Anne Macdonell. They also remind me that their edition of T. L. Peacock's Works is in ten volumes, not eight.

The Clamorous Voltaire.

SHAKESPEARE AND VOLTAIRE. By Thomas R. Lounsbury.
(David Nutt. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is the second volume of a series called "Shakespearean Wars," the first in which ("Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist") has already appeared. Mr. Lounsbury, who is Professor of English at Yale, seeks in the series to trace the course of the conflict which surrounded the growth of Shakespeare's reputation at home and abroad. That conflict, he endeavoured to show in his first volume just referred to, was from the beginning nothing else than the eternal war between the classics and romantics, in its application to the stage; though in the poet's own day it might pass under other names. It is the general conception that Shakespeare was ignorant of his own decisive part in this great war; that he took his side blindly, without ideas of, or reference to, theory. That Prof. Lounsbury in his former book demonstrated to be a mistake. Shakespeare was well aware of the arguments for the "unities" and other Aristotelian paraphernalia, and deliberately elected to discard them. The slow victory of Shakespearean drama over all the forces of reaction, put forth during the eighteenth and late seventeenth century, Prof. Lounsbury studied in his first book. Here, he studies the delay of that victory on the continent through the formidable stand made against the great Englishman by Voltaire.

The whole history of Voltaire's relations towards Shakespeare, his growing hatred of him, and the antagonism to Voltaire which it provoked in England (this last detail in particular), has never, he claims, been completely dealt with. This omission he aims to supply. At the same time, he cautions us against supposing that he aims to trace the development of Shakespeare's reputation on the Continent, except in so far as it is involved by the story of Voltaire's campaign against the poet. He has, he says, been hampered by the scarcity of early editions of Voltaire's minor productions outside France—even in the British Museum. Since Voltaire was constantly altering his work, this is of considerable importance, and Prof. Lounsbury has had to be content with guarding against misapprehension in the case of what he quotes or refers to. He has, let us say, written a very careful and judicial study, vastly different from the bulk of the work we have learned to associate with American professors. The style is in general clear and logical, often with a pleasant and cultivated shrewdness. Here and there, however, is a slipshod sentence where the bottom has fallen out of the grammar, which should not have been allowed to pass in revision.

It is difficult for us nowadays to summon much interest in what Voltaire thought or wrote of Shakespeare. A Frenchman is by language and temperament in a hard position for judging our dramatist, and of all Frenchmen Voltaire was, one would think, the most typically unfitted. The materialistic mind in quintessence being his, how should he have a glimmering conception of the most imaginative of writers? There are four supreme poets—by universal admission: Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, and Milton. He had no relish of Homer, he detested Dante, he was civil to Milton, he bade Shakespeare be a good boy and wipe his nose. Yet the English were seriously angry with this man on behalf of their poet. And they had reason. For the eighteenth century had taken this brilliant satirist and very French poet as its dictator of letters; and this Canute did actually avail to keep back the sea of Shakespeare's incoming reputation. The study of the Gallic Canute and his proceedings is both curious and amusing. The great satirist is himself an irresistible satire on himself, quite as ludicrous as any he wrote on others. Prof. Lounsbury is a devout admirer of him; therefore the Professor's admissions have a special force. And he confesses that Voltaire "never made himself a slavish adherent to fact, when not simply higher ends, but also his own ends, could be better subserved by a liberal intermingling of fiction Misrepresentation, misquotation, perversion of meaning were perfectly justifiable, if more satisfactory agencies failed to accomplish what he wished." We should say that Voltaire lied when he saw anything to gain by it, and when he did not, lied to keep his hand in. When he was off his guard, indeed, he was liable to fall into shocking truths—it is difficult even for the most unconscious of us to be perfectly insincere. Such a man, wielding also an enormous influence, was enough to blacken a name or a cause for a century.

Yet it is among the most singular ironies of history that it was this man who was destined to introduce Shakespeare on the Continent. During his exile in England he had become acquainted with a few of his plays—all he ever knew—and was attracted by them. Attracted in a timid kind of way. Because he was a born materialist he was a "swallower of formulas" in religion. For the same reason, he clung hard by formulas in literature. He swore by the "unities" and went the whole Aristotle, so to speak. He solidly believed that the French stage was superior to the Greek, that Regnard was a greater comic dramatist than Aristophanes. But he was still young enough to be open to new impressions; he saw Shakespeare acted as no man living has seen him acted, and was impressed—within the limits allowed by the Aristotelian formulas. He thought Shakespeare a fine barbarian; as Bolingbroke and the English men of taste thought him—men who rose above the ideas of the rude multitude. He thought that a few points might be borrowed from Shakespeare to enlarge the extreme rigidity of French drama; and when he returned to France he put his ideas into practice. The play which he esteemed Shakespeare's masterpiece was "Julius Caesar." The reasons are plain. Antiquity was rampant on the French stage, and this was a Roman play. It is more equable, has less flights of imaginative passion, than "Antony and Cleopatra" (the only other of Shakespeare's Roman plays that he knew). It has more set speeches, more rhetoric and declamation. In all these ways it has nearer affinity to a French classic play than anything else of Shakespeare's. Every reason which leads us to give it a secondary rank would lead Voltaire to rank it as supreme. Accordingly he paid it the compliment of imitation, especially in his "Mort de César"; wherein he had the boldness to dispense with the love-interest thought indispensable on the French stage. Both as an explorer, and to support his own innovations, he was anxious to make this interesting foreigner known in France. His first principal mention of him was in the "Philosophical Letters," a brilliant and (of course) unveracious account of his English experiences. There Shakespeare was introduced as a dramatist with some surprisingly strong scenes and passages, whose plays as a whole were ruined by the barbarous taste of a barbarous age, and ignorance of the irrefragable rules of Aristotle. He did not content himself with criticism. He gave a translation of Hamlet's famous soliloquy, "To be, or not to be." It reproduced, he explained, the spirit, not the mere letter of the original. On the futility of literal translation he quite truly commented. Prof. Lounsbury has given us a line-for-line rendering back into English of this translation. Of course, it is totally unfair to Voltaire's poetry—such as that is. But it exhibits fairly the matter of the Frenchman's "translation"; and that matter is too delicious not to quote. Hamlet is completely Voltarianised, in the most audacious fashion. He sneers at priests, he fleers at Christianity, he developes in a manner that would have astonished his unfortunate creator.

Pause, it is incumbent to choose and pass in an instant
 From life to death, or from existence to nothingness.
 Cruel Gods, if there be any gods, enlighten my heart.
 Must I grow old, bowed under the hand that insults me,
 Endure, or end my ill-fortune and my fate?
 Who am I? What holds me back? And what is death?
 It is the end of our ills, it is my sole refuge:
 After long delirium it is a tranquil slumber.
 One falls asleep and all dies; but a frightful awakening
 May perhaps succeed to the pleasures of sleep.
 We are threatened, we are told, that this short life
 Is by eternal torments immediately followed.
 O death! fatal moment! dreadful eternity!
 Every heart, at thy name merely, is congealed with terror.
 Ah! were it not for thee, who could endure this life?
 Who would bless the hypocrisy of our lying priests?
 Flatter the faults of an unworthy mistress?
 Grovel under a minister of state, pay court to his pride?
 And show the weakness of his downcast soul
 To ingrate friends, who turn away their eyes?
 Death would be too sweet in extremities like these,
 But doubt speaks, and cries out to us, Stop.
 It forbids our hands indulging in that happy homicide,
 And of a warlike hero makes a timid Christian.

The way in which Hamlet's Agnosticism is transmuted into good open Voltairian infidelity is amusing. In particular, "lying priests," as Polonius would say, is good. Voltaire could not keep it out. From this specimen of "translation," one may imagine what the imitations of Antony's speech, and so forth, in "Le Mort de César" are like.

Then, in his Swiss retreat, came to Voltaire incredible tidings. He had builded better—or worse—than he knew. One La Place had translated specimens of Shakespeare's plays; and the French—Voltaire's French—were admiring, positively admiring, them! The story of what followed is a singular compliment to Shakespeare. We can scarcely conceive the downright terror aroused among the accepted writers of France by the apparition among them of the great northern poet. The landing of Harry the Fifth was nothing beside it. Voltaire's tolerant patronage vanished, and he took the field with all his armoury of sneers and misrepresentations. He appealed to Europe against the barbarian: he translated part of "Julius Caesar" to show the rubbish of it. It was a literal version—so cunningly and audaciously "literal" as only Voltaire could make it. The amazed English reader could but exclaim, with Bottom's companion; "Bless thee, Shakespeare, bless thee, thou art translated!" The climax came when Le Tourneur began to put forth a complete prose version of the poet, subscribed to by the King, Queen, and a host of notables, French and foreign—so much had the Englishman's reputation spread. Le Tourneur's introductory matter defended Shakespeare and covertly attacked the French dramatic tradition with remarkable boldness; and in discussing the French stage did not mention Voltaire. Voltaire was in a paroxysm of fury. In the name of France he declared war on Shakespeare. His attack was read before the French Academy, with acclamation. "There are not in France raps on the knuckles enough, fool's caps enough, pillories enough for such a charlatan!" he screamed in a letter. "Jack-pudding" (Gilles) was his constant name for the poet. When some copies of his attack miscarried on the way to a friend, he was sure they had been seized by English spies. Would the English ambassador protest against him? Such was his state. His effort publicly to crush Le Tourneur failed, and the translation succeeded. But how long his efforts delayed the acceptance of Shakespeare none can guess. It is an extraordinary story, a study in the working and power of narrow minds. That none remembers it all—there lies the moral. And there we leave it. For in a short time Voltaire and his clamours were in the grave.

"Italy, my Italy."

HE who believes in ideals may be pardoned for feeling that the existence of an independent and united Italy is something of a loss to the Europe of to-day. The world of international policy is the poorer for the disappearance of its grandest and simplest idea. "Unity of manners, of language, of literature," said Napoléon at St. Helena, "show that Italy is destined to form a single country." In the meditations of exile he learned to attach a new significance to principles of which his active career had been a constant defiance. But Europe did not share his conversion; and against one reason for Italian unity, it was easy to set a hundred to prove that unity could never be accomplished. The struggle for unity gained none of its strength from considerations of practical policy or convenience. Its prophets wielded the moral influence which always belongs to him who asserts the triumph of an idea over the logic of facts. Italy would be one, because she must be; not because the means of uniting her were apparent or attainable. The idea of yesterday is the fact of to-day; and like too many realised ideals, it is something of a disappointment. The pressure of poverty, the evil of excessive and unequal taxation, the anarchy that found expression in the Milan riots and the cruelty that repressed them, the corruption and triviality of politics at home, the humiliation of Adowah and San Mun abroad—these are the things that take the eye of Europe, and hide from it the great industrial and social development that is still making Italy. He who knows the smiling prosperity of the southern Tyrol—Italian by race, language and situation, but Austrian by government, and often, at any rate, by sentiment—may ask himself the question whether the rule of the oppressor has not proved kinder than liberty herself, and hesitate as to the answer. Yet such hesitation is a defect of faith—of that faith which made Italy and the Italian nation from a group of States dissimilar and jealous, most of them deadened by foreign rule, some still fast held in the grip of mediævalism.

Of this faith which removed mountains the great apostle was Mazzini. Born almost before the birth of hope, an outlaw from his native country of Piedmont from his early manhood, visiting her by stealth only and at best by sufferance, pardoned late in the evening of life by an amnesty of which he scorned to take advantage, he yet lived to see the impossible realized and his ideal a fact, to witness the accomplishment of "a task like the tasks of God, the creation of a people." Sadly enough, he lived also to be disillusioned, to see Italy united by means and methods he despised, to lose the joy of the result in the shame of its achievement. "Italy, my Italy" he said of the events of 1870, "the Italy that I have preached, the Italy of our dreams? Italy, the great, the beautiful, the moral Italy of my heart? This medley of opportunists and cowards and little Macchiavellis, that let themselves be dragged behind the suggestion of the foreigner,—I thought to call up the soul of Italy and I only see its corpse." To Mazzini the whole of life was a religion. He worshipped Italy and the republic in the same spirit in which he worshipped God, and strove to serve them by the same means. He was utterly alien from the spirit in which Cavour confessed, and almost boasted, that he did things for Italy which only a villain would do for himself. The end was sacred, and the means must be holy. It was the sorrow of his last hours that they had been unworthy.

The life of a conspirator is generally one of moral decline, a progressive deterioration of motive, an increasing compromise between right and wrong. Mazzini conspired all his life long, and if once or twice in the stress of conflict he fell short of his true standard of conduct, it cannot be said that he ever sinned against the light. He may be suspected of occasional insincerity; when, for example, he called on Carlo Alberto, whose "rabbit-nature" he knew full well, to be the "Priest-king of the new age"; or on Pio Nono, the country parson of whom men strove to make a Napoleon, to create a new Rome, religion and country, there are other more probable explanations of his motive than the "expansiveness and juvenile illusion" which he himself alleged. And there are more serious blemishes than these. But the picture of the man is the portrait of sincerity itself. The same fervent purpose possessed him, whether teaching his Italian organ-boys in Hatton Garden, plotting and publishing in Switzerland with his gaze on "the everlasting Alps, those icy cherubims that guard the gate of the heart's Eden," or guiding as Triumvir the policy of the short-lived but glorious Roman Republic of 1849. All was done, as he would have said, for "God and the people." There has never been a demagogue who preached so noble a doctrine as Mazzini. All his appeals were based upon his belief in the supremacy of Duty. The struggle of the masses was to be no interested assertion of their rights. "Man has one right only: to be free from obstacles that prevent the unimpeded fulfilment of his duties." Hence arose his quarrel with utilitarianism, and with that school of liberalism which sums up all its creed in the abstraction of liberty; hence his conviction that progress could come through education, and through that alone. "My whole doctrine," he proudly writes, "is summed up in this grand word." He had a strong confidence in the divine meaning and purpose underlying human progress. "Humanity is the successive incarnation of God." "Does the infant know the aim towards which it must tend, through the family, the country, humanity? No; but this aim exists, and we are beginning to comprehend it for him. Humanity is the infant of God." And the individual cannot progress alone. He depends on others, and he must take others with him. Every form of association is a means of progress, and the best means are supplied by the natural and inevitable associations of the family and the country. "God has given you both the consent of your fellow-men and your own conscience, even as two wings wherewith to elevate yourselves towards Him. . . . Whosoever the cry of your own conscience is ratified by the consent of humanity, God is there." "Humanity is a great army, marching to the conquest of unknown lands, against enemies both strong and cunning. The peoples are its corps, each with its special operation to carry out, and the common victory depends on the exactness with which they execute the different operations." "Let your country be your Temple: God at the summit, a people of equals at the base." "The Family is the Heart's Fatherland."

Mr. Bolton King speaks of Mazzini's "incurable love of watchwords." It is true that his thought crystallizes into brilliant phrases, epigrams that astonish, metaphors that cling to the memory; and in this lay much of his strength. He wrote for the simple, and he spoke the language that they understood. It was his peculiar merit to inspire with a moral purpose, movements which are too often impelled by lower and more selfish motives. He made republicanism a religion, and revolt an act of self-sacrifice.

Mr. Bolton King, whose knowledge of the Italian movement probably surpasses that of any living Englishman, is not only a sympathetic, but, what is less usual, a discriminating biographer. The editor of the series tells us that it is to be especially devoted to "men of the Spirit." There could not have been a better choice for the first subject than Mazzini, nor an apter verdict on him than the lines from Matthew Arnold quoted in the preface:—

Yours is the praise if mankind
Hath not as yet in its march,
Fainted and fallen and died.

The Handbook.

PERIODS OF EUROPEAN LITERATURE. Vol. IX. THE MID-EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By J. H. Millar. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)

THE difficulties of Mr. Millar's task were enormous. To crowd into less than four hundred pages of medium size an account of a period which includes Voltaire, Rousseau, Heine, Johnson, Lesage, Defoe, Richardson, Fielding, Goldsmith, Hume, Gibbon, and Adam Smith; to "place" these writers and their subordinates; to trace influences backward and forward; to define inter-relations: such a business demanded generous space for its due execution, and generous space is precisely the thing which Mr. Millar, like his colleagues in the whole enterprise, has not been granted. It was in the nature of the case that he must cut his coat according to his cloth. Much, however, has aforesaid been done with little; and several writers have proved that a handbook of literature need not necessarily exhibit in any marked degree those sins into which the compiler of handbooks is too frequently tempted. We mean the sins of overstatement, facile generalisation, theatrical presentment of facts, and tawdry allusiveness.

Mr. Millar has not escaped the perils of his task. And it is unfortunate that the superficial characteristics of this volume will engender a prejudice that may obscure such good qualities as it may possess. His manner of writing, of "putting things," can scarcely fail to irritate the discerning reader. He says, for example, that Fielding "is, beyond question, the most important among the English novelists, at least from an insular point of view." The proposition that Fielding is more important than Richardson may of course be advanced, and Mr. Millar and the numerous critics who agree with him are entitled to their opinion. There is nevertheless a considerable body of cultivated English taste which would unhesitatingly put Richardson above Fielding. And in view of this fact, Mr. Millar's "beyond question" becomes an impertinence. His dozen lines about the condition of the English middle-class on page 8 are a sad example of his inability to resist the opportunity for cheap epigram. On page 29 he discloses the conscious freakishness of the critic who must be quaint at any price, by remarking, apparently in good faith, that Voltaire's persiflage, lightness and certainty of hand, and scent for human foibles "have never since been approached," except by—the younger Disraeli! Again referring to Voltaire he curtly says: "What is practically beyond doubt is that the first sprightly runnings of anti-Semitic doctrine issued from the Voltairean fountain-head and no other." We had thought the doctrine was older. And in any case Mr. Millar's pure passion for annihilation of all doubt is not amusing. Once more referring to Voltaire, who stands imposingly in the forefront of the book, we find this passage:—

Such consummate works of art are of too fragile a texture for the clumsy process of analysis. It is enough to admit their perfect adjustment and proportion, their consummate reticence and repose.

Whatever this kind of writing is, it is not criticism, and should have no place in a critical handbook.

Mr. Millar's allusiveness belongs to a species which we thought had died out several years ago. Here is a beautiful example:—

The reader must be hard to please who, in the varied banquet set before him, fails to find a good many dishes to his mind; and, when he has exhausted the bill of fare, he will be indeed ungrateful and ungracious if he can muster up no more hearty and full-blooded eulogium upon those who provided the feast than that pronounced by Andrew Fairservice upon Rob Roy.

Is Mr. Millar's justified in spending seven precious lines of his book and mystifying his readers to no purpose except to prove that he remembers his Scott? Those seven lines might have been better spent in a hundred ways.

It may be argued that such defects as these in Mr. Millar's method are superficial. They are. But we suspect that they are part and parcel of defects which cannot be called superficial. After allowing for the disadvantages under which he laboured, we are unable to persuade ourselves that he has succeeded in his endeavour to present a coherent and comprehensive view of the period allotted to him. His portraits of men lack vivacity, and his judgments on works, while sufficiently positive, lack weight and conviction. He does not seem to possess the qualification of sympathy which was surely necessary. He does not seem to have been himself quite interested and impressed, but rather to have ticked off the great masters offered to his notice with the casual indifferent pencil of an appraiser. In other words, the book seems to be entirely without emotional warmth.

The work suffers too, in our opinion, from faults of proportion. The great achievement with which Mr. Millar had to deal was the novel—he admits this—and especially the English novel. Yet out of 380 pages he allots forty to memoirs, &c., forty-two to drama (thoroughly second-rate drama), and only fifty to "prose fiction." He gives fifteen ineffectual pages to Voltaire, five pages to Richardson, and five to Fielding. He gives as much space to the religious belief of Voltaire as to "Clarissa." And his remarks on the masterpieces of English fiction, though they abound in adjectival laudation, are perfunctory and sometimes vapid. Amid the innumerable preoccupations of his enterprise he has lost, among other things, the sense of perspective. The work as a whole, while clever, accurate in its facts, and occasionally almost brilliant, leaves no vivid general impression. It might be called a university extension manual with the addition of a certain literary foppishness and cock-sureness.

The Passing of the Slum.

THE BATTLE WITH THE SLUM. By Jacob Riis. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d.)

It was the appearance of the tramp in America that stirred the late Henry George to the questionings which resulted in "Progress and Poverty." Here was a vast country waiting for labour and development. And here were dollarless and dismal men begging their way from one repellent door to another. Why was it? His answer may have been inadequate; but he formulated the question that calls for an answer. To Mr. Riis it was New York Slumland that propounded the problem, and he is happy in the knowledge that he has done much to solve the problem that presented itself to him when he slept—many years ago—in a police station lodging, and swore that such vile and verminous retreats must go. It was a big resolve for a penniless Dane who had become an American citizen. Some time ago we wrote of the book—"The Making of an American"—in which Mr. Riis described the personal struggle from penury and a police lodging, through police reporting, newspaper campaigning against the horrible conditions under which the other half lives, to the backing of Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt was not yet President, but he too swore that these things should go. And in this book Mr. Riis writes alternately in a white heat of triumph and a white heat of indignation of what is accomplished and what remains to be done. It is a perfectly artless book, without form, but by no means void. For it contains the record of accomplishment.

Five and twenty years ago New York, partly from its geographical limitations and partly from another reason, had developed a slumland that rivalled anything in the older continent. In London we have had our difficulties. Municipal authorities have been stupid, dilatory, without imagination. But they have been on the right side. New York, when Mr. Riis began his work, was ruled by a gang of politicians, with a boss in supreme command, who lived on the misery and corruption of the slum. Even the churches had moved to the fashionable quarters, and drew their incomes from the gambling-den, the filthy tenement-house, and the brothel. We will quote an arraignment of the East side:—

Imagine, if you can, a section of the city territory completely dominated by one man, without whose permission neither legitimate nor illegitimate business can be conducted, where illegitimate business is encouraged, and legitimate business discouraged. Where the respectable residents have to fasten their doors and windows summer nights, and sit in their rooms with asphyxiating air, and one hundred degrees temperature, rather than try to catch the faint whiff of breeze in their natural breathing places—the stoops of their homes; where naked women dance by night in the streets, and unsexed men prowl like vultures through the darkness on "business," not only permitted but encouraged by the police; where the education of infants begins with the knowledge of prostitution, and the training of little girls is training in the arts of Phryne; where American girls brought up with the refinements of American homes . . . are left locked up behind jail bars until they have lost all semblance of womanhood . . . in short, where the premium of the most awful forms of vice is the profit of the politicians.

That was the rule of Tammany. The law was right enough. But police, boss, judge, all were banded together to make profit from the breaking of the law, and the man who resisted was either ruined or had to take service in the ranks of vice. This was what Mr. Riis had to fight against, with nothing but a pen, a brain, and a good constitution to help him at the start. Tammany has tumbled and risen; but in the intervals of its recumbence slum after slum has been opened out to the sunlight by the sanitary authorities, narrow courts have been turned into playgrounds for the children who had been overlooked in the New York of the eighties; lodging-houses have been built with concentrated conveniences for the man who has to live on a small income and earn it, where his wife may live without insult and his children grow up uncorrupted. The dollarless Dane has done a big thing in reform with the brain, the pen and the muscle. Look at him as he stands in the forefront of this book. If you know the personal appearance of Mr. Dunne, the maker of "Dooley," you will be struck by the amazing resemblance between the trenchant humourist and the furious philanthropist.

LOMBARD STUDIES. By the Countess Evelyn Martinengo Cesaresco. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS is a pleasant little sheaf of gossiping essays, all more or less dealing with those happy plains of north Italy, where, upon the shores of the Lago di Garda, the Countess Martinengo Cesaresco has her adopted home. She writes of the lake itself, "the poets' lake," Dante's Benacus, and of Catullus' "olive-silvery Sirmio"; of Vittoria Accoramboni, the ill-fated lady of Webster's "White Devil"; of Rimini and the true story of Francesca da Polenta; then of Lombard agriculture, with its system of mezzeria or metayage and its vineyards and silk-farms; and, again, of the Scala at Milan and its place in the world of song, and of the irresponsible and popular comedy still so dear to the quick-witted Italian. Perhaps the most interesting study of all is that devoted to the ancient family of the Martinenghi and to their palazzo at Salò. This was built in 1556 by the Marquis Sforza Pallavicino, and bought by the Martinenghi in the seventeenth century. It stood a siege by the Austrians in 1796, and many papers and other objects of interest were thrust hastily into a sack.

This was found not many years ago, and in it no less a treasure than a letter to some unknown friend of the Pallavicini from Galileo Galilei himself. A magnificent portrait by Moretto in the National Gallery represents Sciarra Martinengo Cesaresco, like many of his race, a soldier of fortune, who served the French and enjoyed the friendship of Brantôme, and ultimately ended a stormy life fighting against the Huguenots. But the great glory of the house is the Blessed Maria Maddalena Martinengo, a Franciscan votary, who was beatified in the presence of the authoress as recently as 1900. Whatever theme the Countess Martinengo Cesaresco chooses, she handles it with taste and multifarious knowledge, and, above all, with the historic sense and feeling for forgotten far-off things without which no one can write adequately on Italy.

ACROSS ICELAND. By W. Bisiker. (Edward Arnold. 12s. 6d.)

THIS is the narrative of a "semi-scientific" party, which in the summer of 1900 traversed the uninhabited districts of central Iceland, from north-east to south-west, and afterwards travelled in Western Iceland, and by sea along the coast and fjords of the north-west and north-east. It was a mixed party, each with his own hobby or interests, and included one lady-traveller, Miss Hastie, whose speciality was folk-lore and plant-life. Truth to say, if the journey was to be recorded, we wish the lady had written the record rather than Mr. Bisiker. We might at any rate have looked for a little chattiness to relieve the precision of science. But Mr. Bisiker never relents into anything so unscientific. In plain words, it is doubtless a book of a certain value to the scientific geographer, but to the general reader it is as bread without butter. Every detail of the journey is set down with the bald and passionless accuracy of a physician's note-book; there is not a scrap of human interest or descriptive attraction throughout the stout volume. At the end another man of science has made a bare list of the plants found on the journey; and we rather think it the more picturesque and interesting of the two. This is Mr. Bisiker's style. He is describing a visit to Engey Island, a home of the eider-duck:—

The season was almost over; . . . nevertheless a few birds still remained in their nests, and we found them comparatively tame; they were not quite undisturbed by our presence, though, for they moved away a few yards in an agitated state, leaving their young to blunder and stumble about all around. In vain we tried to keep the ducklings from wandering, but they would struggle out of the nest time after time, the mother walking round us the while with a watchful eye upon her brood. It is said that the down which the old birds pluck from their breasts to line the nests may be removed two or three times before they abandon them.

That is not inspiring. The author, in fact, has no spark of the literary gift; and his book consequently makes arid reading.

LOVE-POEMS OF WILFRID BLUNT. (Lane.)

THIS is a selection, not from Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's poetical work at large, but strictly from his poems on the theme of love. The pretty little volume will certainly be a treasured book to all admirers of this poet. For he is eminently a personal poet, as Mr. Heuley has already said; and in none of his work does he reveal himself so strongly as in these love-poems—especially the "Sonnets of Proteus," which compose a major portion of the volume. This is quite compatible with the fact that Mr. Blunt is a virile poet, a man of action, whose poems are the outcome of his life, not his life of his poetry. The sonnets, with their Shakespearean ring, are no effeminate prattle, but often very grim work. Love turns to muscle in a strong man. The selection is very good; we note but one omission which we regret, and that was perhaps thought hardly to come under the description of love-poetry. Mr. Blunt's name should now be too well known for this volume to need quotation. All its contents have been long before the public; but those who have still to make acquaintance with him may conveniently and pleasurably do it here.

HOOKE'S ECCLESIASTICAL POLITY. Book V. Edited by Ronald Bayne. (Macmillan. 15s. net.)

THIS is a first instalment of the English Theological Library of which the Rev. Frederick Relton is the general editor. The General Introduction, from the pen of the late Bishop of London, is couched in such wise and moderate words as you might expect from that distinguished scholar. He is surely not overshooting the mark when he claims for the standard theological works of the Anglican Church that they are strong in sound and massive learning. And it is a point that was worth making, as differentiating them from the output of schools that preceded them, that, possessing no technical style of their own, they may be placed side by side and judged on equal terms with the great body of English prose; by comparison wherewith they are seen to yield some of the noblest products of the language. The present edition of Hooker's Fifth Book is based upon Keble's; but to the Latin and Greek quotations are appended translations, and in addition to Keble's Appendices will be found the "Christian Letter," together with Hooker's own comments thereon. Mr. Bayne publishes a sketch of the Disciplinary Movement, whereof in his Preface he writes with becoming but unnecessary diffidence. The volume is handsomely printed and bound.

In "Stories in Stone from the Roman Forum" (Macmillan), Miss Isabel Lovell has set herself the task of explaining "why" certain buildings were erected and certain customs were observed in ancient Rome. Some of the chapters deal with "The Story of the Forum itself," "The Story of the Temple of Saturn," "The Story of the Temple of Vesta," and so on. The book is written in an easy and pleasant style, and seems accurate as to facts and authorities.

In "Famous Hymns and their Authors," by Francis Arthur Jones, we have an interesting and rather curious book—interesting because of its inclusions, curious because of its omissions. Many of the best known hymn writers are touched upon, and the various sections, such as "Morning and Evening Hymns," "Advent Hymns," and so on, are treated with sympathy and knowledge. But where is Herrick's "Litany of the Holy Spirit," surely one of the most perfect things in its kind ever written?

NEW EDITIONS.—We are glad to welcome a new issue of Miss Ferrier's "The Inheritance" (Methuen). Miss Goodrich Freer in her introduction calls it "the most ambitious of Miss Ferrier's works." That is true, and we hope that modern readers will not fight shy of a writer who combined much diffuseness with a sound knowledge of human nature. The critical notices are by the Earl of Idlesleigh.—The twenty-fifth volume of the "World's Classics" (Richards) contains Hazlitt's "Winterslow." The title, as Hazlitt's lovers will know, has nothing to do with the matter of the essays. In the same series we have Bacon's "Essays," of which nothing can be said at the moment than that this reprint is admirably paged and printed.—From the Astolat Press there come four reprints, each delightful in its way: Shakespeare's Sonnets, Keats's Sonnets, "Pilgrim's Progress," and Gray. The latter is a selection, and is called "English Poems."

Fiction.

The Wayward Maid.

THE WAY OF A MAN. By Morley Roberts. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

WHAT does a woman really want when she puts up her back hair and begins to think that the world is made for two? That is the question that lies at the root of Mr. Morley Roberts's story, and he answers it in the way he has made familiar to us. His story were better entitled, "The Waywardness of a Maid," for it is the tale of Meta's search for a man. A real man. A man who was in touch with tropics, and pirates and cannibals—the real work of the world. She was a year or two older than the girl whose ideal is the boy who tumbles in a circus. She thought she loved Jack. But, as she explained to him, what she loved was not what he was, but "it's what you can be and must be and will be." Jack's notion was a house at Wimbledon—a beautiful residential neighbourhood—and an honest living on the Stock Exchange. Meta's notion was different, and by Meta's impulse Jack, having embarked to rescue a shipwrecked crew, came by accident to Central America and a revolution. And Meta hearing followed. You may see how it happened from this quotation:—

"A woman's plain duty is to make a man do his best. If I threw you over you'd do your worst and make money, or you'd go away and be what I want, and never come back any more."

"My darling, don't cry," urged Jack. "Don't you think you are rather unreasonable?"

But she snapped his head off and dried her tears instantly.

"No, I'm not unreasonable. How dare you say so? But I believe I know what's in you, and I want you to be it without our quarrelling. Oh, do, do, do, Jack."

Jack threw up his head.

"All right, all right," he said crossly. "I never know where I am with you. What am I to be—a soldier, a sailor, or a pirate. Tell me exactly; give it a name, and I'll start at once."

Luckily Meta had four hundred a year of her own, and could pay her fare to the address of her ideal. But it was not Jack. She happened to drop into the wrong camp of the revolution, and met the President, who was tall, had enormous moustaches, and tried to kiss Meta. She boxed his ears one day—but the next—well, it is a good story. The outcome is rather rough on Jack, whose development is characteristic of Mr. Morley Roberts's philosophy of life. "Now, as he walked to and fro behind his guns, he knew that he was a man." His guns were merely at the service of a blackguard who wanted to fire other blackguards out of this little Central American capital. And no one but Meta and her like—we must include Mr. Morley Roberts—would have much respect for a man who laid his guns in a cause of which he knew nothing whatever. It may be that women like that particular kind of fool. So we may hope that Meta is happy with the defeated President of the splendid moustaches.

THE INN OF THE SILVER MOON. By Herman Knickerbocker Vielé. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a pleasant little comedy, sufficiently entertaining to keep the reader on the alert, though often rather exasperating in point of style. Mr. Vielé clearly has read his Stevenson, but although he has caught from the author of "Prince Otto" a certain air of fantasy and gay inconsequence, he has not learnt much in the way of manner and balance. The story is old, being nothing more than a repetition of the perennial situation between a couple betrothed against their will. In the present case the pair, who are unknown to one another, meet in embarrassing and humorous circumstances at a fair. The gentleman has been robbed of his clothes while bathing, and has had to put on a peasant's dress, thoughtfully supplied by the thief; the lady has run away from a convent and is posing as a countess. Complications follow; there is a wild drive, a breakdown, and an idyllic night in the open. The relations between the pair are suggested with real humour and some insight. The best episode deals with an absurd escape from a gendarme, and a voyage on a river with a captain who is in the wrecking business. The countess turns cook, and so enchants the captain that he promptly proposes to marry her. There follows diplomacy and another flight. In the end, of course, everything is smoothed out, and the sham countess becomes Gabrielle de Belle Isle.

Mr. Vielé certainly has a pleasant fancy for the fantastic, and at his best a nice perception of the humour of quaint situations. And although the whole book has practically nothing to do with actual life, it now and then touches its fringes adroitly and with some distinction.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

HIS MAJESTY BABY.

By IAN MACLAREN.

An introduction to Mr. Ian Maclaren being obviously unnecessary, the following may serve as an introduction to the figure which dominates the title rather than the contents of this volume: "She leaned forward and asked questions, and we overheard scraps of technical detail: 'My first . . . fourteen months . . . six teeth . . . always well.' Baby was bored, and apologised to the 'bus.'" The rest of the sketches deal for the most part with "some common people" who have aroused the pity or the irony of Mr. Maclaren. (Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

BY FORTUNE'S WHIM.

By T. W. SPEIGHT.

In this book are recounted the exciting adventures of a Russian, Count Alexis Strogoneff, who passes himself off as M. Karavich. He is neither a Nihilist nor a Revolutionist in the accepted European sense, but merely a propagandist of those ideas of liberty which outside of Russia are the most ordinary common-places. There is a typical Anglo-Saxon of action in the book who is accidentally drawn into the Russian's fortunes. (Digby Long. 6s.)

THE MISFIT MANTLE.

By CHARLES GLEIG.

Concerned with the adventures, amatory and otherwise, of a Peer. In the opening chapter Lord Belsize, being troubled with a fit of nerves, hurls a missile (we are not told what it is) at an unfortunate "melodiant" player. "The man threw up his arms convulsively, dropped the melodiant, and fell upon the pavement." Then follow complications and flight. Mr. Gleig writes with a good deal of spirit, but his humour is rather crude. (Treherne. 3s. 6d.)

THE JALASCO BRIG.

By LOUIS BECKE.

A volume containing four stories. In the title story Mr. Becke takes us again to the South Pacific. Says the Captain of the brig to his chief mate, "Look here, Tom Merritt. You and me have been together a long time now, and you know the kind of customer I am, and that I've done some queer things in my time—tougher jobs than collaring this brig, as you know—and my conscience is pretty elastic . . ." The narrative explains to us just the kind of customer Captain Benjamin Rowley was. (Treherne. 3s. 6d.)

We have also received: "Just a Girl," by Charles Garvice (Sands); "In Cupid's Chains," by Charles Garvice (Sands); "A Dutch Household," translated from the Dutch of Johanna van Woude (Digby Long); "Marina de la Ray," by Charlotte Moor (Digby Long).

The Outer and the Inner Eye.

THE secret of imaginative vision is part, perhaps the rarest part, of the mystery of personality. All normal individuals can see with their eyes, but most men receive no more than a visual impression; they know little, perhaps nothing, of that inexplicable thrill of association which is partly memory, partly uncomprehended instinct, partly pure passion. One man shall look unmoved upon the pyramids, another shall be overwhelmed with the terror and mystery of greatness past, with the almost immutability of stone and the entire mutability of the builders of monuments; he will see the long procession of the ages leading inevitably to just the point of time in which he lives, and only by projecting his mind into a future which shall equal the past can he keep hold upon reality and feel himself to be actual in an actual world. And both these men may write books, and each book may be good. It is well to measure and dissect, to set down the visible thing clearly, just as it is well to surround the visible thing with invisible associations.

Mr. A. H. Savage Landor's "Across Coveted Lands" and Mr. Edward Hutton's "Italy and the Italians" are two such books as we have indicated. Mr. Landor travels from Flushing overland to Calcutta, and writes two volumes containing close on a thousand pages; Mr. Hutton walks through Italy and lingers and dreams, and writes a book of something over three hundred pages. Both books are excellent in their way, but Mr. Landor's is the way of travel-books and Mr. Hutton's is the way of literature. As travel-books go we have little fault to find with Mr. Landor's volumes, but the reservation implies much. Mr. Landor gives us no comprehensive view; he rushes us across Persia and through cities whose names are the very touchstones of romance, but he revivifies no past; he merely catalogues the present. Detail upon detail we have of costume, habits, trade, architecture; we recognise the writer's observant eye, his insatiable curiosity; we give him full credit for pluck, enterprise, and the best commercial instincts. Yet we are entirely unmoved, save at points where the hurry slackens a little and we are allowed to get our own imagination into play. Mr. Landor never concentrates, as did the author of "Eothen"; we get no atmosphere, no beauty, no real sense of historical perspective. The book, however, is of value as a record of facts and impressions, though it would have been of greater value if it had occupied half the space.

Mr. Hutton, on the other hand, is scant of detail; he observes, assimilates, broods, and gives us his residual impressions with poetry and fervour. He is one of the many alien lovers of Italy who have found in her the strongest inspiration, the profoundest joy, the utmost sadness. We are almost inclined to think that in recent times, at any rate, these alien lovers of Italy have appreciated her more truly, have given her of their best more willingly, than her own sons. Mr. Hutton mourns over her as over a mistress whose day is not yet passed; he looks for a revival of her greatness, an actual rejuvenescence of her loveliness. The glory which remains points him to a glory which yet may be. His book, indeed, is a plea for the stability of the past, united with a plea for the possibilities of the future. He desires to see Italy emerge from her stagnation, and once more lead men to the true appreciation of what was best in herself and in the world. And in that we see the limits of what we may call the too inward eye. Mr. Hutton is too much concerned with what has been, too little impressed with the inevitable march of events. He, like Mr. Landor—yet very differently—takes no broad view of the whole tendency of events; he takes no count of the decay of the Latin races, of the spectacle which the nineteenth century saw but so little understood. He calls upon Italy to awake as Mr. Swinburne called upon her to awake in the most concentrated and perfect of all his work, in the volume entitled "Songs before Sunrise." But Mr. Hutton sees her hope in the conservatives and in the crown. Here, however, we cannot discuss the question of means or politics; it is with Mr. Hutton as a literary artist that we have to deal. And of the beauty of much of his work there can be no question; he has seized and set down impressions enlarged by imagination and vitalized by dreams. Of Rome he writes:—

But I believe, and am sure, that some day in the Forum or upon the hill of the Cæsars it will suddenly come upon some mighty trove, the very head of Jupiter or the bones of Augustus Cæsar, and then and in a moment the crowd shall be afraid, and through the darkness of the centuries it will see a great light, and from the dust of Rome that hero shall arise for whom she has ever been the insatiable mistress; and he shall set up her altars again, and he shall lift up her head and kiss her on the lips, and Beauty shall no longer be an outcast, and once more she shall awake, still and for ever the one immortal city. This is my faith.

It is something in these days for a man so explicitly to state his faith; and though we may believe that Mr. Hutton's faith is too much of the imagination, too little of the world we live in, there yet remains in the mind something of the desire that his faith may be justified.

Mr. Hutton writes of Genoa, Pisa, Siena, of Orvieto, Naples, Bologna, and half-a-dozen other cities, in the same spirit; he mourns over their glorious decay, and anticipates a more glorious resurrection. Always he has the inner eye, always he is allured by what has been called "the fatal passion for beauty." He sees what is, and at once there leap into his mind the strengths and the weaknesses which made Italy what she was,—and is. His attitude is that of a lover to a mistress whom he refuses to believe old; he is always waiting for the transforming "light from heaven."

It would have been well if Mr. Hutton had confined himself to the appreciation of the beauty of Italy; occasionally, and certainly unfortunately, he becomes almost hysterical over the banalities and crudities of the modern world. He forgets that the older world was hardly less crude and banal, and that even his beloved Lionardo da Vinci was suspected and hated by the ignorant of his own time.

In the conclusion to his book Mr. Hutton says:—

as I have read, on some summer's evening, in some magnificent and simple book, the very world itself has been translated for me into a more profound and beautiful language than any I have really heard with my bodily ears.

And in reading the mighty hexameters of Homer I have most often attained to this vision when, never without excitement and indescribable emotion, I have whispered the words in which Agamemnon tells of his own death and of the death of Cassandra. At that moment it has seemed to me that beauty was inseparable from simplicity, and everything really inexpressible save in the most simple language and the easiest words.

That note of simplicity is precisely what is lacking in modern literature; it is often lacking in Mr. Hutton's own work. The supreme expression of the inner vision should always be simple; it should appeal, or at any rate strive to appeal, to the wayfaring man. If the impulse be true, the knowledge adequate, it will not fail in its appeal to the highest as well. Emerson said of the poet: "He hears a voice, he sees a beckoning. Then he is apprised, with wonder, what herds of dæmons hem him in. He can no more rest; he says, with the old painter, 'By God, it is in me, and it must go forth of me.' He pursues a beauty, half seen, which flies before him." And the secret of the expression of that beauty lies largely in simplicity. It is the business of every man to say what he has to say as simply as may be; in a hundred words he may concentrate the accumulated joy and experience of a dozen years. Merely to see and hear, as we have said, is common to all normal men; but only to the greatest is it given to express what they see and hear in immortal words. When Wordsworth wrote:—

O blithe new-comer! I have heard,
I hear thee and rejoice.
O Cuckoo! shall I call thee bird,
Or but a wandering voice?

he achieved the absolute magic of simplicity. Into those four lines there went not only the inspiration of a perfect moment, but also memory and association. They have in them the suggestion of breathless noons, of brave sunlight, of misty valleys, of the whole pomp of summer. They at once load and exhilarate the imagination, lighting that "inward eye which is the bliss of solitude."

Vision—the word has been so abused that we almost hesitate to use it—is no doubt primarily a matter of temperament, but it is temperament controlled by will. The mere dreamer has vision, but only to dream is to be stranded on the very shoals of weakness. The man who, overtaken on a hillside by a storm, sees only rain and the discomfort of wet clothes may put that experience to more practical use than he whose inner vision impels him to see in the valley which he overlooks the symmetry of deploying armies and the smoke of hideous battle. Dreams are of value only when they can attach themselves to actuality; they must take hold of life and associate themselves with the bread and meat of a world which lives by the common means of existence. Even so ethereal a poet as Shelley, perhaps unconsciously, had more contact with the world than the world is inclined to recognise.

But Shelley, like many others of his kind, did not control the inner vision. He was not the master in the house of dreams, he was the servant of those supreme visitations. Yet the authentic inspiration, however remote it may seem, always touches actuality. The old and inevitable union between sense and spirit asserts itself; he who was born of clay cannot free himself from the trammels of the dust. And it is precisely in that union of the mortal and the immortal that literature justifies itself. At the best it is no more than a striving to express the mystery of being, no more than a groping in the dark. Even the poorest novel, in this light, has a kind of pathetic significance; the hand that wrote was prompted by a brain eager for some kind of expression. It is before this purely human matter that criticism feels ashamed.

Yet criticism is justified of herself; for the ages have evolved a standard which of necessity takes serious count only of the highest. And always he who had the inner eye remains, and he who merely saw lives, if indeed he lives, in the barren world of dusty and disused libraries.

Above all things the inner eye demands quietness and contemplation, and out of that quietness and contemplation there will come to birth consoling speculation and profound judgments. Only so can the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them be brought to the test of our shifting but changeless humanity.

Russian and English Fiction.

A LONG series of brilliant novelists has given to the Russian novel a prestige which it would be difficult to exaggerate. From Gogol to Gorki these authors have had the desire to see and to make others see, in the words of the former, "all that was bad in Russia." In spite, however, of a motif of apparently didactic realism the Russian novel is essentially the reverse of realistic in the French sense. One may escape from one's vices or one's virtues, but one can never wholly elude one's temperament. The evanescent aloofness of Turgenev is not kindred to the sustained detachment of Flaubert, nor is the wail of pity in Dostoevsky the same as the modulated emotion of Alphonse Daudet. But because writers are never tired of juggling with great names, both Dostoevsky and Daudet have been called, respectively, the Russian and French Dickens, while Goncharov has been laboriously compared with Thackeray. This sort of criticism is necessarily rather superficial, but it might be not uninteresting to compare the two distinct modern schools of Russian and English fiction without attempting to reduce any of their representatives to the limits of a literary bed of Procrustes.

If we were asked by a foreigner to name two works of English fiction by which he might form some estimate of the characteristics peculiar to the English school, we should select "Robinson Crusoe" and "The Book of Snobs." The first illustrates the Englishman's habit of thought when he is thrown absolutely upon his own resources and stands face to face with the eternal forces of nature. The second discloses, through a hundred dissolving views, the Englishman's habit of thought when he mingles with his fellow beings.

If we were asked a similar question in regard to Russian fiction, we should select the "Krotkaia" of Dostoevsky and the "Smoke" of Ivan Turgenev. The first is in no sense of the term a parallel to the masterpiece of Defoe, but it shows us with the vividness of a searchlight a human soul, naked and cut off from all human consolation. The second reveals the Russian's attitude towards his fellow passengers in the journey of life.

It is unnecessary to give a résumé of the first of the two English books we have mentioned, but it is necessary to modify the judgment dictated by the crude familiarity of boyhood. For consider for a moment the physical situation and the mental attitude of Defoe's hero, the exceptional pressure of the conditions of matter upon the fortitude of mind. Consider the loneliness, the helplessness, the utter isolation of the man. Surely here the ghosts of memory will come to him and mock him, and old hopes will return to him, and remorse, and that terrible uncertainty as to the reality of life which comes as the first, faint whisper of death? Surely here the brain will feed upon itself, and if utterance there be it will be only the morbid monologue of the mind? Not at all. The Englishman looks coldly and unflinchingly at the facts of the case, and performs quietly the immediate task in front of him. He registers the daily facts in their sequence, and even on this lonely island is governed by a profound sense of duty which never deserts him. This sense of duty, with its concomitant attributes of sanity and calm, gives a dignity to the lonely, unper-vasive figure which no pseudo Prometheus or imitation of Odysseus can ever reach.

In "Krotkaia" Dostoevsky avowedly makes use of Victor Hugo's method in "Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné." He shows us a man entirely alienated from his fellow beings, brooding over the corpse of the only person he had been permitted to love, his wife who in the end had committed suicide to avoid his tenderness. Can human alienation be more complete? Can analysis be more mordant in its merciless scrutiny of the soul? The man's life flashes before us in the reverie of an hour, and we learn to know the woman and the secret of the estrangement between them. We see the desire to dazzle, the wish to dominate, the inept pose of this desolate creature, and with it all, incongruous and inexplicable, the strange potentiality for heroism. He had failed to win his wife's heart because he had striven to make her think him something other than he was. He had concealed the tenderness of a soul outraged by every phase of insult, humiliated, crushed, but still capable of pity. And because of this concealment she, too, had turned away from him, and had gone to her death, leaving him to face the absolute loneliness of life. He broods over it all, and turns from the concrete picture of his shattered aspirations—the corpse of his wife—to that vast, shadowy abstraction which had crushed both of them so easily, so carelessly. He who had wished to take a morose vengeance upon the world addresses the social order with vain fury. “Que m'importe vos lois? Que m'importe vos mœurs, vos usages, vos habitudes, votre gouvernement, votre religion.” The very sympathy of his nature is turned to bitterness, and the impulse towards self-sacrifice passes into the rage of impotent hatred.

It may be objected that we have chosen a very “secondary” novel of this great Russian, but there is in the few pages of “Krotkaia” the quintessence of Dostoevsky, that is to say, the quintessence of one side of Russian fiction. For there is in the Russian “une atmosphère de fantastique et d'idéal, et en même temps, hélas! quelque chose de grossier et de prosaïque jusqu'à la suprême trivialité.” In this book one finds just this mingling of contrasts which, beyond question, Dostoevsky detected in his own work and in his own nature. A mingling of contrasts, however, which—illuminated by genius as it is—never descends “jusqu'à la suprême trivialité,” to repeat his own harsh phrase.

Precisely the same objection may be urged against our choice of “The Book of Snobs,” but we shall stand by it for very much the same reasons as those advanced in favour of “Krotkaia.” It is not the greatest work of the master—the term will soon have as definite an application to Thackeray in England as it has to Flaubert in France—but his spirit is in every line of it. We have alluded to these sketches as “dissolving views,” and in truth snob follows snob with so delicate a presentation of minute differences, so just a recognition of almost imperceptible differentiation, that one is almost dazed by the art which has created portraits out of the constantly changing expressions of a fixed type. And the spirit of England lives in these pages, not presented with the harshness of didactic irony, but rather with the kindliness of man to man in a wilderness, snob calling to snob across a sea of submerged impossibilities. There is here nothing of the rage of Juvenal, very little even of the milder malice of Horace. For in spite of the definition of a snob as one “who meanly admires mean things” nobody can feel very much animus against many quite excellent people who find their way into “The Book of Snobs.” In short, snobbery is a habit of thought, essentially national, and one which neither Thackeray nor any other English satirist has ever seriously condemned. What would life be without it? Half the tragedy and all the comedy would cease to exist. How many thousands and thousands of pages of alleged English prose have been printed for the express purpose of proving that some poor devil or other “was not quite a gentleman.” What a worn comparison it is—significant of endless phases of presentation—that of the struggles of the lady who wishes to mix with ladies and the labours of Hercules! No sneer in the world is so popular with the English as the social snub, and the great doctrine of such snubs would fill, practically does fill, many an English library. Now, “The Book of Snobs” is the very Koran of such literature. It accepts, and at the same time defines snobbery. Taking the world as it is and snobs as they are, it points out what phases of snobbery are, and are not, to be tolerated. It is avowedly the work of “one of themselves,” and it shows, once and for all, the conditions under which the Englishman is willing to meet his fellow man. Many have ignored these conditions, but, from George Warrington to Rawdon Crawley, they have been failures according to the accepted standard of success.

In “Smoke” we meet with a penetration into the depths of human character equally subtle. Like Thackeray, Turgenev sees infinitely beyond the limitations of his characters, and yet refrains from denouncing them. The former has given us an ironical picture of his countrymen, but he has given it as an Englishman, and one of themselves. In the same way Turgenev's mocking comment on the dreams of these chattering Russians leaves no doubt as to his very real sympathy with them. But while Thackeray's sympathy is, as it were, the kindly smile at a foible in which he himself may or may not share, Turgenev's mockery is inseparable from melancholy. For these dreams which pass into smoke are the noblest aspirations of the race. It is not a question of surviving a social snub, or braving the displeasure of a titled hostess. It is a question of the disintegration of character, as though there were in the very expression of triumphant hopes the germs of abandonment and despair.

In this book the story of Litvinof's love, passing as it does from the very ecstasy of passion to the fatigue of utter disillusion, is played to the accompaniment of the corresponding enthusiasm, followed by weariness on the part of the youth of Russia. No matter how earnest the friendships, how noble the convictions, in the end it is always—smoke. A woman's word, a nation's honour—smoke. Progress, civilization, hero-worship? The answer is the same. Politics, the eternal destiny of Russia? Smoke. But beyond the unstable enthusiasm of his puppets, deeper than the vibrations of their rhetoric, there is in this book—the very title of which is an expression of scepticism—a profound conviction. It is not expressed in so many lines or pages, but it underlies the surface of those of Turgenev's novels which deal with the ultimate ambitions of Russia. In “Smoke,” as in “Virgin Soil,” it becomes the more significant because it is not stated in a formula. It is the conviction that the mysterious evolution of human destinies is to be neither hurried nor stayed by the fretting of the individual. It is also the supreme belief that that race which has in its blood something of eastern patience will in the end triumph by reason of its slow, seemingly motionless force.

The heroes of English fiction, from Tom Jones to Tom Tulliver, are more or less representative of what the race tends to produce. We find that they are for the most part self-centred, objective, strenuous towards a definite goal, relatively moral by reason of robustness of temperament. They are naturally optimistic, and are governed by a sense of duty. Incapable of emotional rhetoric, they are none the less absolutely reliable in the hour of need. They are essentially individualistic, non-democratic, non-sentimental.

On the other hand, we find that the representatives of the Russians belong to quite a different type. The hero of English fiction has his raison d'être in doing, the hero of Russian fiction in being. For the former the facts of life are paramount, for the latter the dreams of la vie intérieure. At once vague and self-conscious these Russian creations torment themselves with the endless analysis of motive. The Englishman is more or less kindly towards a person whom he half despises, because he understands, no one better, the give and take of life. Democratic, even socialistic in his tendencies, the Russian is bitter towards the individual because he expects so much from humanity.

Impressions.

HERE, too, the Briton has forced his way, pushing the invalids, who preceded him, into the remoter mountains. The sun-boxes where the wan creatures once sat stand empty since the robust folk who speak the English tongue discovered the possibilities of amusement in snow.

Far below at the end of the lake the Rhone valley, wide and flat, holds its way between the mountains that stand a gigantic background to the villages that overlap one another along the lake side. Down there are tram lines, the wild muddle of life, the day's noises, and winter mists: up here is the snow that falls and stays, the temple of sleigh bells, and clear sunshine. Often we are above the clouds, seeing nothing of the world that lies somewhere below, hearing nothing in the white world about, for this mountain of ours is hidden by other giants whose tops break the wind. Guide-books published a few years ago gave but one line to this mountain where we dwell, saying that good walkers might ascend it in so many hours: to-day a thousand people may live here through the winter as comfortably as in the heart of London. The few villagers are almost objects of curiosity. It is our tongue that rings out in the clear air. It is the Anglo-Saxon for whom this mountain has been conquered, chained and curbed, and made habitable.

Why?

Because one day he realised that if he seated himself on a small framework of wood on iron runners, this contrivance would carry him swiftly down the mountain side to the valley beneath. That was enough. The Briton had found a new sport, and immediately Switzerland began to build railways up the mountain side, and hotels. Often he is thrown off, occasionally he breaks a limb, always when he reaches the valley has he to drag the luge toilsomely through the snow up to the starting-point again. What of that? To wait for a train back might mean the loss of many minutes of sport. Dynasties may be toppling over in the world down there beneath the clouds. What cares he so long as the snow is deep enough to cover the narrow winding road that will project him and his luge into the valley. Strange notion!

At all hours of the day, after nightfall too, you will see these moist, snow-spattered figures whirling down the mountain side. Mothers, daughters, children catch the infection from their brothers and husbands. The high road is annexed as if the lugeurs were a conquering army. From morn till eve the interest of life is centred in wild rushes down the mountain side, and the air is filled with the shouts of "Gare! Gare!" which means, if you happen to be walking peaceably up the mountain road, that you must jump quickly into the snow-drift at the side to allow the lugeur to rush past you with staring eyes fixed excitedly on the next curve in the road. Higher and higher up the mountain side they go beating down the snow to make a track till there comes a point where even the Briton, in pursuit of sport, must bow before the impossible. He makes his little run over the snow here and there, but above are the immense shoulders of the snow giants—silent, inaccessible.

The invalids have all been driven away from this mountain, but they still linger in this region above the snow-line which heals the ailing as it invigorates the robust. When night has fallen, when the last of the lugeurs has gone home, looking inland I see the glimmer of lights high up on a snow plateau just beneath Orion. These are the lights of the sun-sheds on the next mountain where the invalids now sit and wait. It is late and dark, but those lights still shine out. There is no break in the healing power above the snow-line of this white land.

Drama.

Scenic Realism.

I AM glad to see that the public support of "Bethlehem" has proved sufficient to justify another series of performances before the play passes from the ken of Londoners. It would be difficult to say how much of the success is due to Mr. Housman's poetry, and how much to the fascination of novelty, the desire to join in administering a snub to the censor, or the quaint and stimulating experiment of Mr. Gordon Craig's stage setting. But I am quite sure where my own interest in the matter lies. For, while I do not expect or even very particularly desire either a renaissance of the miracle-play or a downfall of the censorship, I am pretty certain that the methods and principles adopted by Mr. Craig will have a profound influence upon the scenic presentations of the future. Already it is whispered (if that is the proper term for the process by which paragraphs creep into the daily press) that Mr. Craig is to superintend the production of plays by Ibsen and Shakespeare for Miss Ellen Terry; and if any power could persuade a conservative and not particularly intelligent public to swallow so great an innovation, it might well be the personal charm and artistic prestige of Miss Ellen Terry.

What is the exact question at issue between Mr. Craig and the traditional manager of a theatre? Mainly it is one concerning the limits of scenic realism. The object of any "setting" to a play is, of course, to create the illusion; to facilitate the detachment of the spectator from his individual life and the surrender of his imagination to the fabled story. According to the tradition, this can only be done by realism, by reproducing on the stage as nearly as possible a facsimile of the pictures placed before the eye by real external objects. All the resources of the mechanical and decorative arts are, therefore, lavished to find a way of making lath and plaster and canvas look like gardens and forest glades and buildings. But the task is an impossible one. Nobody, unless he be myopic or otherwise of blunt perceptions, is really illuded. There in the background is a landscape on a large scale, cleverly and even beautifully painted, no doubt, but absolutely refusing to come into any unity of perspective with the trees or porticoes modelled in relief in the middle distance. Here in the foreground are beds of flowers which patently would not thank you for the watering pot, and piles of quivering masonry, such as never entered the wildest dreams of even a suburban jerry-builder. It all gives employment to a large number of deserving families, no doubt, and makes an excellent advertisement for the play, but it does not give the illusion and is not art. I am speaking, of course, of outdoor scenes; an interior can, if desirable, be very tolerably imitated, since the removal of the side-wall towards the audience, whatever it should do in theory, does not in practice appear to trouble anyone. But out-door scenes can hardly be dispensed with altogether, and how then are they to be treated? I do not, for one, want to go back, with the Elizabethan Stage Society, to the sign-post and the "This is Venice" inscribed upon it. This is only another, although certainly a less expensive, way of failing to produce the illusion. But now comes Mr. Craig, and with his austere back-cloths and his fine sense of colour, produces it in a manner which at first appears purely magical. But the mystery is really that of extreme simplicity. The effects are produced by the exclusion of all otiose detail. Broad masses of colour which really form a background to the figures instead of dwarfing them; a skilful distribution of light and shadow; an insistence on a few well-defined and important forms which sting the imagination and refrain from worrying the eyesight; such are the spells by which Mr. Craig woos you into believing him. It is impressionism instead of realism.

Nor is there less of insight into the subtle laws which relate vision to mood in the substitution of a measured and balanced rhythm of gesture for the chaotic bustle which is often so maddening on the realistic stage.

I do not suggest that the new method will be applied, or will be applicable, in its entirety, to every type of play alike. In the prose play of modern life, a modified realism will still rule. But this will learn to dispense with the outdoor scenes, in which realism goes bankrupt. And in romantic or poetical plays, realism will have no standing whatever. Especially must this be so when they are written in verse, for the verse-form itself is the most flagrant defiance of realism, and any attempt at other than a conventional or symbolical treatment of gesture and setting must result either (as is usually the case) in the destruction of the verse by a "natural" method of speaking it, or else in a flat incongruity. One incidental advantage of the new method will be that, as it costs infinitely less than that now in vogue, it will be possible for any theatre adopting it to have a much wider repertory and not to push the run of a single play long after the freshness of the presentation has worn off, in the hope of recouping itself for a vast expenditure of capital on the initial production.

I have said nothing yet of one most important element in Mr. Craig's break with stage tradition. And that is in the matter of lighting. He dispenses altogether with footlights, and gets what lighting he requires from above. In this particular point, of course, his advance is to a greater and not to a less realism, because nothing in nature is really lit from below. It would be interesting to know when and why footlights came into use. I have no time to look up the authorities just now; but the public stages of Shakespeare's day were certainly lighted from above. The performances were in the afternoon, by daylight, and as the well-known drawing of the Swan Theatre by Johan de Witt shows, the top of the house was open to the sky. Before giving an opinion as to the desirability of Mr. Craig's innovation, I should like to see him tackle a mid-day scene. The whole action of "Bethlehem" passes at night, and the effect of prevailing darkness was therefore probably intentional. But on general and a priori grounds top-lighting seems the natural and reasonable thing.

An Admirer of Hals.

I WAS looking at Frans Hals's "Laughing Cavalier" in the Wallace Collection, when a voice at my elbow said: "That's a wonderful thing, a wonderful thing, sir. The rollicking humour displayed in that face is—"

He failed to find the word, and I, after a brief glance of interrogation and surprise, bowed slightly and resumed my examination of the picture. I had gone to the Wallace Collection to look at pictures, not to listen to a stranger's chatter. But this garrulous man was persistent, really interested in pictures, and particularly in Frans Hals. He held me for half an hour.

"A great painter, sir, and he's becoming popular. How? Have you seen the 'Graphic' Christmas Number? The cover is a reproduction of the 'Laughing Cavalier.' That's popularity."

"He deserves to be popular," said I; then added after a pause, "You see that picture of Van Dyck as the Shepherd, Paris, hanging just above 'The Laughing Cavalier.' Perhaps it was placed there with intention. Anyhow it reminds me of an anecdote. Van Dyck once visited Hals' studio, and asked the Dutchman to paint him, but he did not disclose his name. Hals completed the head with amazing rapidity. 'That seems easy enough,' said the unknown; 'let me try!' When Hals saw his own portrait starting into life under those nimble fingers, he cried, 'You must be either Van Dyck or the Devil.'"

"There's no authority for that anecdote," said my companion.

"Then you know something about Hals?"

"Yes. I've just read Mr. Gerald Davies's book. It's a credit to him, and to Messrs. Bell the publishers. It's just the kind of book about a painter that an ordinary man like myself wants. There are no technicalities in it, no theories, but lots of enthusiasm, and views about Hals' work formed from personal observation, not drawn from books. The author is a master at Charterhouse, I think, and it's plain that Hals is his hobby. The volume contains some very fine reproductions of the best portraits and groups."

"You are not a painter, are you?"

"No, sir; I have no occupation. I retired from business five years ago. I was in commerce. Do I look like a painter?"

"My question was due to your admiration for Hals. He is called the painter's painter on account of his astonishing craftsmanship. It takes a painter, I am told, to appreciate the difficulties that he overcame so easily."

"Yes, I have heard that, and it's just those qualities that attract me as a business man. Hals painted a portrait in much the same way as a business man conceives and carries through a difficult operation. He knew just what he meant to do, and he did it, sir, straight and quick, without fumbling. He kept to the business in hand. He was a portrait painter, and he didn't want to be anything else. A business man like myself, sir, who always bears in mind that there's a difference between a pound and a guinea, wants a man's face and his clothes in a portrait, not his soul. He wants the man as he is, not what the painter thinks he ought to be. Nothing escaped Frans Hals' keen eyes. He painted what he saw, not what he dreamed, and because he painted what he saw, we extol him to-day. When a cavalier laughed, he painted him laughing; when a soldier stood erect and insolent with his hand on his sword, he painted him so; when a gypsy hussey came trapesing into his studio, he painted her as she was, laughing and—untidy. He never attempted what he could not carry through. Mr. Davies gives a list of things Hals did not paint. He never painted a religious subject, or a subject with a moral motive, and so on. I liked that part of the book. I copied it out into my notebook. But what he did attempt, and I'll say it, sir, before the whole world, couldn't be equalled by any other painter living or dead. Why, a good cutter could make a suit of clothes from the costumes in his portraits. As for his sitters themselves, they're so real that I want to hold out my hand and say, 'Glad to meet you.' Have you ever seen his portrait of himself and his wife, or his Dutch nobleman, or his 'Nurse and the Baby,' at Berlin? Have you ever been to Haarlem? Ah!

"From that visit to Haarlem which I made as a young man I date my appreciation of Hals. I was fortunate in having as my companion a young Swedish painter whose father was connected with the tulip business. But even without his advice I could hardly fail to have been impressed by the magnificent portrait groups that hang in that small chamber in the town hall at Haarlem. 'Infinite riches in a little room,' sir, was the remark that I made to my companion. There are a dozen pictures in that room and eight of them are masterpieces. I have lectured on those pictures, sir, at the Social Institute of my chapel, throwing them in turn upon the sheet. It adds to the interest, although the lantern can give no idea of their wonderful colour, the red sashes the men wear, and the splendid flag that a young ensign holds in one of them. I explain the meaning of the pictures to my audiences in this way. Suppose, I say, that the officers of a flourishing rifle corps in this neighbourhood wished to signalise the King's accession by having themselves painted in a group at a banquet. Carry your minds back to the year 1616 and onwards, and you have the idea of five of these great pictures at Haarlem. The officers of the Guild of Archers of St. George, or St. Adriaen, wanted portrait groups of themselves, so they called in Hals. A difficult task? I believe you! He had to group a dozen men round a table, make a fine picture out of it, and yet please every individual. He accomplished it, sir, by sheer force of genius. Each head has character, and apart from the faces you will go a long way before you see fruit and wine glasses, and lace ruffles, and plumed hats, and silk sleeves, and sword hilts so exactly like life. If you want to know how difficult it is, go round an exhibition of the Royal Academy. I did so four or five times last summer, saying to myself as I looked at the accessories in the various portraits 'Ah! that isn't how Hals would have done it.'

"What a man he was! Three of the pictures at Haarlem are quite different in subject and colour from the others. One of them was painted when he was eighty-four. Trouble had come upon him, and I have no doubt that it was more to his taste in those anxious years to paint the five old women, Regents of the Haarlem almshouse, than the archers or the cavaliers of his prime. Artists, sir, rave about that group of the five old women, and Mr. Davies says that even amongst the unforgettable portraits which Hals painted in his earlier days, he hardly knows one which stays with him more vividly than that of the prim old dame on the right. But I prefer him in those happier days when he painted his own portrait, a jolly, fat, jovial man with a twinkle in his eye, and that broad hand that I've always noticed the great artist has.

"It's strange to think, sir, that during the greater part of the eighteenth century, nobody thought or cared anything about Hals. His portraits, says Mr. Davies, fetched furniture prices—a good phrase that. Why, for years and years, these very Haarlem pictures were rolled up and piled with lumber in cellars. In 1786 a portrait of Hals changed hands for five shillings. 'The Laughing Cavalier,' which in 1865 fetched £2,040, was sold for £80 many years before. Hals himself was not paid much for his portraits, you may be sure. Very little is known about his life, and what is known cannot be called creditable. He was fond of his glass, and fonder of the companions he met at the alehouse than of intellectual society. Many of the stories are apocryphal, but there is no doubt that he was summoned for maltreating his wife, reprimanded, and dismissed on promising that he would give up dissolute company and reform. It's also clear enough that later in life he fell upon bad times. When he was 72 a baker issued a distress warrant against him, and his goods, including three mattresses and five pictures, were seized and sold. But that might happen to any man who does not conduct his life on business principles. Thinking it over, sir, I should say he was a Bohemian, fond of his glass, fond of jolly companions, but nobody will make me believe that a man who painted in the straight, sure, confident way that he painted, right up to the end, was a drunkard. Just look at that portrait of 'The Laughing Cavalier.' It's a wonderful thing, a wonderful thing, sir. The rollicking humour displayed in that face is—"

He found the word at last—"is wonderful, sir."

Science.

The New Alchemy.

"ALL minerals, as also all metals, are born of one Principium or beginning, to wit, of a vapour, which the superior stars do, as it were, extract from the element of the earth by a certain distillation of the Macrocosm or greater world, the influx of which upper astral heat, operates upon things below, by an aerial fiery property, infusing it in, spiritually and invisibly." Thus Basil Valentine in his "Triumphal Chariot of Antimony," a book much sought after in its day, which was supposed to contain, among other things, the secret by which all other metals could be transformed into gold. The sentence quoted gives a fairly typical statement of the theory which the alchemists had built up out of the débris of Alexandrian science. The Coptic monks, who were the first practisers of the art, had inherited almost in spite of themselves some shreds of the knowledge of chemical processes which the wisdom of the Ptolemies had caused to be brought about by their endowment of research and of patient experiment. But their national and professional ignorance had led the monkish alchemists to strangely pervert it. The Egyptian authors of some of the earliest alchemical MSS. found it necessary to explain to their Christian disciples that "serpent's blood" really meant the stone called hematite, "the seed of the Sun" white hellebore and the like, which is much as if a modern druggist should need to be told that "dragon's blood" does not presuppose the slaughter of a fabulous animal, and that "hart's tongue" does not denote any part of a four-footed beast, but is the name of a common fern. But such mistakes in detail were nothing compared with the misconceptions of the aim and method of science which their theological prepossessions led them to form. Being both by nature and training averse from the patient investigation and deduction which had already brought the Greek philosophers half-way on the road to truth, they substituted everywhere analogy for analysis, and lent to inanimate matter the volition and passions that they found swaying the minds of men. As there were seven planets—an assumption better founded than they knew—there must, it was argued, be seven metals corresponding to them. And as the soul of the Christian was, in theory at all events, struggling to free itself from the weight and oppression of his earthly desires, so six of these metals, lead, tin, iron, copper, mercury, and silver, were supposed to be anxious to lay aside the base matter with which they were mixed and to appear as the pure representatives of the sun or gold. Hence it was only necessary for the alchemist to help them to the accomplishment of their aspirations, and he would be doing a work not only pleasing to God, but profitable to himself. This was to be brought about by the study of Nature indeed, but by a method entirely different from that of their heathen predecessors. The mode adopted by the Creator at the creation of the world was that to be followed, and might be expected to reveal itself, not to experiment, but to prayer. Hence all alchemical operations began with prayer, and intuition was thought to be a surer way of arriving at Nature's secrets than the older method of trial and error. So the alchemists blundered on from one mistake to another, always jealously watched by the Church, who accused them, with some show of reason, of a leaning towards Oriental heresies, until the revival of learning and its political consequences freed science from its fetters. But at first, like a prisoner long bound, it could make little use of its freedom, and it was not until Lavoisier, the great chemist who perished in the French Revolution, formulated the truth that "nothing is created in the operations either of art or of nature," and that the united mass of all substances subjected to physical or chemical change in every case remains constant, that the modern science of chemistry can be said to have been born. Thereafter its progress was rapid. Our own countryman, John Dalton, in 1808, taking up the investigation of the atoms or indivisible quantities of substances—centuries before shadowed forth by Democritus of Abdera and his followers, showed that each of the elementary substances in Nature has its specific atomic weight, which is as characteristic of it as, and much more constant than any of, its physical properties or its external appearance. From that time, the study of chemistry was largely occupied with the investigation and determination of atomic weights, until none of the seventy-six so-called elements—from the gas hydrogen which is so light as to be reckoned as unity or the lowest in the scale to the rare metal uranium just two hundred and forty times as heavy as hydrogen—remained without its distinguishing weight. And now began the romance of modern chemistry. Comparing those weights of the atoms of the different elementary substances, it was seen that those whose atomic weights were fairly close to each other were also alike in their external appearance or other physical properties. Thus they can be divided into groups in which both their atomic weights and physical properties roughly correspond; and while, for instance, the halogens or salt-forming substances, chlorine, iodine, and bromine, form one group giving similar reactions and combining in something like the same proportions the triad of metals, iron, nickel, and cobalt, whose atomic weights are far greater, show a similar degree of correspondence among themselves. To this, which was in the main the discovery of the Russian chemist Mendeleeff, was added the further demonstration that the atomic weights of nearly all the elementary substances were exact multiples of the unity represented by hydrogen, and that in the few exceptions which seemed to controvert this generalization, there was ground for supposing error in the calculation of the atomic weight. It seems difficult to resist the further conclusion that all the so-called chemical elements are really compounds formed by the addition in regularly varying proportions of what may be collectively called "matter" to some substance (or substances) hitherto unknown.

The search for this unknown substance or "First Matter" is, therefore, that on which modern chemists are at present engaged, and it bears a singular though not an exact likeness to that of their predecessors, the alchemists. Were it successful, it does not follow that we should immediately know how to "make" gold; but we should at any rate know how gold is made, and this might prove to be a very considerable step towards the process of its manufacture. This might not be in itself desirable, but a greater power of synthesis or the artificial construction of elements would be an inestimable blessing to mankind, and would probably solve at one blow the problem of the costless production of light and power. What the prospects of success are it is somewhat difficult to say, as men of science do not always care to give to the public the results of their uncompleted investigations. But it may perhaps be said that a clue has been obtained in the fact that the "radio-activity" or power of emitting rays seems to increase in direct ratio with the atomic weight of substances, and this may yet be followed to a successful issue. But we may be quite sure that the methods of investigation now being followed by the new alchemists will be diametrically opposed to those of the old, that the induction coil will have replaced the formulas couched in meaningless gibberish, and the electroscope the magician's wand. So great a change has followed the abandonment by science of mystical for rational methods.

Poets: Made, not Born.

SIR,—The interesting article in the ACADEMY under the above heading suggests the questions, "What is inevitable poetry?" and "To whom of our modern poets are we to look for this note of inevitableness in their work?"

If we give the term its strict significance, we must surely mean that the poet whose poems have this characteristic sings because he must. If this definition holds good, Shelley is perhaps the only modern poet we have who belongs to this class. Like his own Skylark he felt the divine compulsion of song. The classics afford us, I think, the best examples of inevitable and evitable poetry. To the former class belong the Iliad and Odyssey. Who can imagine a mute, inglorious Homer? To the latter belongs all Virgil's work.

There would have been no Aeneid if the great Latin poet had not been a careful student of the work of his predecessors. And what about the Bucolics and Georgics, would they have been written if Theocritus and Hesiod had not dealt with the same themes?

Virgil is the type of all that great army of poets who are votaries of the muse of song because they have the power to express their thoughts in verse. He has imagination, insight, and like our own Tennyson he handles his instrument with exquisite skill. But his work is not inevitable because, like that of the great majority of poets, it is derivative.—Yours, &c., H. P. WRIGHT.

Southey's "Tour in the Netherlands."

SIR,—I observe in your issue of the 20th instant, that you state respecting Southey's "Tour in the Netherlands in the Autumn of 1815"—"The book was well worth reprinting."

May I inform you that Southey's original and unpublished manuscript of this "Journal" was submitted to me some months ago. As it obviously possessed a curious literary interest, I brought it to the notice of Mr. William Heinemann, who subsequently acquired all rights of publication.—Yours, &c., W. MORRIS COLLES.

OTHER LETTERS SUMMARIZED: Mr. Walter Stephens writes in reference to our recent paragraph concerning "Brown at Brighton" and "Paradise Lost." Mr. Stephens says that "a dramatic author has a serious as well as a humorous side." We do not doubt it. Our reference was entirely good-natured.—K. H. G. somewhat heroically suggests that the number of books published should be limited by law.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 171 (New Series).

Last week we offered a Prize of One Guinea for the best verses on the New Year. Fifty-three replies have been sent in. We award the prize to Mr. T. McEwen, Ardlin, Bloomfield, Belfast, for the following:—

LINES suggested by seeing a goat on the wayside.

I saw him standing on a mossy bank;
Though not a sheep he seemed one with the weather;
For he was gray and hoary, doubtless rank,
So I felt glad that he was on his tether.
His gaze "looked far back into other years"
When he was young and glad and likewise frisky;
His mournful eyes were filled with rheumy tears—
Had he been human you'd have whispered, "Whisky!"
"For thee, O Goat, another year," I mused,
"With dawn on Thursday; will it find thee grievous, Bewailing opportunities abused
In nineteen two, which hastens now to leave us?"
I looked at him in silence, he at me;
I could not ask the somewhat useless question.
Man knows regret, from grief goats may be free,
Since much of course depends on the digestion.

Other replies follow :—

As mothers, fondly hoping, will prepare
"The little stranger" yet unborn, to greet,
So we our fears and hopes must still declare,
So we our annual prophecy repeat.

The expectant yearly cradle shrouded lies :
The child—his form and features unrevealed,
Smiles as we guess the colour of his eyes—
Frowns as by self-made Fates his fate is sealed.

None knows the house where Clotho spins her web,
Nor where grim Lachesis the thread doth hold,
Nor, Atropos, thy secret dark and dread,
No, not omniscient Moore, nor Zadkiel bold.

Yet ours the future : paradox most true ;
As is the man his coming year shall be,
Thy best with thine own web and shuttle do—
And thou art master of thy destiny !

[T. C., Sussex.]

The old year dies to-night. One page more turned
In this ill-written transcript called my life.
Such a queer book! with syntax all awry
And phrases bungled. Scarce a hint of plot,
A gleam of purpose! Yet I write the book.
But there's the point—am I the author here,
Or just Amanuensis, not to blame
Save for the blots and faults i' the spelling?—Ah!
But how if there were times I listened ill
To the dictating voice, wrote carelessly,
And made God's story nonsense by my fault?
Well, here's a fresh page—clear for noble words
To range themselves in order as God wills.
Take pen! square elbows! we'll do better here.
It may be God shall whisper poetry.

[F. E. W., Tachbrook St., S.W.]

Another year! and how the years glide on,
With some so short and some—Ah! some so long,
When every year steals something from delight,
And on each little day descends the night.

And then, beyond the night, another day ;
And still, and still the sweet years fade away ;
And sweetest are the years that farthest lie ;
And dearest are the dreams that are gone by.

So many years, so many years, and yet
Throughout their length my heart is set, is set
On seeing just the sight I may not see—
Ah! that dear home, dear home that's not for me.

Another year! and wider grows the sea ;
And I am old—how young I used to be!
Hot flushed with hope that now is spent and cold!
New is the year, but I am old, am old.

Ah, year so soon to be!
Sacred, where only God Hath entered! Enter we Humbly, with feet unshod!

No dread it hath, no hate,
Shadow nor evil sign;
Maiden, immaculate,
And meet for things divine!

As through some temple vast
The gross, unhallowed crowd,
Betold us, thronging fast,
Unwed, indifferent, proud.

Ah, that this too should be,
With shame and evil done,
Darkened and ill to see,
Even as another one!

Competition No. 172 (New Series).

This week we offer a Prize of One Guinea for the best comment on any article, review, or paragraph appearing in this issue of the ACADEMY.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 7 January, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The names of the publishers of Prof. Knight's "Some Nineteenth Century Scotsmen," Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, was inadvertently omitted from this column in a recent issue.

From the Oxford University Press we may expect the "Martialis Epigrammata" edited by Prof. W. M. Lindsay. An expurgated edition for the use of schools will also be issued.

Progress is being made in Mr. C. Oman's "History of the Peninsular War," published by the same house. The history is to be in six volumes, the second of which will appear shortly. The third series of Dr. E. Moore's "Studies in Dante" is also to be looked for amongst the forthcoming books of the Oxford University Press.

The Literary Week.

MANY interesting books are announced for early publication, but the harvest of the past week has been meagre. We have received a round dozen volumes of verse, and several new text-books for school use. These we shall notice, according to custom, in our Educational Supplement next week. Among the volumes published since our last issue we note the following:—

THE DAWN OF DAY. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Translated by Johanna Volz.

The fourth volume in Mr. Unwin's edition of Nietzsche's Works. Upon the title page we read: "There is many a dawn which has not yet shed its light." The book is full of detached thoughts and speculations which yet have a certain coherence—the coherence supplied by a masterful personality. Here is an answer to the question: Who then is ever alone? "The faint-hearted does not know what it is to be alone, for some enemy or other is always lying in wait for him. Oh, for him who could tell us the history of that noble feeling which is called loneliness!" "The Dawn of Day" marks a distinct period in Nietzsche's development.

JEAN GOUJON. By Reginald Lister.

This handsome, well-illustrated volume is the first complete study of Goujon that has appeared in English. In the course of his introduction Mr. S. Arthur Strong says: "Goujon had the almost unique opportunity of creating an artistic type out of a living historical model; and, unlike the daubers who have succeeded in making the legend of Mary Queen of Scots a puzzle to posterity, he was worthy of the occasion." This sketch of the life and work of the sculptor "who excelled in the reproduction of feminine grace and distinction" is dedicated to the Queen.

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW IN IRELAND. By Stephen Gwynn.

A volume of Essays on Irish Subjects, containing a good deal of controversial matter. Mr. Gwynn says of the essays: "All of them deal directly with the influences material, intellectual, and spiritual which are to-day at work in Ireland . . ." Mr. Gwynn still believes in Home Rule. The essays deal with such subjects as "The Gaelic Revival in Literature," "Literature among the Illiterates," "The Irish Peasant," and "The Secret of Ireland." In the last-named article, referring to Father Sheehan's portraiture of the Irish priest, Mr. Gwynn says: "We cannot take without reserve [his] presentment of them; everyone in Ireland knows that there is another side to the picture. Nevertheless the type which he shows us comes infinitely nearer the truth of the things than Lever's sketches, for example; and, let the priests be good or bad, for the present they, if any class, are the keepers of the secret of Ireland."

WE announced some time ago that a Life of Lord Beaconsfield was being written by a man of letters who has made a life-long study of his fascinating subject. This Life, which is to be in two volumes, is already well advanced, and will certainly be published this year. In the meantime the much discussed question of Lord Rowton's silence on the subject has been revived by the "Morning Advertiser." That journal prints the passages from Lord Beaconsfield's will which bear upon documents and their custody, and draws the conclusion that it is clear that "Lord Beaconsfield did not intend the Life to appear for many years after his death," and that "the King's consent would have to be obtained before the correspondence with Queen Victoria could be published." In an admirable leader upon the subject the writer says:—

Twenty-four years have passed since Lord Beaconsfield set his name to this document, and twenty-one years since he died. In the absence of an authorised life, the loss of which we naturally deplore, the name of Benjamin Disraeli tends to become the centre of a myth rather than the label of an individuality. He lives—and possibly he may have desired to live—as a memory, as the expression of an idea. Was it the exquisite cunning of his statesmanship which framed a will so binding and so exacting as to make the revelation of his real self almost impossible, even twenty years after his death?

So far as the personal documents and correspondence in Lord Beaconsfield's possession at the time of his death are concerned, the discretion of publication is entirely in the hands of Lord Rowton; but we believe that in the case of many of them access has not been refused. At any rate there is ample material for a Life which shall hurt no susceptibilities and yet be reasonably full.

Mr. C. F. G. MASTERMAN contributes to the January "Bookman" an interesting appreciation of Mr. G. K. Chesterton. "It is as a poet," says Mr. Masterman, "that Mr. Chesterton will contribute to literature." That is true, but Mr. Chesterton is so much a poet even when he writes prose that the two mediums cannot be divorced; his outlook, indeed, is nearly always poetical, either when he writes of the grey world or of the splendid possibilities of romance. This summing up of Mr. Chesterton's attitude strikes us as just:—

His poetry and his prose thus exhibit one fixed attitude towards the universe. Like the old Dutch philosopher he is "Gott-getrunken"; like the modern mystic he is charging himself everywhere with contentment and triumph. He is ever astonished at "the towering and tropical vision of things as they really are; the great Odyssey of strange-coloured oceans and strange-shaped trees, of dust like the wreck of temples and thistledown like the ruin of stars." In the twentieth century God still walks in the garden in the cool of the day, and every bush is aflame with His presence. No scientific discovery can lessen the exultant wonder with which he regards the ever-recurring miracle of the sunrise or the birth of a little child. Being at all is for him the astonishing and delightful mystery. Existence itself, apart from definite pleasure or pain, is a source of infinite satisfaction. This it was at the creation that caused the morning stars to sing together and all the sons of God to shout for joy. Mr. Chesterton is the prophet of this primitive truth.

Mr. Masterman's article concludes thus:—

His great ambition is to follow the sedulous steps of Mr. Bernard Shaw; and the proudest moment of his life will be when he takes his seat, as representative of the free and independent burgesses, in the Battersea Borough Council.

We hope that Mr. Chesterton will have prouder moments in his life than can be evolved from the Battersea Borough Council.

THE Rev. Canon Beeching writes in the "National Review" on "The Poetry of Herrick." Canon Beeching is a critic who always has something to say, and he always says it well. In this article he combines appreciation and criticism of Herrick with criticism of Mr. Edmund Gosse's attitude towards Herrick. In the main our view agrees with Canon Beeching's. There is certainly no evidence to support Mr. Gosse's statement that Herrick was merely a "perfunctory" parson. As Canon Beeching says, what little evidence there is points the other way. Of Herrick as a poet, Canon Beeching writes:—

Let me now endeavour to enumerate a few of the qualities of Herrick's verse that must strike any competent reader. The first is his concreteness. He moves about in a world which is very real, and which he thoroughly realises. Even his flights of fancy do not take him far from home. His loves are all substantial ladies in heavy silks; his pastures are full of fat cattle; even the dew-drops on his flowers are full-bodied. In a certain degree this concreteness is a poetical virtue, being allied to simplicity; but in Herrick it is not relieved by any intellectual interest. A second noticeable feature is the skill with which this concrete world is represented. Every artist is always labouring to express what is in fact inexpressible; to convey, somewhat more adequately than his predecessors have succeeded in conveying it, the impression that things make upon him. And Herrick is an artist to the finger-tips; his poetry is full of experiments and successes.

THE vagaries of format are sometimes startling. We have received a publication called "The Appointed Time" the height of which is something more than twice its breadth. We have seldom seen anything so lavish of paper, so frugal of print. The thin volume appears to contain something in the nature of a religious allegory. Why should religious allegory need these adventitious aids?

THE summer number of the "Elf," as subscribers are somewhat naively informed, is "a little late." Mr. James Guthrie is responsible for this issue; some of the drawings are rather striking, though all are a good deal too black. The letterpress is, on the whole, poor, particularly the verse. We do not see why such a stanza as this should be given hand-made paper and beautiful type:—

Daisy stars of silver,
Buttercups of gold,
Teach us many lessons
New again, yet old.

But the "Elf," in material ways, is a piece of good book-making.

THERE has just been issued a new edition of Spurgeon's "John Ploughman's Pictures." This book and "John Ploughman's Talk" have together reached a total circulation of 600,000 copies. Spurgeon did not write literature, but to turn over these pages is to see just how he achieved, and rightly achieved, success. It sprang from a knowledge of human nature, perhaps not profound, but always acute, and a faculty of expression as direct as a blow.

A CORRESPONDENT of the "Author" suggests that publishers should provide means by which a book-buyer might see a volume which he feels disposed to buy before making a definite purchase. His idea is that books might be collected in some central shop, and a fee charged for examination. But we hardly think such a scheme would work. After all, the majority of serious book-buyers know perfectly well what they want. And do not certain publishers already undertake to send, on approval, through the nearest book-seller, any volume appearing in their catalogues?

A CORRESPONDENT of the "Brooklyn Eagle" has been complaining that certain English illustrated weeklies devote far too much space to interviews with authors. Why not engineers or artisans? he asks. The writer considers that in England we exploit the author in this way more than they do in America. We hope not, but still, as we have said again and again, we do it far too much. The reason for all this is, says the "Brooklyn Eagle's" correspondent, "that editors are literary men, and so they are fond of believing that the literary man is an important personage. He isn't." We sometimes sympathise with that point of view.

THE announcement that Mr. Sidney Colvin has at last decided to write a personal memoir of Stevenson is certainly interesting. Mr. Colvin will no doubt reply to Mr. Henley's article, and it is just as well that time has been allowed to soften what might otherwise have developed into an acrimonious controversy.

"If painters take pupils," says a writer in the New York "Bookman," "why should not novelists?" And he proceeds to plead for "ateliers of fiction." He thinks it would be agreeable to go to Mr. Howells' studio and be taught how to describe "a girl with arching brows, curving lips, and a flood of golden hair." And the writer appears to be serious; he really thinks the art of fiction can be taught. He says: "I believe that much good might accrue to literature if the masters would take pupils. The principles of novel writing certainly can be taught, such as the value of words, the proportion which description should bear to dialogue, characterisation, and above all, construction." "The value of words," however, is precisely what never can be taught, and the "proportion which description should bear to dialogue" is a matter only to be decided by the individual. But we see no prospect for "ateliers of Fiction." Even the crudest amateur would prefer to go his own way.

CONCERNING the new fiction departure in the "North American Review," we read in the "New York American" as follows:—

A novel is to be printed in the "North American Review." This is tradition undone. But the title of the novel is "The Ambassadors," and its author is Henry James. There is tradition regained. His work is made for the most delicate critical attention, for the most minute analysis. It is full of the finest and strongest ideas of life, art and poetry. In it are the most elevated human dreams. It is exceptional. It may be regarded in the "Review" against the hasty and accidental appreciation of the common-place. There the verbiage of the unlettered that trouble with their incompetence the discussion of works of art may not be provoked. Obscurity is the chief grievance that indifferent readers of Henry James have.

All of which is quite true, but we could wish it better expressed. "It is exceptional," standing as a lonely sentence, makes us shiver, and the last sentence is an example of how not to write.

REVIEWING the fiction of the year in the "New York American," Mr. Harry Thurston Peck takes no cheerful view of the future of the novel as the vehicle of ideas:—

Looking back upon the year that is now ending, its literary record is noticeable from the fact that no single novel has attained a phenomenal success. Many have reached sales which would once have been thought remarkable, yet which are so no longer. More novels are being written than ever, and probably more are being read; yet they do not attract the attention given to them a few years ago.

Why is this? I think it is because the novel is once more sinking to its normal place—the place it occupied before, with Dickens, it began to usurp a field which cannot be permanently its own. It will hereafter remain simply a source of pleasure and of amusement. It is not going any longer to be accepted as a means of preaching political, social and economic doctrines. It is bound to revert to what it was when Fielding wrote, when Richardson wrote, when Scott wrote—mere literature.

The nineteenth century saw the apotheosis of fiction. Fiction could then get a hearing when argument and persuasion in less attractive forms were utterly unheeded. Dickens used it to blot out the workhouses and the Yorkshire schools. Charles Reade reformed the lunacy laws of England by a single novel. Disraeli smoothed the way for political changes in his works of fiction. In this country, Mrs. Stowe perceptibly hastened an inevitable war by her one great book. Edward Bellamy in the pages of "Looking Backward" raised socialism from the slums and made it popular in the drawing room and the halls of the university. In France, Emile Zola attempted to demonstrate by works of pure imagination the solutions of all sorts of problems—ethical, physiological and psychological. Fiction to him was an exact science, an instrument of precision; and men listened to his claims with serious attention.

We have gone beyond this stage at last. The twentieth century will not be a century of novel-reading. Fiction has done its work. It has won a hearing for many causes. It has created or excited an intelligent interest in all sorts of problems and conditions. Yet it cannot solve these problems nor alter those conditions; and so it must give way to other forms of literature that bear directly on them both. So long as there are young men and women who love and marry, so long as the spirit which seeks adventure still exists, for just so long will novels and romances find eager readers. Yet the world, grown wiser, will go to life itself and to the records of life for serious instruction; and it will not accept the novelist as a teacher or a demonstrator.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" publishes this month an article on "The Coinage of Words," by Prof. Kittredge, of Harvard. Prof. Kittredge devotes most of his space to discussing new compounds and the possibilities of the suffix; only at the end does he touch upon the "boldest kind of word-coinage,—that in which the new term appears to be made by a single act of creative instinct, without regard to precedent." Prof. Kittredge continues:—

It is a difficult category to discuss; for the history of such terms is seldom ascertainable, and we are in danger of referring to this lawless group a number of well-behaved formations which sprang from some obscure or forgotten analogy. One theory, however, is certain. The words that we are here contemplating are the product of language-makers who stood in no awe of the dictionary.

Of such words Prof. Kittredge gives very few examples, the best being Lewis Carroll's "chortle." "It suggested," he says, "the gurgle of senile exultation." But words of that kind hardly come into the general question of word-coinage; they are "sports," and never come into really literary English.

MR. FITZMAURICE KELLY's recently published Taylorian Lecture, "Lope de Vega and the Spanish Drama" is an admirable piece of criticism and appreciation. The life of Lope was a series of downfalls and triumphs, of misery and splendour. He was forgiven by this world for his sins and his satires, and for "at least a quarter of a century he had such a succession of triumphs as no other man of letters has ever tasted." He could crack jokes at the expense of the Inquisition, to which he himself belonged, and remain unchastized. He became chaplain to the Congregation of St. Peter, and, says Mr. Kelly, "in this post as in all others, he played his part to perfection, edifying all beholders by his pious works, his exemplary life." Mr. Kelly continues:—

And from now till the last act, it is one unbroken crescendo of applause. Lope witnessed, so to say, his own apotheosis. He was one of the sights of Madrid. As he returned from the hospital, where he attended the sick and dying, men turned to look at him in the street; women and children clustered round him to kiss his hand, to crave his blessing. His daily walk was as a royal procession; his portrait hung on the walls of palaces and cabins. So contemporaries tell us, and so we love to picture him in his august old age—the living symbol of all the might, and pride, and glory of heroic Spain.

But, at the last, Nemesis appeared. The "retribution of his far-off sins" broke his heart. His son was drowned, his favourite daughter deserted him, and the end was in sight:—

Brooding sullenly upon his sorrows, he sank into alternations of lethargy and despair, redoubled his pious practices, lashed himself with his discipline till the walls of his room were bespattered with blood, and awaited the end with morose impatience. On August 23, 1635, he wrote his last poems—a sonnet, and El Siglo de oro—laid aside his pen, was chilled, and took to his bed. Four days later . . . he fell into the everlasting sleep.

This amazing man wrote plays which ran into hundreds; he himself put the total at 800. The seventeenth century produced no more amazing figure than Lope de Vega.

THE first two productions of the Stage Society's fourth season are to be Ibsen's "When We Dead Awaken" and "A Man of Honour," by Mr. Somerset Maugham. The society has under consideration four more plays: Tolstoi's "The Fruits of Enlightenment"; "Where There is Nothing," by Mr. W. B. Yeats; "The Two Mr. Wetherbys," by Mr. St. John Hankin; and Maeterlinck's "Aglavaine and Selysette."

BOOKS as wedding presents are not, we believe, very popular; at any rate they do not figure largely in the lists of gifts which we sometimes glance at in the newspapers. But amongst the many offerings showered upon Mr. Brodrick and his bride the other day were a certain number of books. The titles are not given in all cases. Here is the list:—

Viscount Goschen. Books.
Mr. Thomas Hardy. Books.
Mr. Henry Arthur Jones. Books.
Mr. Alfred Austin. Books.
Lord Carlisle. Books.
Mr. Macmillan. Books.
Mr. and Mrs. Asquith. Pepys' "Diary."
Lord and Lady Manners. Emerson's Works.
Mr. R. B. Haldane. Burke's Works.
The Speaker and Mrs. Gully. Charles Lamb's Works.

MR. GEORGE MOORE, we regret to hear, has had a serious bicycle accident. Owing to a "side-slip" he was flung on his right shoulder, which was badly injured. Mr. Moore had just finished correcting his new book, which takes rather a pessimistic view of things Irish. He is now embarking on a series of literary impressions.

Bibliographical.

It is impossible not to admire the pluck with which Mr. John Davidson, who is about to issue a new comedy, continues to woo the dramatic muse. He appears to have begun (so far as placing his work before the general public is concerned) in 1886 with "Bruce: a Drama," which he followed up in 1888 with "Smith: a Tragedy" (since called "a tragic farce"). "An Unhistorical Pastoral," "A Romantic Farce," and "Scaramouch in Naxos: a Pantomime," were published in 1889. The first two of these three books were issued in Glasgow, the other in Greenock. In the following year all five pieces appear to have been brought out in London by Mr. Fisher Unwin under the title of "Scaramouch in Naxos, and Other Plays." All five figured in 1894 in the volume entitled "Plays by John Davidson," which Messrs. Mathews and Lane published with a frontispiece by Aubrey Beardsley. In this book will be found a bibliographical note of some interest. Since then we have had from Mr. Davidson "Godfrida: a Play" (1898) and "Self's the Man: a Tragi-Comedy" (1901). It is one of the ironies of fate that Mr. Davidson should be known to the stage, not as an original dramatist, but as the translator (into verse) of Coppée's "Pour la Couronne" (1896), and the reviser of a translation of Rosmer's "König's Kinder."

The two English writers who have just been doing their best to make the American Mr. Edgar Saltus better known to English readers, seem not to be aware of the full extent to which Mr. Saltus's books have been put before our public. They refer to the issue by English publishers of five of Mr. Saltus's novels. As a matter of fact, at least twelve of his books have been, since 1886, in circulation (great or small) in this country. Here is a list of them: "The Anatomy of Negation," and "The Philosophy of Disenchantment" (Williams and Norgate, 1886); "Mr. Incul's Misadventure" (1887). "Eden: an Episode," and "A Transaction in Hearts" (Routledge, 1889); "The Truth about Tristrem Varick" (Routledge and Drane, 1889); "The Pace that Kills" (1889); "A Transient Guest" (1890). "Mary Magdalen" (1891), "Imperial Purple: an Analysis of the Cæsars" (1892), "Madame Sapphira" 1893, and "When Dreams Come True" (Transatlantic Publishing Company, 1895). I can well believe that most of the above works have had a very limited vogue in this country, and that they will be all the better for the advertisement which Messrs. Monkwood and Gamble—the English writers I refer to—have bestowed upon them.

Messrs. Treherne are credited with the intention of issuing a series of translations of Du Boisgobey's stories. Within the last decade or so, not much has been done in England in this direction. Versions of "The Golden Tress," "The Nameless Man," "The Severed Hand," came out in 1901; of "Cash on Delivery" in 1893, of "The Condemned Door" in 1892, and of "An Ocean Knight" in 1890. The most notable, however, of Du Boisgobey's revivals in this country was that which took place between the years 1885 and 1889. Messrs. Vizetelly and Messrs. Ward and Lock set the ball rolling in 1885; in 1886 they were joined by Messrs. J. and R. Maxwell, and Messrs. Routledge followed in 1887. It was, however, the first-named firm which made Du Boisgobey really popular at that period. In 1885 they published two of his tales (at half-a-crown), in 1886 seventeen more (at half-a-crown or sixpence), and in 1889 twenty more (at a shilling)—thirty-nine altogether, if my figures are accurate. Whether these are still in the market I do not know.

In December, 1901, Messrs. Chatto and Windus published a half-guinea edition of Reade's "Cloister and the Hearth," adorned by 100 illustrations from the pencil of Mr. Matt. B. Hewerdine. I understand that in their forthcoming edition of the story Mr. Hewerdine's drawings will be supplemented by a number of photographs, which will no doubt add considerably to the attractions of the volume. Reade would be a "prood mon" if he could see the position which his romance has taken in the hierarchy of fiction. Numerous have been the editions of it of late years. There was one, on fine paper, in 1900; another, in four volumes, in 1898 (a reproduction, apparently, of an edition in 1893); another in 1895; another, with an introduction by Sir Walter Besant, in 1894; another in 1882; another in 1881—and so forth. The two last-named years saw uniform editions of most of Reade's stories.

The list of the additions which are to be made to the "Temple Classics" this year has more than one feature of interest. Especially welcome will be the English version of the "Æneid" which we are to receive from Mr. Fairfax Taylor. Mr. Taylor published in 1867 a translation (in the Spenserian stanza) of the first two Books, and, apparently, he has now completed the Englishing of the whole. Apart from what he has done for Virgil, he is known as a translator in prose, his versions including Geffeken's "Church and State" (1877), "Russia before and after the War" (1880), and Count Vitzthum von Eckstaedt's "St. Petersburg and London" (1887).

Another attractive addition to the library will be a reprint of Thucydides' "History of the Peloponnesian War," as translated by Mr. Richard Crawley. Mr. Crawley published the first Book in 1866, and the whole work in 1874. He is best known to me as the author of "Horse and Foot, or Pilgrims to Parnassus" (1868), a satire (in rhymed couplets) in which there was much smartness and some sound sense. With his other volumes of verse I am not so well acquainted. They include "Venus and Psyche, and other Poems" (1871), "The Younger Brother," a five-act comedy (1878), and "Election Rhymes" (1880).

There can hardly be too many editions of "The Mabino-gion"; and there is no reason, therefore, why the work should not be added, as it will be added, I see, to the "Temple Classics" this year. Two editions came out last year, one of them very handy as well as neatly produced. Goldsmith's Essays, as edited by Mr. Austin Dobson, will be especially acceptable as completing the representation of Goldsmith's works in this library.

Philosophers and Sportsmen, All.

SOME NINETEENTH-CENTURY SCOTSMEN. By William Knight.
(Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier.)

ST. ANDREWS is in certain respects the most picturesque of our university towns. Undoubtedly it is greater than any other in Scotland. Aberdeen, though Marischal College is immortalized by Sir Walter Scott's kind regard for Dugal Dalgety, is modest in relation to St. Andrews; so are Edinburgh and Glasgow, which as seats of academic learning are, like London, Dundee, and Birmingham, too modern to have distinctive traditions. Even Oxford and Cambridge have reasons for holding St. Andrews in respect. They are not older, and the stir which they make in the world comes only by fits and starts. Oxford, when troubled about its soul in relation to the psychological problems of the ages, has a Movement; goes in detachments to Rome, because there the mystery of things is greater than ever, settled in its own insolubility; and has done with it. Not so St. Andrews. That little grey city by the sea is too old, too cosmopolitan, too much a favourite of nature, to be upset by any crisis of faith or of unbelief. Nature herself is the main influence in this restraint. At St. Andrews, the links being ideally perfect, golf has for centuries been as important as the occupations of the theologian and the philosophic thinker; the county of Fife is full of foxes, fox-hounds, salmon, trout, birds and beasts to shoot, together with eminent statesmen and men of letters from all parts of the United Kingdom. Thus St. Andrews is in a singular measure a home of catholic sensibilities. The sports to which men resident there are all devoted prevent their mental activities from becoming hysterical or dramatic; while their intellectual training renders them all expert with rod and gun, play-club, cleeck, iron, and putter, as well as after hounds. The two influences are continually at work. Mr. Knight, the Professor of Philosophy whose new book falls to be reviewed, never took a walk with any of his many eminent friends without having a metaphysical discussion; while it is manifest that these intellectual pastimes, and the more systematised works of which they were echoes or expansions, would have been impossible had not St. Andrews by its very nature provided open-air treatment for tuberculosis of the ego.

An examination of Mr. Knight's biographical sketch of any of his more eminent friends would justify this theory of St. Andrews. Take, for example, the sketch of Mr. Patrick Proctor Alexander. We read that "he looked the part of Mars as well as felt it, and the literature of battle and adventure was his favourite perusal all along." That was in the days of Purchase, and Mr. Alexander, though of high degree, had not command of means enough to enter the Army. After an unsuccessful endeavour in Glasgow to become a merchant, in a leisurely manner he retired to the pursuits of St. Andrews. Soon he, who might have been a great soldier, showed himself a supreme master of many peaceful arts. Having made most thoughtful men comply against their wills to the thought that they had no wills at all, Mr. John Stuart Mill suddenly found himself face to face with "Moral Causation," a work of such surprising ingenuity and power that he was quite unable to answer it. By and bye this achievement of Mr. Alexander was followed by "Mill and Carlyle," a book the great ability of which was acknowledged by Mr. Carlyle himself. Through all the seriousness of his prose writings, Mr. Alexander had a cunningly illuminating vein of banter, and Mr. Swinburne truthfully declared "Sauertig" to be "one of the few masterly satires in the English language." Besides being an unusually acute critic, Mr. Alexander was a poet. Here is one of his sonnets:—

Come to me now! O come, beniguest Sleep!
And fold me up as evening folds a flower,
From my vain self, and vain things which have power
Upon my soul, to make me smile or weep.
And when thou comest, O! like death be deep—
No dreamy boon have I of thee to crave,
More than may come to him that in his grave
Is heedless of the night-winds how they sweep.
I have not in me half that cause of sorrow
Which is in thousands who must not complain;
And yet this moment if it could be mine
To lapse and pass in sleep, and so resign
All that must yet be borne of joy and pain,
I scarcely know if I would wake to-morrow.

This suggestive music has a melancholy sound; but it would be a mistake to suppose that it came from a melancholy mind. Merely, to Mr. Alexander it was a placid duty to accomplish perfectly any task for which he was in the humour. Within a fortnight of his death he was fishing on Clatto Loch, and the same conquering, quiet concern which he had had in the "Secret of Hegel" he applied to the problem, If you are going to use three flies, should the heaviest be at the end of the cast, or should the lightest? He put the heaviest at the end, and filled his basket to the brim. In "A True Story for Children, by Grand-dad," Mr. Alexander inadvertently explained himself:—

We bless you, bless you, little babes!
We bless your coming hither;
Not happier your young lives to grow
Than our old age to wither.

We bless you, little Gus and Flo!
We bless your coming hither;
O! grow, and grow, and happier grow,
Whilst we as happy wither.

It would not be quite accurate to say that Mr. Patrick Proctor Alexander was a creator of beautiful images of sad thoughts and lyrical expressions of happy feelings. He was more than that. Like his magnificent frame, his mind, his nature, was in itself strength and beauty.

Another of Mr. Knight's "monumental men" was Charles Wordsworth, Bishop of St. Andrews, who was aglow with the genius of the place. His erudition was wide, profound, exact; and in his case also scholarship and intellectual talent were humanised and made virile by life-long interest in affairs of the open air. He played in the first cricket-match between Oxford and Cambridge, rowed in the first boat-race, and never lost his interest either in cricket or rowing. In "Annals of My Life" we find him, when nearly eighty years of age, eagerly discussing, with the young man who subsequently became his literary executor, the dynamics of figure-skating. He actually at that age longed for a frost in order that he might have a match with his young friend in cutting the Flying Mercury. In Mr. Knight's sketch of the Bishop there is a passage that will whet the interest with which Mr. John Morley's Life of Mr. Gladstone is awaited. "A career that had begun most brilliantly," we read in a contribution by Archdeacon Aglen to Mr. Knight's book, "was suddenly closed, as it seemed, by Wordsworth's acceptance of life and work in Scotland. What I mean is that he could not but expect, what everyone expected for him, that his friends—and especially Gladstone—would, after a time, recall him to England, and grant him a see there. The years went on, and the recall never came." These sentences hint at a strange episode in the career of Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Wordsworth had been Mr. Gladstone's tutor at Oxford. At Mr. Gladstone's urgently-expressed wish, he left Winchester, where he was headmaster, for Scotland, there to be Warden of Glenalmond, a college founded by Mr. Gladstone and the northern Tory nobles in the hope that a revival of Episcopacy might spring from it. In doing so Mr. Wordsworth sacrificed much. For conscience' sake he abandoned the prospect of preferment to a position of usefulness, probably the highest, in the Church of England; he deferred his engagement to marry; and he contributed all his worldly wealth, £8,000, to the funds of Glenalmond. Ere long the see of St. Andrews became vacant, and those in whose gift the appointment lay wished it to be filled by Mr. Wordsworth. As Glenalmond and St. Andrews are in the same diocese, he could have become Bishop while retaining the Wardenship, and life for him and for the lady alluded to would have become brighter and better. Mr. Gladstone, one of the trustees of Glenalmond, objected. He said that if Mr. Wordsworth became Bishop he must quit the Wardenship. He acknowledged that this stipulation was in requital of the inability which Mr. Wordsworth shared with many others to support his candidature for the representation of Oxford University unless he would give assurances to dispel fears that he was wavering in his allegiance to Church and State. Notwithstanding Mr. Gladstone's opposition, Mr. Wordsworth ultimately became Bishop. Among the papers left to the Editor of the "Annals," Mr. Earl Hodgson, there was a correspondence with Mr. Gladstone in which the episode was revealed. It was left by Mr. Gladstone's consent; but on the eve of publication of the volume containing it Mr. Gladstone asked Mr. Earl Hodgson to take it out, saying that he wished it kept for his own life. Out of deference to Mr. Norton Longman, the publisher, who supported Mr. Gladstone's wish, Mr. Earl Hodgson, having no longer the living authority of the Bishop, bereft his book of what would have been a surprising footnote to history. So the strange story goes.

A Royal House.

THE HOUSE OF SELEUCUS. By Edwyn Robert Bevan. 2 vols. (Arnold. 30s.)

IN his "Greek Life and Thought" Mr. Mahaffy traces the development of Hellenism from the death of Alexander the Great to the Roman conquest. For Mr. Mahaffy Hellenism commences with the death of Alexander as distinct from Hellenedon which ends with the life of Demosthenes. But nobody has more eloquently expressed the charm of Hellenism than has this author. "The Apollo Belvedere," he says, "the Laocoon, the Dying Gaul, and the Venus of Melos fortunately inspired modern artists and critics before they were discovered to belong to the so-called days of Greek decadence. But these and the great sarcophagus of Sidon show that the silver days of Greek art were more splendid than the gold of other nations."

For Mr. Bevan, Hellenism is simply the Greek spirit of civilization surviving amongst all manner of alien influences. His book is a history of a particular royal house, and not a general treatise upon post-Alexandrian eclecticism. He lays no stress upon the break which occurred with the Macedonian conquest of Greece, the abrupt closing for ever of the Golden Age. For him there is no irreparable divorce between the two periods. The Macedonians kept the torch burning until the Romans were able to take it up, only to lose it in the hour of their own decadence. The torch itself was to reappear, still strangely lit, after centuries of chaotic barbarism. Viewed from this standpoint, this remote period of history—seemingly so much more remote than the age of Pericles—has a close and definite bearing upon modern life. The chain has never been broken. Amid all the conflicts of private hatred and public ambition this abstraction of Greek culture never wholly loses its significance. The autonomy of the Greek cities was the common watch-word of rival despots, and the actual despotism which bound them to a great empire was sedulously masked.

The battle of Ipsus, by which the Asiatic empire of Antigonous was annihilated, is the first great "land-mark" from the time of Alexander's death. Seleucus took the place of Antigonous just as the latter had taken the place of Perdikkas. It is useless, here, even to outline the winding fortunes of this house from Seleucus to the apotheosis of the line, Antiochus III., the Great King. This unwise rival of Hannibal, repeating at Magnesia the audacity of Raphia, lost the Seleucia supremacy.

The Great King used to take the field every spring from habit, and the list of the Seleucia campaigns is simply endless. But after Magnesia there was an interval of peace. The conditions were precisely the same as those offered before the battle, but none the less the unquestioning grip of Rome was beginning to be felt in the East. The sympathies of the House of Seleucus were naturally anti-Roman, but Seleucus Philopator did no more than arouse suspicion. After his murder by Heliodorus, Antiochus IV. became king.

Mr. Bevan's portrait of this successor to the Syrian throne is one of the most vivid in a book which contains many vivid pictures. Here, for the first time, he shows us the applied Hellenism of Rome at work in the East. This "Bohemian" king who lied unerringly at the right moment is confronted with the staid Roman ambassador, Popilius:—

As soon as he saw the ambassadors approaching he greeted Popilius in a loud glad voice as to an old friend. But the Roman came on with a grim and stony irresponsiveness. He reached the king a little tablet which he carried in his hand, and curtly bade him first read that through. Antiochus looked at it; it was a formal resolution of the Senate that King Antiochus should be required to evacuate Egypt. Then there sprang to his lips one of those diplomatic phrases which came so readily to him, something as to laying the matter before his Friends. But the Roman was determined that he should not wriggle free. To the amazement of the courtiers, he drew with his walking-stick a circle in the sand all round the king: yes or no before he stepped out of it. . . . Antiochus collapsed.

Later on we find him "a swaddled figure" carried into the banquet-hall by mummers. "Suddenly, at the notes of the symphonia, it started from its wrappings and the king stood there, naked." Not long afterwards he appears as "The God Manifest," anticipating in his solemn buffoonery the antics of future Roman emperors. This parody of exhausted Hellenism is particularly important because of his contact with Jewish history, though Mr. Bevan points out that "it was not Antiochus who drew the first blood in Jerusalem." Terrible butcheries follow the quarrel of Antiochus with the Jews. Demetrius Soter, who was killed in battle in 150, is the last king worthy of the traditions of the royal house. Alexander Balus follows, and after him comes "The Cretan Tyranny." Then massacre follows massacre until, in the death of Antiochus Sidetes, the House of Seleucus receives its final stroke.

What tragic pictures stand out from the confusion of treachery and intrigue. Think of the capture of Achæus by the Cretan Bolis, at which, even in the moment of triumph, the Great King wept. Think of the escape of Mysta "among the huddled women" after Ancyra. What a picture is that of Danaë saving by a single glance her lover, Sophron, from the merciless purpose of Laodice. She scorns to answer the question of the infuriated queen, and is "led away to be hurled from a high place." Queens and courtesans, bound to each other by the common tie of fearless hatred, face death with wordless indifference. The dark secrets of the harem leak out. Children disappear. Drinking cups are examined as though already the terror of the Borgias had stolen into the world. And yet, beneath the surface of rage and rapine, the Macedonians stood for a central principle of life.

They were not as the East had been before they came to it, or as the East became when the stamp of Hellenism had become faded. They had accepted the theory of despotism, but in practice they followed the more popular traditions of Macedonian royalty. The freedom of the cities was incongruous to their accepted ideas of imperial rule, but it was against all their principles to crush out the Greek spirit of freedom. They had anticipated that admirable dictum of a modern historian: "Shoot men down if you must, but don't hurt their feelings." They were open to new ideas, and were by no means dead to that spirit of inquiry which was at the root of Hellenic civilization. Above all, they recognised the prestige of a something which was above and beyond the coercion of their phalanxes.

In the private lives of members of the royal house we see the same conflict between Eastern and Western ideas. Amidst the Asiatic sumptuousness of their apparel there survived something of the higher simplicity. Officially they were monogamous, but only officially. Their notions as to the prohibited degrees of marriage were abhorrent to Greek morality.

Mr. Bevan's interesting work throws light on a period of history notoriously neglected by the scholar as well as by the general reader. Historically, the importance of this period is very great. It not only connects the Old Testament with the New, but serves as a link between the civilization of Pericles and that of Virgil. Its importance for philosophy, for art, and for mathematics is unquestionable. And yet to most of us these centuries mean nothing whatever except the brief "after-bloom" of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus. This carefully written and critical book supplies an obvious want. It traces the survival of the spirit of civilization which we ourselves are in danger of bartering away for something quite alien. It traces the eternal survival of this spirit, moreover, in one of the kingdoms of Alexandria least favourable to its development. That, indeed, amongst all the upheavals, through all the sacrilege, the perjury, the infamy, remains the golden branch among the shadows,

Kings and realms that pass to rise no more.

John Smith.

FROM THE ABYSS. (R. Brimley Johnson.)

THERE is some danger that this tiny book, published anonymously, and skinking modestly between plain covers, may escape the commendation it deserves. It is really a reprint of light articles contributed by the author to "The Speaker" and "The Commonwealth." But they all concentrate on a single point. They are written by a man who has spent some years viewing the abyss of which he writes from—we should guess, a University settlement—and has come back to the higher ground somewhat discouraged. But they are written by a man of observation and reflection, a man who has learned the secret of cramming years of observation and reflection into the phrase that bites the memory. Whether his despairing conclusions be accepted or not—as we certainly do not accept them without reservation—his mordant sketches of life as it is lived by the majority of London men must not be neglected by any student of modern social life. For the point upon which these articles concentrate is John Smith. John Smith, the numbers of him, the houses of him, the silence of him, and the sadness of his lot:—

John Smith is a bricklayer's labourer paid by the hour, and earning, when in full work, some twenty-four shillings a week. He resides in a four-roomed cottage in Camberwell, in the midst of streets made up of some hundreds of exact replicas of his own abode, only distinguished from each other by varied grades of griminess and decay. The front room he lets to a lodger at three and sixpence a week; for the whole residence he pays ten and sixpence, his rent thus "standing" at seven shillings. The seventeen-and-six balance of his weekly income is devoted to the material and mental requirements of himself and his family. Mrs. John Smith is a harassed, tired-looking woman, who appears to live in a perpetual atmosphere of damp, steamy washing.

At an abnormal hour in the morning John Smith rises, drinks cold tea, and struggles for the tram which is to convey him to the place where he toils in a kind of somnambulant progress. Supper at home, a pipe and the public-house, round off the day. On Sunday he lies in bed till midday, when he "strolls into East Street, Walworth, up and down which he wanders, gazing disconsolately at the itinerant quacks, vendors of children's toys, and obscene publications." From one to three John Smith is hidden behind the swing doors. Then the event of the week, the Sunday dinner which Mrs. Smith has been preparing. A pipe, "Lloyd's News," and a stroll to Peckham Rye with the kids fill the day till it is time to look in at the "Blue Dragon." Terribly monotonous and depressing, you may say. Remember, too, that John Smith is to be multiplied by the half million or so of unskilled labourers in London, and spreads unceasingly.

In tropical forests a box suspended from a bough will in a few days be found filled with strange and gorgeous vegetable and insect life. Place a disused sentry-box upon any piece of waste ground in South or East London, and in a few hours it will be occupied by a man and his wife and family, inundated by applications from would-be lodgers.

But is John Smith miserable in his abyss? He gives little evidence of discontent with his lot. Some years ago the Social Settlement brought men and women who "bade stoical farewell to their friends and started for a place ten or twenty minutes distance by rail" in order to teach him the proper discontent. But John Smith in the mass remains stolid, and while he will stand a cinematograph he turns aside from lectures on "Our English Poets" to the perplexing of the settlements. He has the franchise—has had it for years. You would think if he were really discontented he would take the weapon that lies to his hand. John Smith is in the majority. But he does not use his power as the John Smiths of New Zealand have used theirs, to organize a State on the basis of the labourer. Not even religion with its promise of a better life, with more artistic surroundings, "all glass and gold, with God for its sun," lures him to efficient grumble at his situation. He does not go to church. He would as soon think of going to the opera on a gala night.

One may admit that looked at from above, John Smith's contentment is scarcely credible, and most reprehensible. He has no right to be happy in such sordid and monotonous conditions of life. But one must not look from above, but horizontally; and this is the mistake made by the author of these papers. He forgets that human happiness is a very relative matter, and that while we may deplore a preference for "Lloyd's News" over "Our English Poets" the fact remains that Smith knows which he prefers and gets it. East Street, Walworth, is not attractive to everybody; but in the proportion sum of life it is to Smith what Bond Street is to Lady Clara Vere de Vere and the Rue de la Paix to Mrs. Gorgius Midas. John Smith has his pleasures, his pals, his jokes, his cheap music-halls, his loves and enmities and his piano organs. We are unhappy not because he is unhappy, but because he can be happy as he is.

Spiritual Personality.

THESE letters have a peculiar and, coming at the present time, a very rare quality. Their spirituality is so fine, sustained, so ethereal almost that it is like a breath from another world, another people. Actual present life is regarded all through as from a great distance, and through the intervening space is only perceived in colours softened and attenuated as in a pastel. The brutality of existence never really penetrated Mrs. Russell Gurney's mind. She went through the world impervious to the greater mass of impressions to be obtained from it. The only things that really interested her were the things not seen, the growing of the soul, and the fuller expansion of the spirit-life after death. Her whole being was like a responsive chord to "inward" impressions, and the publication of these letters finds ample justification in their revelation of a personality—contrasted with the exorbitant egoism and passionate craving after material happiness of to-day—of an almost startling purity and peace. And curiously enough, the first picture of her is so aloof from modern manners as to be chill and almost displeasing in effect. The letter in which it occurs is by her mother, and refers to Emelia Gurney's marriage :—

On the day the same cheerful, solemn calm continued. She was alone until it was time to dress. When I went to her with breakfast she was in tears with the Bible in her hand, and said, "Let me read you the lesson for the day."

On the morning of her wedding one could decidedly wish for a more human and more personal utterance. But this disappointment wears off as page by page through all the vicissitudes of a long life an insight is gained into a temperament so rarified by spiritual brightness that all the grosser and more vacillating human elements seem even in this life to have fallen from her. There are other things, however, besides spiritual matters in these letters. Interesting comments upon well-known people abound in them, for the Gurneys mixed with distinguished men and women of every kind, both social and literary. The following brief definition of Mill by Carlyle is eminently characteristic of the latter, "Thin in body and thin in mind," and Mrs. Gurney reports a conversation with George Eliot, which gives very clearly the strain of harshness and narrowness which ran through the character of the great writer. The letters include several from General Gordon, chiefly upon religious matters, but the kind of outlook Mrs. Gurney had upon immortality is best comprised in a quotation she herself gives from Goethe, who "said he believed in the immortality of those who had souls enough to live."

Here and there in the book little stories of a lighter nature push their way through, as it were, as in the delightful tale of the poor woman and her child who in dire necessity prayed every night for bread. One day, however, they were given six loaves, whereupon the child exclaimed contentedly, "Now we shan't have to pray for six days, mother."

It is difficult to close any discussion of these letters without including one brief quotation bearing upon an incident following shortly upon Mr. Gurney's death. The whole woman seems summed up in the peculiar quality of the vision or illusion :—

Last night I prayed with great desire for some little token of a thought from his heart, even if I might not have any glimpse of himself. And before I went to sleep, as I believe, I opened my eyes to see if my little night-lamp was burning, and I saw a rich bouquet of wall-flowers in a kind of jug held near my face, so wonderfully real. I gazed, and as I gazed they slowly receded to just over the little lamp, and disappeared.

I said to myself, "Wall-flowers—what can it mean?" And an answer seemed to flash through me, "These grow for you out of the wall of separation."

"Our Fathers Have Told Us."

PICTURESQUE OLD HOUSES. By Allan Fea. (Bousfield. 10s. 6d. net.)

IT is a pity that Mr. Fea is no more than a recorder of facts. Curiously enough his choice of subject generally falls upon matter in which treatment should count for much. The last book of Mr. Fea's which we noticed was, we believe, "King Monmouth"; in that volume there was ample rough material, but no coherence, no reconstruction of the period, no sense of style. Perhaps the author's shortcomings are less noticeable in such a volume as the present, although we expect far more from "A Wanderer off the Beaten Track"—as Mr. Fea describes himself—than such jottings as we get here. Mr. Fea is quite conscious of the fact that the picturesque consists in association as much as in mere visual impression, but he can by no means convey the elusive quality of association. Hence this volume, which touches upon material intimately associated with romance, has hardly a hint of real romance in it. Such as there is we derive almost wholly from the illustrations, which are numerous, and on the whole well selected and well reproduced.

Yet any lover of the past of England cannot fail to be grateful to Mr. Fea for his industry and research. The research, indeed, does not go very far, but it is suggestive and may serve to send readers hunting after the minor things of history which count for so much in revivifying a period. The author has confined himself mainly to the Home Counties, and the book resolves itself into a practical itinerary. We are taken from village to village, and invited to consider the glory of what our forefathers built so well, with such a sense of stability and continuity. Such a house as Bolebrook, in Sussex, which, like so many other of its kind, has been reduced to a farmhouse, is full of serene beauty. When the author was there many of the rooms were disused, and as he stumbled up the great staircase at nightfall, he was "conscious of silent white spectres floating about." They were owls, those grave and wise inhabitants of so many places which the folly of man or the force of circumstance have left to the dignity of decay.

Certainly no main-road traveller has any idea of the fine domestic architecture which nestles in almost forgotten villages or hides itself in often coeval leafage. The old builders had a wonderful instinct for sites; often enough they were unhealthy, but they were nearly always beautiful. It might have been wiser to build upon the hill-top, but down in the valley there was warmth and shelter and the music of the stream. And the valley house, even to an age overwhelmed with sanitation, has the old appeal. He who dwells upon the hill-top looks down upon the twinkling valley-lights with some stirrings of envy, and perhaps, by way of compensation, takes a breath of his purer air. The idea of the builder of old time was to hide his dwelling, to make it, as it were, an absolute retreat. Concerning the ruinous house of Houghton Conquest, associated, it will be remembered, with Sidney and the Countess of Pembroke, a labourer said to Mr. Fea: "It's been an old ancient place in its time." That is one of the very few amusing sayings in a book wholly devoted to "old ancient places."

Other New Books.

RUSKIN ON PICTURES: A Collection of Criticisms by John Ruskin not heretofore Reprinted, and now Re-Edited and Re-arranged. Vol. II. (George Allen. 7s. 6d. net.)

A WEEK or two ago we noticed the first volume of this most welcome re-issue. The volume before us contains the "Academy Notes," issued in 1855, 1856, 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1875, and also "Notes on Samuel Prout and William Hunt," 1879-80. In 1854 Ruskin wrote: "I do not at all care for reputation in the matter. I must speak if I see people thinking what I know is wrong, and if there is any chance of my being listened to. I don't say I wouldn't care for reputation if I had it, but until people are ready to receive all I say about Art as 'unquestionable,' just as they receive what Faraday tells them about Chemistry, I don't consider myself to have any reputation at all worth caring about." There we hear the man of profound convictions and also the man who thinks the impossible possible. For Art cannot be written about as Science can be written about; Art is not a matter of fact so much as a matter of temperament, and concerning temperament no man can lay down laws or expect a unanimous following. Ruskin discovered this, and dropped the "Academy Notes" accordingly. As an appreciator and a prophet the world was delighted to listen to him, but as a critic the world in the main preferred its own judgments.

In looking through such a volume as this, one is struck by the fallibility even of the finest judgment. There are works by practically forgotten painters which receive almost unqualified praise, and others whose authors have outlived even Ruskin's censure. Yet it is inspiring writing, full of delicacy and beauty and that flashing humour which is so rare in such work.

This, concerning Prout, is most delightful and characteristic:—

And learn from your poor wandering painter this lesson—for sum of the best he had to give you (it is the Alpha of the laws of true human life)—that no city is prosperous in the sight of Heaven, unless the peasant sells in its market; adding this lesson of Gentile Bellini's for the Omega—that no city is ever righteous in the sight of Heaven, unless the noble walks in its street.

To read Ruskin, as we have said before and must say again, is to be impressed by the splendour of personality and the limits of individual vision.

THE EGREGIOUS ENGLISH. By Angus McNeill. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

THIS is a book no more to be taken seriously than "The Unspeakable Scot." It is full of generalities, flat witticism, flat humour, and clichés. What little practical criticism it contains is of the most obvious description, and hardly any chapter might not apply equally to any other nation. The author writes about the Englishman as soldier, sailor, parson, politician, journalist, and so forth, with a most uninspired and undiscriminating fluency. Take this from the chapter entitled "Chiffon":—

It pains me beyond measure to say it, but I think there can be no doubt that the accumulated experience and wisdom of mankind goes to show that at the bottom of most troubles there is a woman. Since Eve and the first débâcle, it has been woman all along the line.

We thought that that kind of writing was dead, or at any rate confined to the lowest forms of journalism. Yet here it is again, cropping up in a book which sets out to tell us where we fail and why we fail. We are told, of course, that the "chiefest of snobs" is the English military officer, that the Army is overrated, neglected, and half-starved, and that the Navy is in like case. We are also told that we drink too much, that we have no good fiction, no poets, no honest politicians, in fact nothing that is of any vital use. To impress these things upon us, two hundred pages are covered with good black print. We close the book with the feeling that if the author really has a sense of humour it has deserted him in the writing of this jumble of trivialities. "Angus McNeill" is a name we do not know, but he has evidently learned at the feet of Mr. Crosland; indeed, he writes like Mr. Crosland's double. But after all, the question of who wrote the book does not interest us.

NELSON AND HIS CAPTAINS. By Dr. W. H. Fitchett. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THIS popular author presents a spirited picture of Nelson and his times; he has not confined himself to telling merely of the deeds of Nelson's Captains, but has provided a character sketch of the great Admiral, and some details pertaining to his school and methods. Of Nelson himself the author writes in superlative terms, unless indeed he is comparing him inch for inch with one of his captains, in which case the vocabulary of affliction is exhausted in insistent reiteration of Nelson's physical disadvantages. He is described as one-armed, one-eyed, fretful, vehement, infatuated by the "obese" Lady Hamilton, fragile, under-sized, half-womanly, half-a-shrew.

But the story which the author has to tell is almost incredible in its directness of detail, but certainly fascinating in its charm, if limited in its scope. It is the story of the quarter decks of a hundred men-of-war, of a world bounded by the sea, peopled by men who are only seamen, and trafficking in business which is only war. Men who are middies learning the A B C of their profession one day, are in command of frigates the next, and thundering their broadsides into French and Spanish hulls. Were the men of those days harder than to-day, or was it the opportunity of prize-money, and war, and above all hatred of France which made the men what they were? The book is furnished with some capital portraits, and an index.

In "Scottish History and Life" (Maclehose) we have a volume the materials for which were mainly derived from the Historical Loan Collection in the Glasgow Exhibition of 1901. Various periods of the history of Scotland and certain aspects of Scottish life are adequately dealt with by different authors. The Jacobite risings in particular, by Mr. H. G. Graham, are admirably summarized. The volume is well printed and excellently illustrated.

The latest addition to Messrs. Newnes's "Library of Useful Stories" is "The Story of Our Army," by Captain Owen Wheeler. Captain Wheeler's narrative appears to be well-informed, but it lacks picturesqueness. Perhaps, however, that could hardly be looked for in what really amounts to a hand-book. A chapter upon South Africa is included. We need hardly add that a portrait of Earl Roberts forms the frontispiece, and that the little volume closes with a tribute to the Colonies.

NEW EDITIONS: The seventh volume in the "Edinburgh Edition" of Lockhart's "Life of Scott" takes us down to the writing of the Life of Napoleon. For frontispiece the volume has a photogravure of Faed's well-known "Sir Walter Scott and his Friends." The latest volumes of the novels in this beautiful edition contain "Woodstock."—From Messrs. Newnes there comes a delightful thin-paper edition of Pepys's "Diary." A not very satisfactory portrait of Pepys by Mr. E. J. Sullivan faces the title-page. These more or less imaginary portraits do not commend themselves to us. It would have been much better to have given us the most familiar contemporary portrait of the great gossip. The two concluding volumes of the "Chiswick Shakespeare" contain the "Poems" and "Sonnets." The whole series is now complete in thirty-nine volumes. Mr. Byam Shaw's illustrations have not always satisfied us, but on the whole he has done his difficult work with imagination and success. The first drawing in the "Poems" volume is quite admirable.

THE CITY OF CONFUSION. By C. B. Wood. (Sands.)

THE City of Confusion is, of course (since Newman used the phrase in his repudiation of the design attributed to him of returning to its fold), the Anglican Church. And Mr. Wood writes in the strain of one who himself, in a final exercise of the right of private judgment, has come out of it. He writes with something of the fervour of the convert and with something of the convert's contempt for that school of Anglicanism which, in external trappings at any rate, most nearly approaches to the Roman Catholic Church. There is something a little unmerciful about the way in which his curates are made to talk the slang of ritualism, and especially about the way in which in their intimate conversation they are allowed to betray the frailty of the confidence that, away from the altar and the confessional, they feel as to the validity of their position. Especially is this made to appear in their relations with women, which depend greatly upon an attitude of celibacy that does not as a rule exclude an arrière-pensée of contingent matrimony. This is brought out with some force in the case of the Vicar, who is a man of considerable power, but gangrened with doubt and passion. It comes out, that is, at the moment when he tells the girl who has betrothed herself to him for his work's sake that he must take refuge in the bosom of the Italian Aunt (a phrase we borrow from the ritualistic slang alluded to above). She was transported with admiration: for the sake of the true Church then he was about to sacrifice the woman he loved. When she came to understand that it was his modest purpose to remain a layman in his new communion, and to sacrifice his vocation for her, the bottom fell out of the affair. The Vicar therefore remained a staunch Anglican, and as pastor of a rich church in America espoused a young lady of Chicago. There are other love stories in the book, treated in a rather sentimental manner, the characters in which interest us but mildly. The book is interesting mainly as a presentment of a phase of religious sentiment that few people probably, outside the Society of the Holy Cross and the Protestant Alliance, take very seriously.

JESSIE VANDELEUR. By E. C. Mayne. (George Allen. 6s.)

THIS is a very elaborately and minutely written story, so elaborately written in fact that the original vitality of the plot seems to have been drained out in the effort to make original and strange phrases. Here and there in the book the carefully built sentences are successful, and result in the clear utterance of certain subtle and evasive thoughts and feelings. But, on the whole, the story has been killed by affectation of style, and by successful effort to avoid all simplicity of manner.

Jessie Vandeleur, the heroine, is a moral degenerate. Callous, insensitive, treacherous,—devoid of all moral and spiritual qualities, she pursues the quest of personal happiness with complete successfulness. Even when she steals the plot of her lover's book and tears up his manuscript, there is no retribution. His death leaves her remorseless, unmoved, if anything indeed relieved, and to the very last page the sinner remains uncastigated and triumphant. All this is as it should be, in that it is true to the temperament and to life. But the manner of it is wrong, and drags the whole climax down to the level of unconvincing invention. For when the exposure of her treachery is made to the new lover—and the circumstances of it were peculiarly ugly and unredempted—he is instantly “exultant and imperious.” To him it did not matter, and upon this unaccountable decision the book ends.

The writing shows cleverness, but the need of simplification is a colossal hindrance to any impression of reality.

Not even the heroine Jessie is for a moment alive or visual to the reader. Her personality lies smothered under the weight of elaborate mannerisms. The following example of dialogue is taken absolutely at haphazard:—

“Provided there's no one else.” She cast it red-hot from the forge of her appalling honesty.

He flinched before the clang; he even physically staggered.

“Who?” From white and thread-like lips it came at last. She shook her head in silence, and the silence lived for long. He took it by the throat and killed it.

To find the throat of silence would appear a little difficult; also the clang from the forge of honesty; but both the statements are less far-fetched than a multitude of others which go to form the somewhat reminiscent style of the writer.

BAYARD'S COURIER.

By B. K. BENSON.

THIS is a book of adventure dealing with the war for American Independence. It has special reference to the fortunes of one of “the lesser leaders,” Daniel Morgan. Of his hero Mr. Benson writes: “After he had been a wagoner, or perhaps before, or it may have been while he was a wagoner, he was distinguished for personal hardihood exemplified in the scientific use of those natural arms vulgarly called fists, and many are the tales handed down concerning the frequent employment of his redoubtable weapons.” School-boys will consider this, of itself, an enticing introduction to a stimulating tale of action. (Macmillan. 6s.)

AN OUTSIDER'S YEAR.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

IN this study of modern manners, the author begins with allusions to the uncertainty of horse-racing and applies her wisdom to the still more uncertain race-course of wedlock. Miss Warden needs no introduction to her readers; they are sure to follow the social troubles of that charming “outsider,” Miss Desborough, until the number goes up which proclaims her “Lady Basing” in the face of many foolish plungers. (Long. 6s.)

FUGITIVE ANNE.

By MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED.

BEGINS with an exciting chapter entitled “The Closed Cabin.” “‘She gone!’ ‘What do you mean?’ said the Captain, in the sharp tone of alarm which heralds calamity. ‘Can't you see?’ cried the husband, more infuriated than despair-stricken. ‘I've always told you that those window-ports are dangerous. It would be nothing for a thin man, let alone a girl, to creep through that one. Damn her! I was a fool to let her have a cabin to herself. She has gone overboard, and swum ashore.’” And then this story of the “unexplored bush” goes on to tell what happened to this passenger, who had deserted the “Leichardt” off the north-eastern shore of Australia. (John Long. 6s.)

THE VOICE OF THE WORLD.

By ARTHUR H. HOLMES.

A story of a woman who read, “Still is it possible that your circle is too narrow for your need,” and who went out of her husband's life to enlarge the circle. The development of both man and woman is cleverly indicated, and the tragedy which follows has an air of conviction and inevitability. At the end the man picks up his dog and says, “Tramp, you rascal, we're off to the inn! Then to the world, Tramp—the careless, joyous, suffering, pitiful world.” A thoughtful book. (Burleigh. 6s.)

Echoes.

It was the opinion of Matthew Arnold "that it is the business of criticism to know and make known the best that is known and thought in the world." This is a conception of criticism from the lips of one for whom it represented not this or that personal expression of good or ill will, but rather the final recognition of the beautiful and the true. For him poetry itself was a "criticism of life," and he would never have justified the regretful epitaph upon Sainte-Beuve—"suicidé en critique." Certainly it was the acceptance of the lower plane, but such acceptance did not involve a divorce from the higher motives of life.

Whether we accept the Aristotlean or the Platonic theory of poetry, there must be in all poetry at least an under-current of emotion. Nobody knew better than Horace—in spite of the damning lucidity of his "Ars Poetica"—that a hexameter did not depend solely upon quantities and cæsurae. Nobody knew better than Wordsworth—whatever may be the kinship of poetry and prose—that the "glory and the dream" are not to be won by any trick of rhyme or assonance. The poets stand alone. Theirs are the noblest messages delivered in the noblest moments. But it does not follow, for example, that the critic was antagonistic to the poet in Matthew Arnold. Both sought the truth and scorned the compromise which is the subtle beginning of falsehood. That is the bond of union. Let it be granted that the supreme criticism of life is given in the luminous moments of that ecstasy which is the divine excuse for poetry. Still, his is no ignoble privilege whose task it is to recognise and to win recognition for these luminous moments of others.

Well, this is referring the question of criticism and poetry to a tribunal which takes little heed of journalism and minor verse. Still, it is submitted that the humblest critic has a right to seek from the humblest poet his passport. Let him show his passport, that is all we ask. If the swift magic be in him, no verbiage of ours can stifle it. If the secret of wooing men from their weariness be really his, no sneer of ours can vulgarise its charm. But we of the crowd must have, indeed, "good warrant" that this is indeed the golden voice, and that no sinister smile is mocking us behind the persona of the god.

The golden voices are so exquisite and so rare that we are grateful even for their echoes if only the vibrations ring true. But the simulated emotion, the puffing and sprawling between strophies, the fuss and fret of syllables, surely all this but adds to the weariness which it pretends to assuage. You cannot infuse greatness into one mean thought by making it rhyme with another. You cannot force words to express the passion and the pain of life without having peered, were it but for an instant, into the abyss of the human heart. And if you have really seen in that instant, then, however falteringly you may stammer it out, your message will reach our hearts. But mere verbal flexibility, however adroit, will leave us cold as its own cadence.

There are some thirty new volumes of verse before us, published during the past four weeks. We search for the note of poetry. Is it in this?

Pregnant word!

Eloquent silence! To my gazing mind
The picture rises slow—a rustic maiden,
Fresh as the milk that bubbles in her pail;
Cheeks like the apples in her father's orchard;
Lips—oh, the poppies in the waving corn;
Eyes like the sky above, serene and empty;
Voice like the clatter of her wooden shoon;
And breath—heaven's breeze itself, blown through the hyre.

Is it in this well-meaning comment upon the lesson of Keats?

The outlines of a face!
This is not Beauty's grace,
Sleek flesh and soulless brow and waxen skin!
Blind, ignorant and rude,
That chose the gaunt and rude,
Mad fools, they sear "the eyes that are within."

Is it in this pallid reminiscence of Tennyson?

Here there dwelt
A widow with her children, one sweet child
Of seven years and one a prattling babe.

Is it in this?

A lowering bosom, mirror of the night,
By visionary piers encircled fast,
Save one strait neck that scorns their grasp, and right
Into the flowing firth escapes at last.

Does this suggest the voice of one who had, in imagination, once seen "Shelley plain"?

A maid with dreaming eyes, idealis'd soul
For Shelley's love, capable of divine;
A holy presence sanctified her whole,
And like her own spirit made all things shine.

Does this echo the haunting legend of Narcissus?

Stood he there for many an hour,
Till it came to pass,
Bending o'er the mirror stream
That he fell into a dream,
When he woke he was a flower,
Oh, alas!

Does the fire in the verses justify this extraordinary picture of Socrates in the evil hour of the hemlock?

"Kind friends," he said, "friends I have known so long,
Though I have jested with you in time past,
Though I have stung your pride with epithets
Not all forbearing,—still, when I am gone,
Say Socrates wrought always for the best
And for the wisest end . . . Give me the cup!
The truth is yours, God's universe is yours . . .
Good-by . . . good citizens . . . give me the cup . . ."

Other volumes there are among those before us of a pomposity equally truculent, but there are also some vibrations of poetry, true echoes of the luminous moments, with here and there an individual note.

Some of these "vibrations" are merely noisy echoes from obvious sources. Take this one from Tennyson:—

You'll twig me a coming along; you allus was wonderful sharp;
But I'd happen be passing you by, tricked out with your crown and your 'arp . . .

and so on.

Take this one from Mr. Henley:—

In this room the young men are dissecting,
Corpses lying naked on the tables,
Some untouched, and some past recognition.

All, however, are not like these.

In Mr. Alexander Anderson's "Lazarus at our Gate" (John Calder) there is much crude invective which need not have been expressed in verse. But in such lines as:—

Hence long ago thy rapture saw
The golden sights I ken this hour,—
Thou in a vale of bright Savoie,
And I upon a Northern Moor,

he seems to have caught that sincerity of conviction which was the redemption of Jean Jaques Rousseau, to whom they are addressed.

Sincere, too, are Mr. C. Phillipps Wooley's "Songs of an English Esau" (Smith, Elder), and one feels that this wanderer's blood raced in his veins to the rhythm of:—

When the hounds run mute and the best men ride,
And the wolf's life hangs on his speed,
There's never a man in the country side
Can live with that girl in the lead.

In Mr. George Leveson Gower's "Poems" (Heinemann) it is easy to detect a certain facility and artistic grace of expression, but in the mordant impression of "James Wilson" he has passed altogether beyond the prettiness of the magazines. Here are the last four lines:—

—Ah! I remember now—the prison and these the bands
To keep me fast till the morning when they open that narrow door,
And lead me away to my death,
Shall I never behold her more?

In Elizabeth Gibson's "The Burden of Love" (Elkin Mathews) one meets with flashes of genuine insight. Take, for example, these lines of imaginative surrender:—

I must be lost in thee:
Who should recall
The several drops of rain that singly fall
And in the ocean mingle? And from thy life's sea
Who shall draw me?

From Wilfrid Wilson Gibson's "The Queen's Vigil" (Elkin Mathews) we cull the following lines, which have in them something of the melody that haunts:—

The while I heard Death moving through the blast
With dry, cold rustling of deep-drifting snow,
And thought to look upon him and at last
The end of all my wandering to know;
But ever muffled close in cloudy robes he passed.

"The Sonnets of a Platonist" (Brimley Johnson) is the title of a volume of verse by Jesse Berridge. "This flame of Spiritual Love," says the author, "I set upon the altar of Ideal Beauty." It is a proud claim, the right to approach the altar of Ideal Beauty. How many have come near to it, seeking the impenetrable serenity of the absolute only to be mocked by the enigmatic smile of the implacable Eros! But the author of these sonnets has the right to approach. More than once in this little volume, in spite of morbidity, in spite of a hypersensitiveness to the sweetness of syllables, she utters the mysterious message of the soul. Her book is not a series of metrical exercises, it is a human document. This is not the appeal of a writer of magazine poetry:—

One there was, long since pass'd to unity
With his Ideal Beauty, who would feel
What my songs rather than express, conceal;
One fill'd with music, love and ecstasy,
Whose radiant tortur'd spirit Death set free
As the green waters swept that sinking keel
By sad LERICI; if I bent to kneel,
He would have bowed his face to hallow me!

"After the rhythm, to us, at any rate, with the German paste in our composition, so deeply unsatisfying, of—

Ah! que me dites-vous, et que vous dit mon âme?
Que dit le ciel à l'aube et la flamme à la flamme?

what a blessing to arrive at rhythms like—

Take, oh, take those lips away
That so sweetly were forsworn."

This verdict of Matthew Arnold is obviously inevitable, but its significance is by no means universal in the sense that it may be applied to all English and all French verse. A French humourist, if there be one cruel enough, might select many of the passages quoted above, and oppose them to selections from "La Lignée des Poètes Français au XIX^e siècle" (The Clarendon Press), edited by M. Charles Bonnier. The comparisons would be of course unfair, while that of the great English critic was just, but they would modify certain illusions in regard to French poetry, and at the same time might check the torrent of English verse. This charming anthology commences with Lamartine and ends with Verhaëren. M. Bonnier gives precedence (in space) to those schools of French poetry which are the despair of Count Tolstoi. The English reader for whom Lamartine means "Le Lac" and the poetry of Hugo "Le Chasseur Noir," will be disappointed, and he will probably be surprised—agreeably—by M. Bonnier's selection from Gautier.

Approaching, however, another volume of French poetry, "Les Rubaiyat D'Omar Kheyyam D'Edward FitzGerald," par Fernand Henry (Librairie Orientale et Américaine; Jean Maissonneuve, Éditeur), all our old prejudice in favour of "the German paste" revives. The author of "Les Sonnets de Shakespeare" gives us an admirable study of the Persian poet in prose and an elaborate translation of Fitzgerald in verse. But we cannot catch the mocking, haunting refrains in this clear, cold, reasonable French. There is that in Omar which, like the broodings of Amiel, finds French lucidity inadequate.

The metre is the Alexandrine "avec deux pieds de plus," but M. Henry has submitted to an additional fetter. He makes the first line of each verse rhyme with the third line in the preceding verse, as—

Je comprend que le vin, infidèle, m'ait pris
Mon Vêtement d'Honneur;—aussi suis-je surpris
Qu'un Marchand ose vendre une si rare chose:
Que peut-il acheter, après, d'un pareil prix?
Donc ce Printemps devra finir avec la Rose Et bientôt la Jeunesse aura sa page close!
—Et ce doux Rossignol, venu d'où, qui le sait?
Qui dira l'endroit où maintenant il se pose?

It is, technically, as admirable as it is difficult, but it is not FitzGerald. One feels the want in every verse. It is a want which the French language will probably never quite satisfy, and it would be the acme of unintelligent discourtesy to be anything but grateful to M. Henry for what he has actually given us, a faithful rendering of FitzGerald in a metre of surprising difficulty.

"Little Bayes."

"PORTER quarrels with potter," ran the Greek adage. And so does playwright with playwright. Yet such fallings-out are comparatively rare. They may be conscientious, too. Aristophanes counted himself a patriot for showing up the sophistry, as he thought it, of Euripides. To this belief of his we owe the first instance—unless an earlier can be found in the Chinese theatre—of scenic parody, of one dramatist making fun of another. It is a pity that in such cases the private affairs of the assailed are not immune, but earlier ages were less considerate than our own. Neither the parentage of Euripides nor the private life of "Mr. Bayes" escaped unkind comment. Otherwise, these writers had not much reason to complain. A dramatist is not sacrosanct, he must expect occasional rebuke, while the stall and the critic who occupies it are modern innovations. In earlier times the censure, if there was any, originated with the author's brother-playwrights. Here was a means of wholesome criticism, and in the main it was not abused. Shakespeare himself was not above having a fling at his rivals. Everyone knows that the dramatists of the day gave him a cool reception when he came among them, but after the production of "King Henry IV" the laugh was on the other side. Pistol's queer jargon has puzzled many a reader of the plain text. Did human being ever talk such fustian, either in the reign of Henry of Lancaster or in any other age? Surely not; but the key is not far to seek. His language is such as Shakespeare's predecessors put into the mouths of their characters, and Pistol is the scourge which he invented for their chastisement. The bombast of Peele, Greene, and, on occasion, of Marlowe, is undeniable. And yet the very word gives us pause, when we remember that Dryden said of Shakespeare himself, "his serious swelling degenerates into bombast." This from Dryden! Verily "use every man after his deserts and who should 'scape whipping?"

Of the several English attempts to administer a whipping to offending dramatists, none is more interesting than "The Rehearsal." "The Critic" is more commonly known, because it still is occasionally staged, in such a manner, unhappily, as "to make the judicious grieve," and can readily be picked up at any bookseller's. But as much could not be said until lately of "The Rehearsal." Now, thanks to Prof. Arber, Buckingham's play is accessible to all, for he has included it in his "English Reprints" ("The Rehearsal." Constable. 1902) at the nominal price of one shilling. Admirers of "The Critic" may now read for themselves the play which is its prototype, illustrated by the wide and sound learning of Prof. Arber.

"The Rehearsal" fairly bristles with interest and with debatable matter. Most people have a vague idea that it was written by the second Duke of Buckingham in ridicule of Dryden. But this is only a partial expression of the truth. The famous Villiers was something of a playwright, as we know: it could hardly be otherwise with "a man so various": but he was not the sole author of "The Rehearsal." Others had a hand in it, Sprat, the biographer of Cowley, and Samuel Butler. So many cooks did not indeed spoil the broth, but they kept it simmering an unconscionable time. D'Avenant, too, was the author originally chosen for castigation, but he died in 1669, and "The Rehearsal" was not produced until 1671. Meantime Dryden had succeeded to the laurel, and the name of the fictitious dramatist was changed from Bilboa to Bayes. When the play was acted, it was obvious that Dryden was caricatured, and the name of "Bayes" stuck to him for good. His dress, manner, and habitual expressions were minutely copied. Buckingham took special pains to teach Lacy, the actor, to imitate the poet's way of speaking. Yet even so, some of the externals of D'Avenant were allowed to remain. Thus, when Bayes falls upon the stage and "breaks his nose," he reappears with a piece of brown paper on the damaged member. Now, we learn that D'Avenant "wore a patch on's nose," and that the brown paper was a reminder of it. It is not recorded that the audience protested against this incongruity.

If Dryden was hurt he refrained from crying out, and ten years passed before he took a dignified revenge on Buckingham. The two men showed an admirable temper in their disputes. "The Character of Zimri," wrote Dryden years afterwards, when speaking of "Absalom and Achitophel," "is, in my opinion, worth the whole poem: 'tis not bloody, but 'tis ridiculous enough. And he for whom it was intended was too witty to resent it as an injury. It succeeded as I wish'd: the jest went round, and he was laugh'd at in his turn who began the Frolick." Here, too, is an instance of Dryden's attitude to "The Rehearsal": the lines are taken from an epilogue which he wrote in 1678:—

For our poor wretch he neither rails nor prays,
Nor likes your wit just as you like his plays;
He has not yet so much of Mr. Bayes.

As for Buckingham, he was more concerned with plays than playwrights. He had wit enough to despise the so-called "Heroic" drama, with its extravagant rant and its frenzied passions, of which Dryden was the hierophant. Prof. Arber shows by a table of illustrations that besides Dryden's style, passages from the plays of D'Avenant, Fanshawe, the Howards, Stapylton and others are parodied in "The Rehearsal." Naturally, however, Dryden gets the lion's share of the hard knocks. "But why two Kings of the same place?" Mr. Bayes is asked. "Why?" answers he. "Because it's new; and that's it I aim at. I despise your Johnson and Beaumont, that borrow'd all they writ from Nature: I am for fetching it purely out of my own fancie, I." And again, to the objection that the plot stands still, "Plot stand still!" says he, "why, what a Devil is the Plot good for, but to bring in fine things?" Indeed, the plot of Mr. Bayes' imaginary drama loses itself in the sands of incoherency. As the Epilogue says:—

The Play it at an end, but where's the Plot?
That circumstance our Poet Bayes forgot,
And we can boast, though 'tis a plotting Age,
No place is freer from it than the Stage.

If, however, plot was weak in the heroic drama, isolated passages of a certain sombre beauty reward the investigator of a branch of our literature which is practically forgotten. But there is a superfluity of rhetoric and quibbling. Here is a passage from "The Rehearsal" in which these faults are fairly imaged. Prince Pretty-man is the speaker:—

Bring in my Father, why d'ye keep him from me?
Although a Fisherman he is my Father.
Was ever Son yet brought to this distress,
To be, for being a Son, made fatherless?
Oh, you just Gods, rob me not of a Father.
The being of a Son take from me rather.

The "heroic" drama is as dead as King Pandion. It is not for his plays that Dryden is remembered: and so the modern reader of "The Rehearsal" is not so much concerned with its mock-heroics—excellent as they are—as with the glimpse which he gets, or thinks he gets, of "Glorious John Dryden."

It is recorded that Dryden's talk lacked fluency and clearness. He was not very conversable, according to Pope. We may gather from "The Rehearsal," by their repeated occurrence, what some of his favourite expressions were. Bayes is put in a position in which, if in any, the unvarnished utterances of the natural man may be confidently expected. He takes a couple of acquaintances to see his new play rehearsed, and has to put up with their interruptions and sarcasms, as well as with the shortcomings of the players. In such a situation, what dramatist could be an actor? Not Mr. Bayes, at any rate. He frets and fumes, storms at the players, swallows the remarks of his companions with that "down look" of his, and finally, when both onlookers and actors sneak away before the rehearsal is finished, he leaves the theatre with this explosion of rage:—

How! are the Players gone to Dinner! 'Tis impossible!
I gad, if they are, I'll make 'em know what it is to injure a person that does 'em the honour to write for 'em, and all that. A company of proud, conceited, humorous, cross-grain'd persons, and all that. I gad, I'll make 'em the most contemptible, despicable, inconsiderable persons, and all that, in the whole world for this trick. I gad, I'll be reveng'd on 'em; I'll sell this play to the other House.

And here is one more passage, in which, by the way, is a specimen of that want of cohesion which is said to have characterised Dryden's talk:—

Let a man write never so well, there are nowadays a sort of persons they call critiques, that, I gad, have no more wit in them than so many Hobby-horses: but they'll laugh you, Sir, and find fault, and censure things that, A gad, I'm sure they are not able to do themselves. A sort of envious persons, that emulate the glories of men of parts, and think to build their fame by calumniating of persons, that, I gad, to my knowledge, of all persons in the world are, in nature, the persons that do as much despise all that, as—a—in fine, I'll say no more of 'em.

There is nothing more delightful in the "Rehearsal" than Bayes himself: no, not even the two Kings of Brentford, hand-in-hand and smelling at one nosegay.

Impressions.

XIV.—The Cajoler.

HE stood out in the snow in the early morning powdered with flakes, ankle-deep, smiling, not beckoning. The mountain tops were hidden. We sighed, knowing there would be no expedition that day, and watched him constructing a snow man for the edification of the children. Having completed it, he smiled again, and waved an adieu.

That night the snow ceased, and morning brought several degrees of frost. Before nine o'clock he was standing out on the crisp snow with his skis and iron pointed pole balanced on his shoulder. This time he smiled and beckoned, pointing to his skis, and nodding his head. Then he strapped the two nine-foot strips of bright wood to his feet, and thrusting the point of the pole into the snow, propelled himself a few yards, and waved his hand towards the hills. We understood the pantomime, and accepted the invitation. Each member of the party sought for his skis and pole, and joining the cajoler our little party silently began the ascent. In single file, we climbed, dragging the skis after us by a piece of cord passed through a hole in their tapering curved points. "I show you something soon," the cajoler cried. "Good sport? O yes!"

We walked for two hours. Then he stopped, and bade us fasten the instruments of pleasure to our feet. Below us dipped a steep snowfield two miles or more in length with an upward turn at the end, which ended in a tiny village with a large hotel hiding in the fir trees. "I go first," he said; "you come after, like me." He bent his knees, threw the weight of his body on the pole, started, glided swifter, swifter, and then flashed down the hill, like an arrow from a bow. Breathlessly we followed that black automaton rushing over the white snow, faster, faster: then he stopped. We saw him at the end of the run, just outside the village, waving his pole, and beckoning.

I followed. The air rushed by me. I shouted with exultation. Then, for no apparent reason, the point of my left ski turned diagonally towards its brother, caught in it, and I plunged headlong into the snow. Laboriously I extricated myself, dug out one nine feet of bright wood, then another, re-arranged my legs, and in the instant that the points faced the village, I was once more rushing through the air. Again I fell. Why pursue this narrative of failure? When much later in the morning, I reached the end of the run, and looked back, the white mountain side was dotted with my tumbling companions.

The cajoler released my feet from the skis and dried my face, while I emptied the snow from my pockets. He was exultant. "The sport is good!" he exclaimed. "The English like the sport! They are hot-blooded! Ah! that is my case! I am hot-blooded, too!"

I smiled, and dripped.

Drama.

Actor-Manager-Playwright.

"Do you love the play?" said Thackeray once to a friend. "Ye-es," said the friend, "I like a good play." "Oh, get out," was the reply. "I said, the play. You don't even understand what I mean." I am quite of Thackeray's mind. However bad the play may be, I find a certain exhilaration and a sense of adventure in the mere atmosphere of a theatre, which make it one of the chief attractions of the city life, a real set-off against the intimacies with earth and the friendly airs of the lost country. It is not a feeling which quite lends itself to analysis. Is it the reaction of the blood against a forgotten and ancestral Puritanism? Or is it an effect of one of those obscure laws governing the behaviour of the human soul in close local relation to other individuals of its species, that "psychology of the crowd" of which M. Tarde writes so well? Whatever the origin of the instinct, it alone could, for me, make tolerable an evening spent with "The Christian King, or Alfred of Engle-land," the last of many successful plays produced by Mr. Wilson Barrett at the Adelphi. I cannot quite rid myself of the idea that Mr. Barrett ought to have been a popular preacher, and not an actor at all; and the play, as may be imagined, appeals but little to those who look either for psychological subtlety or for literary elegance upon the stage. So determined, indeed, is Mr. Barrett to keep both psychology and literature out of the piece, that he has written it himself. I expect he was quite right. He probably knows better than anyone else precisely what an Adelphi audience wants, and what, even more emphatically, it does not want. And he has gone the right way about to ensure that, positively and negatively, it shall be gratified. The issues of the play are quite simple and explicit. Here is Alfred, Champion of England, and representative of our common humanity, subject to temptation, but certain ultimately to triumph over it. On the one side of him stands his blonde Saxon bride, Elswitha of Mercia, innocent and trusting and full of all the proper sentiments, alike as maiden and as wife; on the other, the black-haired Lilith, Princess Zebuda, who, after a constantly foiled career as a wanton and a spy, is finally led by her love for Alfred to display the soul of goodness in things evil, and to make a noble and picturesque, if somewhat improbable, end. The minor elements appropriate to the convention are sown by Mr. Wilson Barrett with a liberal hand. Those immortal legends of our childhood, the visit of Alfred in the disguise of a minstrel to the Danish camp, and the episode of the burnt cakes and the wrathful housewife, are neatly woven into the plot. There is a good deal of patriotic shouting and clashing of weapons, leading up to two big tableaux, one of a land-fight, the other of a sea-fight, in which all the canons of Lessing are set at naught, and the flesh-and-blood actors are ingeniously re-inforced by life-like figures cut out of cardboard. There are armour and paintings and hangings, some of them quite decorative, in the best traditions of Anglo-Saxon art. There is comic relief provided by the churls, one of whom is exactly the late Prof. Freeman's man with a mouth that meets like the two halves of a muffin (only, if I remember right, he was a Norman), and who are by no means without some touches of genuine humour. There are the inevitable side-lights upon burning questions of the day. The patriots declare that "Engle-land" must keep two ships upon the seas for every one that her enemies can launch, although how, in the absence of the indefatigable journalists of the Navy League, an accurate estimate of the numbers of a Viking fleet is to be arrived at, is not quite clear. A deputation of pagans comes before Alfred with the very reasonable request that they may be allowed to worship their own gods in their own way; to which Alfred replies that they are asking that liberty may degenerate into license, the kind of remark with which Dr. Clifford appears to expect that Mr. Balfour and Lord Hugh Cecil will meet the Nonconformist demand for undenominational education. Finally there is a stuffed hawk upon a lady's wrist, together with a live pigeon which flies across the stage, and two equally live and admirably trained hounds. "Dear creatures!" murmured a fair spectator in the stalls, who indeed seemed to take the whole performance in a very proper spirit throughout, drawing in her breath with a sharp hiss when Lilith-Zebuda stabbed herself, and applauding vehemently at the Navy League sentiments and the rout of the Nonconformists. From which I infer that, as I said before, Mr. Wilson Barrett knows very well indeed what an Adelphi audience wants. Meanwhile the scoffer had to extract what amusement he could from a sunset which faded rapidly into dawn, and from a Saxon bishop who wore in the streets the stole which he had always fondly regarded as a mass-vestment.

A piece which fails of its dramatic appeal to the intellect and the emotions often affords an excellent opportunity for the study of that minor histrionic art which, in a real artistic success, falls naturally into its place in the background. So it is at the Adelphi. Mr. Wilson Barrett himself, indeed, is a little too much of the bull of Bashan for my private taste. But I was very much interested by the performance of Miss Lillah McCarthy, who played the temptress part, and threw herself into it with great spirit and an admirable sense of just what the melodramatic convention demanded. It was, for obvious reasons, not a study from nature, but one could not desire a better realisation of the arch-type of the she-villain laid up in the Platonic heaven of the idea. I shall hope some day to see Miss McCarthy in a rôle more worthy of her genuine talent. In conclusion, one cannot help being struck by the extraordinary failure of Alfred, throughout the ages, to establish himself in the imagination of that national literature of which, quite properly, he ranks historically as one of the founders. Arthur, the typical hero of the defeated Celts, has had his praises sung by generation after generation. Alfred, the typical hero of the conquering Teutons, has done little more than provide inspiration for the nursery legends already alluded to, and, in these latter days, for Mr. Wilson Barrett's "The Christian King" and Mr. Alfred Austin's "England's Darling."

A Painter of Mountains.

THE snow-plough has been struggling to make a track up the mountain road, but the attempt has failed. Not till spring will the heights be accessible. Long before the flowers come, alas! the wonder of this white world through which the fir trees start will have become to me a memory. The sun shines, the snow sparkles. It is as warm as a May day in England, but no May day in England can feast the eye as do these changing lights of the day on slopes and heights of snow. Living for awhile among these mountains, roaming their solitudes, I am reminded again and again of Giovanni Segantini, to whom the snow was second mother, who lived among the mountains, and who painted them as no man had ever painted them before.

He died a few years ago, and yet to-day I could have said I saw him. Perhaps it was only a group of wood-cutters; but that last scene of the winter of 1899 was in my mind, and the one group of black figures toiling up the snowfield recalled the other. The story of that last journey up the mountain is well authenticated. Segantini carried with him the large Triptych that was to be his last picture. It was to represent Life, Nature, and Death, symbolical of the progression of the seasons in the mountains—their spring loveliness, their brief matured beauty, and their long winter sleep. This Triptych was apparently finished, but not to Segantini's satisfaction. He desired to add a few final touches to it, and those touches could only be given on the heights where it was painted. So the Triptych was packed in a wooden case, shouldered by peasants, and one day, in the autumn of 1899, the procession started for the shepherd's hut high up on the mountain. There Segantini was taken ill. A messenger hastened down to the valley for help, but the painter was beyond human succour. There in that shepherd's hut in the mountains he died; he, and his picture, were carried down into the valley, and in the little cemetery of Maloja he was buried.

His name is hardly known to the English public, although stray pictures by him have found their way to London. None can look at his "Ploughing in the Engadine," or his "Spring in the Alps" without feeling that his was a new personality—strong, individual, and uninfluenced by any school. He saw the peasant with Millet's sympathy, but stopped short of that suggestion of picturesque sentiment that made Millet less great than he might have been; his figures have the strength of Bastien Lepage, but with an added beauty in the backgrounds where the little Engadine villages peep above the snow, and the mountain tops shine out for a little while rose-pink at sunset. He hated towns; he lived, as a painter should live, expressing, as well as he could, the beauty of the world on those heights where, in his eyes, the purest beauty of the world was to be found, and in the midst of that beauty he set the hard lives of the peasants who snatch a lean living from the soil.

Perhaps it is well for his fame that Segantini died at 41. To my thinking he was at his best when he was painting what he saw and loved, when he was entirely himself, just a painter; before his receptive mind had heard the echo from the towns of the grave problems of life, making him feel the impulsion to teach, not to interpret. It so happened that an example of this latter phase, "The Unnatural Mothers," exhibited at the New Gallery a few years ago, was the first picture by Segantini I ever saw. The painting of the stunted trees springing from the great snowfield shows no falling off in his skill or vision, but the figures of these wretched women bound by their hair to the trees, writhing in an agony of remorse, are merely unpleasant. Their suffering is too obvious. The moral is not subtle enough. And the same criticism applies to another of his pedagogic pictures, "The Punishment of Luxury," more beautifully painted snow, and more distracted shades of unhappy women. I prefer to think of Segantini as the painter of, say, "Knitting," a girl sitting on the grass against a white fence, two sheep standing placidly beside her, and beyond the white walls of an Engadine village, and the hills.

It was at the last Paris Exhibition that the name of Segantini began to be known outside the narrow confines of the art world. In that mighty collection of canvases it was difficult to bring away a vivid impression of any particular man's work, but in the weeks that followed the closing of the exhibition three or four times was the question addressed to me: "Did you see the Segantinis?" Another chance of becoming acquainted with him was offered by the magnificent art volume on his life and work, published in the autumn of 1901; and only a few days ago, picking up "The Critic" of New York, I found a long appreciative article by Mr. Christian Brinton on Segantini.

It is not often that a painter's life gives such simple but uncommon material to the biographer. It ended, as we know, dramatically: it also began dramatically. One stormy night two Milanese peasants hurrying homewards found a boy crouched at the foot of a tree by the roadside. He had run away from home, and was trudging to France. The peasants lifted him into their cart, carried him to their cottage, and after the manner of their kind adopted him, sending him out to tend the swine on the hillside. It was a rare opportunity for the development of the boy's artistic talent, alone all day with nature, watching the animals and the skies, and noting the variability of the light on meadow and stream. The desire to express what he saw took hold of him, and the peasants began to wonder at the life-like representations of sheep, barns, and figures they found traced with charcoal on flat stones and walls.

Later he went to Milan, and such art training as he had was obtained from attending the evening school of ornament at the Brera, and from a course of elementary figure drawing at the Academia. Probably no modern painter derived less from teachers than Segantini. He raged against the art masters, and was disgusted with such art of the day as he had seen. When asked what he would do if he were as great an artist as his master, he replied, "Hang myself!"

Such a temperament must necessarily work out the fulfilment of its destiny in solitude. That Segantini did. In 1882, having married the sister of a fellow artist, he went back to his mountain heights, shepherds and herds-men, to paint those pictures whose note is the vibrancy of the light that shines from them. Things which were only disclosed to the wise after long years of experiment and effort, were revealed almost at the beginning of his career to this clear-eyed man, in whom the child never died. Let me quote Mr. Brinton:—

"Though knowing nothing of divisionism, he had instinctively placed pure touches of colour side by side on the canvas without first mixing them on the palette, thus allowing the separate tones to recombine on the retina. He had no scientific theories on the subject; he merely found that by so doing he could secure better effects. This was before the vogue of Monet and impressionism or pointillism, and the boy had come independently by a discovery second only in painting to the employment of perspective."

His own portrait, which he painted in 1896, might form a companion to Albrecht Dürer's. A wide-browed man, with deep eyes, a profusion of dark hair and beard, gazing sternly out upon the world. Behind is a night sky, and the dark peaks of mountains.

Life and Death.

NOTHING was clearer, under old-fashioned ideas of the universe, than the distinction between living and dead, or, as Goldsmith would have put it, between animate and inanimate Nature. On the one side of the division were things that grew and moved—animals as they were called par excellence, to which were added, as a sort of concession, plants; on the other, things which did not, that is to say, metals, rocks, stones and other minerals. Between these two categories the dichotomy was complete, and it was held that by no possibility could the inanimate become animated. This was the more extraordinary because the chasm was sometimes jumped from the other side, and living was sometimes seen to pass into dead matter without disintegration of structure, as, for instance, in the case of timber. But that animated could have any attributes in common with inanimate Nature would have seemed to our grandfathers a heresy of the wildest kind. The "breath of life" had been breathed into living Nature in the beginning, and a guess that it might possibly have been brought by an aerolite from some other planet was the only speculation they permitted themselves as to whence the same breath could have come. For the rest, living was living, and dead was dead, and there was an end of the matter.

The closer investigation of Nature which the theory of evolution has made incumbent on us has, however, shaken this neat and comprehensible creed into cracks. It can no longer be said that dead matter possesses none of the attributes of living, for it is now seen that they have much in common. Take a mineral in solution, such as saltpetre or common salt, and it will, under proper conditions, transform itself into crystals which will always assume a shape determined beforehand and quite as distinctive of the particular mineral as the distinctive characteristics of, for instance, oxen or sheep. And these crystals can be made to grow. Suspend a crystal of saltpetre in a solution of the same salt and it will gradually increase in size without losing in the smallest degree the regular polyhedral figure which is characteristic of the crystals of saltpetre. So it is certain that if we could once hit upon the method of liquefying that stubborn mineral, carbon, we could manufacture diamonds as big as our own heads. Movement, too, though in a very spasmodic and rudimentary form may be said to be manifested by some of the most apparently inanimate objects. For do not metals under the influence of heat, cold, and magnetism, expand and contract as regularly as the simpler animal organisms in response to a suitable stimulus? And certain forms of activity which have hitherto been supposed to be mental rather than physical in their nature are now seen to be shared by some of the higher minerals. Memory, which was at one time thought to be exclusively an animal function, now appears to be shared by metals, which also suffer from fatigue and recover from it by rest as regularly as do men and beasts. And now Prof. Bosc, of Calcutta, has shown by his work on "Response in the Living and Non-Living," that metals like animals and plants are not only responsive to electrical stimulus, in the same manner as living matter, but they can also, like it, be rendered temporarily or permanently irresponsive to it in such a way that they may be said to be "killed." The wonder is complete when it is said that the same method, i.e., the use of anaesthetics or poisons, is effective in either case.

We see, then, that many of our ideas with regard to the nature of life require revision. Growth and movement can no longer be taken as its touchstone, for they are potentially the attributes of much so-called inanimate matter. Prof. Bosc would have us believe that the only certain way of distinguishing between living and dead matter consists in the response of the former to electrical stimulus. But this, in spite of his very interesting and suggestive study, is hardly yet demonstrated, and will probably require the solution of the great problem, What is electricity? before it is generally accepted. A more likely guess at first sight seems to be that life really resides in the power of the cells, of which all the organisms of the animal and vegetable kingdoms consist, to reproduce themselves by segmentation. But then we have the experiments of Dr. Ledue, of Nantes, which show—as has been before mentioned here—that a solution of ferrocyanide of potassium will, when applied to gelatine, sometimes lead to the formation of cells as regular as those of living tissue, and apparently only wanting the addition of some stimulus hitherto unascertained to develop into a regular organism. Perhaps the only theory that remains unshaken by these discoveries is that of Dr. Lionel Beale and other of the older school of biologists, which is, that there exists somewhere in Nature a structureless living matter or bioplasm which enters into the composition of living, but not of dead, organisms. Yet this view, which seems to depend on faith rather than sight, assumes the existence of "a psychical factor, a factor which no physical research whatever can disclose or identify or get the remotest glimpse of," and must thus be resolutely excluded from the category of things knowable. Grave doubt as to its alleged metaphysical origin is also cast upon it by Dr. Reale's own conclusion that bioplasm is never to be found except in association with water. An extra-material attribute, which nevertheless always appears in association with one of the most widely-distributed form of matter, is not antecedently very probable.

Meanwhile what is to be said as to the kindred phenomena of death? Here, again, it used to be said that death, so far as matter was concerned, took place once for all, and that the separation between living and dead was complete. But now this is seen to be only partly true. Living matter really seems to exist only by the perpetual death and transformation of its parts, and of the different cells of which our own bodies, for instance, are composed; it is certain that millions die every day and even every second. But the cells which so die are replaced by others apparently containing within them a stronger though no more permanent principle of life, and this goes so far that in some cases the regeneration or reproduction of a dead structure may actually take place. Thus some animals, such as lizards, have the power of changing an old tail for a new one, or even of throwing out a new limb in exchange for one that has been lopped off, and the process is represented in ourselves by the renewal of our skin, hair, and nails. It is, of course, true that severe injury to any of the great organs—the brain, heart, or respiratory process—will eventually bring about the death of the whole structure, but whether this means anything more than the result of friction remains to be seen. That the heart of a frog will itself beat automatically and respond to stimulus has long been known, and a Russian doctor has lately shown by similar experiments that the same may be said of the hearts of the higher animals and even of man when placed directly after removal in certain saline solutions. Yet this affords no clue to the inquiry "What is Death?" and there is no visible reason at present why some process by which the process of decay which seems the inseparable attribute of all living matter should not be indefinitely arrested if suitable means were discovered. Such are some of the problems surrounding the phenomena of life and death, and it can no longer be said, as was once boasted by those who were initiated into Eleusinian mysteries, that "we know the end of life; we know also the divine beginning."

Scenic Realism.

SIR,—Mr. Chambers's views concerning the mounting of plays are in the main perfectly sound. He might, indeed, have gone further. If he had said that elaborate, costly, and unconvincing "settings" were responsible for much of the poor stuff staged every year, hardly any man of judgment would have opposed him. But in one point it strikes me that Mr. Chambers goes wrong. He says: " . . . an interior can, if desirable, be very tolerably imitated, since the removal of the side-wall towards the audience, whatever it should do in theory, does not in practice appear to trouble anyone." But why should it trouble anyone? The thing is perfectly natural. A person in a room is conscious only of three walls: he does not see the wall at his back. So that in this respect what appears to be a stage convention is quite natural from the point of view of the audience. If it is wrong at all it is from the actor's point of view.—Yours, &c.,

Bibliographical.

SIR,—Will you allow us to correct a strange mistake into which the writer of Bibliographical Notes in your last issue has fallen? Speaking of a proposed new edition of Epictetus, he says: "Messrs. Bell published in this country (in 1891) an American translation of the 'Discourses, Encheiridion, and Fragments,' brought out on 'the other side' in 1890."

As a matter of fact, we published our edition of Epictetus—translated by Mr. George Long—in 1877; and it is rather hard that we should be accused of reprinting an American edition which was itself nothing but an unauthorised reprint of our own publication. Our edition of 1891 was only one of numerous reprints of what remains the only complete translation of Epictetus in English.—Yours, &c.,

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 172 (New Series).

Last week we offered a Prize of One Guinea for the best comment on any article, review, or paragraph appearing in the current number of the ACADEMY. Twenty-five replies have been received. We award the prize to Mr. R. A. Scott James, Toyne Hall, Commercial Street, E., for the following:—

SCENIC REALISM.

A sketch entitled "Art—An Admirer of Hals," forms an appropriate criticism of an article by Mr. E. K. Chambers. Mr. Chambers, in criticising the technique of the stage manager, points out the difference between the impressionism illustrated in the setting of "Bethlehem" and the realism displayed in the staging of the ordinary play. But he is inclined, like most critics, to pass over that other determining factor in the creation of illusion—the mental atmosphere of the spectators. Considerable light is thrown on this point by a remark of the "Admirer of Hals" (a character probably suggested by Stevenson's "John Keats, Sir"), "A business man like myself, sir, who always bears in mind that there's a difference between a pound and a guinea, wants a man's face and his clothes in a portrait, not his soul." There lies the difficulty in the modern theatre. Shakespeare and the greater dramatists presented, not face and clothes, but soul; whereas the spectators do not care much about soul so long as they can get faces and clothes. Hence the stage manager is confronted with an insoluble problem: how to satisfy an audience which, while it pretends to like Shakespeare, in reality wants something which does not exist in Shakespeare. The result is a production intermediate between a play and a circus, and which is neither the one nor the other. But in Mr. Housman's play the problem was rather different. The auditorium was full of wise, sophisticated people; every canon of good taste demanded that, whether they liked the play or not, they should at least pretend to like it; from which evidence we may conclude that the hypocrisies of fashion are the opportunities of the manager. For nowadays the true actors are to be found, not on the stage, but in the stalls; and none would doubt that the illusion is complete.

Other replies follow:—

"THE OUTER AND THE INNER EYE."

Rare, indeed, to-day is the "inner eye"—rare to extinction. Bradshaw and Whitaker are literature; the Army and Navy price-list an epic poem. "30,000 Facts for a Shilling!"—'tis verily of the age. Your modern man likes life drawn with a T square; for him the moon is never more than the "secondary planet" that his dictionary names it. "Absolute Reason" is enthroned. We compute the eternal and tape-measure the infinite. In an unhappy hour Carlyle cried, "Feed me on facts," and the world has ravened for the food ever since, without, however, possessing Carlyle's power of assimilation. "It takes a soul to make a body"—man cannot live by facts alone. We catalogue the universe, and think that we advance; we count the stars and cackle of progress; we boast of our knowledge of ophthalmology, and all the time we are suffering from optic atrophy. We see too much, and are, consequently, blind. Did we occasionally close our eyes, it were better for our souls. Preferable to see men "as trees walking" than merely as units for the census enumerator to total up. [B. H., Brixton.]

THE NEW ALCHEMY.

"Time hath, my lord, a wallet on his back Wherein he puts alms for oblivion."

But how if the despised alms be the wealth of the present, and the tatters of the garment of the past be the very warp or woof of the robe of the future? Something like this has happened in the science of chemistry, and the grand old alchemists of long ago must look down from their homes beyond the spheres and the Primum Mobile and smile to see their dream become the sober reality of modern scientists. It is not strange that all the science of our day tends to revert to the ideas of the past—it is only another proof that the men of old time were not the helpless babes, or the outer barbarians of the Dark Ages that we suppose. We are always being shown that our ancestors had more knowledge than we give them credit for, and we are never convinced: so now, when science turns, as did Albertus Magnus, and Paracelsus, to finding the "first matter" of all so-called elements, we say "there is a difference." "we shall not know how to make gold, but we shall at any rate know how gold is made." In fact, we shall be alchemists in all but name and externals, but we shall save our self-esteem and our consciousness of our own superiority, by calling ourselves chemists and analysts. And our mediæval ancestors will laugh, if they have any sense of humour left! And so the whirligig of time brings in his revenges.

ART.—AN ADMIRER OF HALS.

Problem: how to arouse in the men of the street a keen, intelligent interest in art. Criticism and reviews, in all other departments of life and thought, can sow the first fructifying seed; but art criticism, even from a Ruskin, is for us only a worly weariness. In your articles signed "C. L. H." there have been several experiments in the employment of a fictional method of presentation: a novelising of art criticism, which seems to me a brilliant success, and a solution of the difficulty as original as it is charming. The critic meets at the gallery some more or less apocryphal person, slightly sketches his personality, and makes that new-found friend of ours chatter about the pictures. The result is a readable article which pleasurably stamps an impression upon us—the uneducated, but not indifferent—which reveals through the medium of an expansive grocer, that art is, after all, not a matter of tones, values, middle distances, chiaroscuro, pedantry and shop-tricks, but that it is related to life and to us. To us, and to life, and to our life—let us have more expansive grocers.

[J. B., Eltham Village.]

THE OUTER AND THE INNER EYE.

This article is like "an apple of gold in a network of silver." It is as good words set to a sweet tune. It speaks to the highest part of our human nature in a kindly human way. Why, then, does the apple turn to dust in our mouth, and that sweet song sound so sad? Because God is left out. The man with the inner eye without true religion is weaker than he who sees only with the outer eye. A greater imaginative vision exists at the cost of a smaller practical strength of character. In justice it must be so.

The most beautiful plants need most support. The man with the inner eye becomes hysterical and extravagant in his expression of that vision, because in his weakness his emotion overbalances his judgment. He becomes intoxicated with the vision of the beautiful, and cannot live our plain unglided life. It frets his soul that beauty fades, friends change, monarchs expire, and dynasties crumble to their original dust. God changes not, and he gives that inner vision—which is really an imaginative entrance into the great heart of humanity—to practical-minded, matter-of-fact, everyday men as well as to the poets, and lets them also see rapturous visions of the everlastingly beautiful that grows not old, nor fades away. And the simplicity of God's service is as the simplicity of a little child.

Competition No. 173 (New Series).

In a recent volume entitled "House Mottoes and Inscriptions" we find the following; the lines appear over the door of a school-master's house in Yorkshire:—

Time is thou hast; see that thou well employ.
Time past is gone; thou canst not that employ.
Time future is not, and may never be;
Time present is the only time for thee.

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best four-line original motto in verse suitable to be inscribed on a house once occupied by a deceased, or now occupied by a living, author.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 14 January, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

Mr. Henry James has written a story entitled "The Ambassadors," and the first part of it will appear in the January "North American Review," with an introduction by Mr. W. D. Howells.

Mr. Frederic Myers's posthumous work dealing with "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death," is now in the press. Messrs. Longman are the publishers.

Miss Alice Gardner, lecturer and associate of Newnham College, Cambridge, and sister of Prof. Percy Gardner, has collected into volume form some essays on religious and ethical questions which were originally written by her for Newnham students. The volume will bear the title of "The Conflict of Duties," and will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin on Monday.

A new work on Buddhism, by Rev. St. Clair Tisdall, entitled "The Noble Eightfold Path," is about to be published by Mr. Elliot Stock. The author's purpose is to present Buddhism at its best without taking an unduly favourable view or unfairly depreciating the system.

The Proprietor of "The Academy" purchased "Literature" from the Proprietors of "The Times" in 1902, and amalgamated the two papers under the title of

The Literary Week.

AN Educational Supplement is included in the present issue, in which we notice a number of school and text-books that have been issued since the autumn of last year. Among the new volumes in general literature published during the week we note the following:—

PROBLEMS IN ASTROPHYSICS. By Agnes M. Clerke.

Miss Agnes Clerke's "History of Astronomy" was a survey of the past. "Problems in Astrophysics" looks to the future. It is long and learned, and is described as "emphatically a new century book. Astrophysics is a science still at the outset of a magnificent career. Its ways are beset with claimants for its attention. There is often much difficulty in choosing between them, yet rapidity of progress depends upon prudence in selection. Many hints for its guidance are accordingly offered in the present work, which deals, so far as possible, with answerable questions."

LONDON BEFORE THE CONQUEST. By W. R. Lethaby.

A collection of careful notes on Pre-Conquest London. In his introduction Mr. Lethaby says: "Of the hundreds of books concerning London, there is not one which treats of its ancient topography as a whole." The author sets out to reconstruct and to correct. Some of the chapter-headings read as follows: "Rivers and Fords," "Roads and the Bridge," "The Walls, Gates, and Quays." Streets, craft guilds and schools, churches and so forth are dealt with, and the volume concludes with an interesting note on the materials for the construction of maps of early London.

THE KNIGHT OF THE MAYPOLE. By John Davidson.

A comedy in four acts. The period is 1661, and Charles II. is one of the characters. This play was written in 1900, twenty-five years having come and gone since in "An Unhistorical Pastoral" the author first wrote of the Maypole. On the title-page we find this motto: "When your heart is heavy you should think of something wholly delightful; of the Nebular Hypothesis; for example, or of a Maypole."

MEMORIES OF A HUNDRED YEARS. By Edward Everett Hale.

American memories by the author of "The Man without a Country." "I live," writes Mr. Hale, "in a large, old-fashioned house which is crowded from cellar to attic with letters and other manuscripts, with pamphlets and with newspapers. Here are the diaries and correspondence of my own generation, and of my father's and mother's, and of their father's and mother's." Mr. Hale's father was a journalist, and we get glimpses of such matters as the Boston Stamp Act and President Adams's advice to Alexander Everett. The volumes are very fully illustrated, and are particularly rich in portraits.

The latest curiosity in the way of publishing lies before us. It consists of the first volume of the "Autograph" Dickens, and is issued by Mr. G. D. Sproul, of York Street, Covent Garden. The "Autograph" Dickens is to be completed in fifty-six volumes and the price is £6 net per volume. In all there will be over five thousand illustrations, many by living artists, and these bear the artists' autographs. The various volumes are to have introductions by different writers, amongst those named being Mr. Sidney Lee, Mrs. Meynell, Mr. Swinburne, and Mr. Gissing. Curiosity is the only word we can apply to this extravagant piece of book-making. Certainly no one would care to read Dickens from these bulky volumes; the series is evidently designed not for readers, but for collectors of the unusual. There is also to be a "Dunstan" edition of Dickens, printed on vellum and illuminated. The price of each set is somewhere about £20,000.

The last library that one would expect to be in bad condition is perhaps a University library. Yet the library of the University of London, which consists of about 30,000 volumes, is in a condition described as deplorable. The books are unarranged, and are scattered through several rooms which are used as University offices. This state of affairs is to be brought before Convocation, and no doubt some effort will be made to improve matters. The annual expenditure on the library is about £150.

MR. KIPLING'S poem, "Pan in Vermont," has been printed for private circulation in London. It will be remembered that the verses recently appeared in "Country Life in America." We quote the first stanza:—

It's forty in the shade to-day; the sprouting eyes declare:
The boulders rise above the drift, the southern slopes are bare;
Hub-deep in slush Apollo's car swings north along the Zod-
-iac. Good lack, the Spring is back, and Pan is on the road.

The poem will probably reappear in Mr. Kipling's next volume of verse.

MR. HENRY LAWSON, who was in England not long ago, has had a serious accident. He fell from a cliff outside Sydney harbour, and sustained severe injuries. Mr. Lawson came to England to write, but found the climate too much for him. While here, however, he published a couple of books, and did some work for the magazines. Mr. Lawson's grip of bush-life has made him the typical interpreter of all sides of its rich material.

Is what is called the Irish Revival to produce its own native publisher? It would almost seem so, to judge from a list which we have received from Messrs. Hodges, Figgis, of Dublin. They are the publishers of Mr. Stephen Gwynn's "To-day and To-morrow in Ireland," and they announce other books, both in prose and verse, dealing with purely Irish subjects. This is as it should be. Scotland has had her own particular publishers for generations, and if the Irish Revival has any national vitality it is just as well that it should express itself in national publishing.

THE ideas of the "rich American" in the way of collecting would seem to have been exhausted. Yet Italy, it appears, has recently been interested by the progress through its provinces of the "King of the Books." The kingship, after all, is of a very minor order. The notion of this ingenious collector was to accumulate books by living authors, but each had to be a first edition, and the finest art of the binder was to be employed to make the exterior attractive. In addition the title-page had to bear the author's autograph, and if possible something more. We are glad to hear, on the authority of the "Pall Mall Gazette," that "some of the great men were too modest to even answer his application." One or two even "shut the door in his face." But D'Annunzio wrote a long inscription for him, as also did Lombroso.

THE "New York Times Saturday Review" prints an interesting article called "An Old-Time Publisher." The publisher is Frederick Gleason, a man who many years ago had one of the most successful businesses in the United States. "Gleason's Pictorial" was the first illustrated weekly issued in America, antedating the Harpers by a number of years. But Gleason could not move with the times; younger rivals sprang up, his business declined, and at last his great house, and his Russian sleigh, and his fur coat had to be given up. But still he kept at work, and when the writer of the article first knew him he was turning out cheap publications containing his old serials, and having new matter written round old wood-cuts at the cheapest rates. The article concludes:—

But the old man toiled on to the last, bewildered, unable to comprehend, much less to reconcile, the new order of things, his business retreating in adverse ratio to the advancement of his more energetic and intelligent c-petitors. So it was only a question of time when the sheriff should appear and take possession of the ruins of a once magnificent establishment. The last time I heard of Mr. Gleason he was in an old men's home near Boston—a pathetic end to a career that in its heyday was so rich with priceless opportunities.

Two or three years ago considerable public interest was manifested in the action which Mr. Kipling brought against Messrs. Putnams for infringement of copyright and trade mark. In the edition of Mr. Kipling's works published in 1899 by Messrs. Putnams there were included some unbound pages and uncopyrighted poems. Mr. Kipling complained that unauthorised publications had been bound without authority into an edition bearing an elephant's head within a circle, which he claimed as his trade mark. The lower courts decided in favour of the publishers, and now the United States Court of Appeal has upheld the judgment. The Court says: "The proposition that an author can protect his writings by a trade mark is unique and somewhat startling. It is certainly offensive to æsthetic and poetic taste to place such poems as 'The Recessional' and 'The Last Chanty' in the same category with pills and soap, to be dealt with as so much merchandise."

FROM the "Morning Leader's" "Man in the Pulpit" by J. I. we cut the following nervously vivid, though perhaps rather over-wrought, description of Canon Hensley Henson:—

Cadaverously anæmic. Features a mask of death. Emaciated. Shut his eyes, and he is a figure of mortality. I should not be surprised if he wore a cravat of crossbones. The nose is a pinched emblem of famine, and the tense nostrils are worn thin. The self-conscious lips strive vainly to cover the protruding teeth. The sinews of the meagre neck rise in long lean ridges. The head is small, without salient angles or contours. The hair, mouse-colored and submissive, suggests a sensitive but unoriginal personality. The eyebrows are bristling arches of unrest, and under them blaze feverishly brilliant eyes that save the surroundings from insignificance. It is in the eyes that the sharp ardor of the man glitters. Watchfully distrustful, they are alight with concentrated purpose, which is cold rather than hot. Here is a keen will that works at high pressure, a spirit that uses the last ounce of its endowment, a force that will not bow to its own limitations.

WE have already had our say concerning the probable value of the new British Academy, but it may be worth while to quote a few lines from what the British Academy's secretary, Mr. Israel Gollancz, said to Mr. Blathwayt in a recent interview in "Great Thoughts." In answer to the question, "What do you expect to do as an Academy?" Mr. Gollancz said:—

As regards that subject there will, of course, be the question of transactions to be considered, important discoveries and literary enterprises, which will all come before and be discussed by the Fellows; there may be rewards and encouragements and diplomas to be awarded, the due recognition of great achievements in the world of learning. But most important of all is the fact that there is now a body to which workers throughout the whole empire—and foreigners also—may look for the hall-mark of merit. Learning, exact scholarship, high achievement, will no longer go unnoticed and unrewarded. It will be the duty, as it should also be the high privilege of the Academy, to call attention to and to confer honour upon all those who distinguish themselves in the world of literary science on these things too depends the glory of the British name.

Concerning which we have only to remark that "learning, exact scholarship, high achievement" need no Academy either to notice or reward them. Mr. Gollancz, by the way, has now broken his connection with Messrs. Dent, and will in future act as Editor-in-Chief to Mr. Moring's reissue of the classics known as the "King's Library."

A WRITER in the "Forum" has been discussing the already much discussed question of Hawthorne's work and personality. Hawthorne, says the writer of the article, never so matched his individual strength against the world as to acquire from the battle confidence and serenity. He never had, either, "that savage but sustaining joy of scorn of the world." He thought like a man with low vitality, and only reached to strength in his supreme work. As an example of the supreme work "The Scarlet Letter" is cited. Of it the writer says: "In that book Hawthorne put the quintessence of all qualities which lay potentially in his previous work—an extraordinary power of visualization, a sense for the physical symbol, and a relentless pursuit of the symptoms of disordered conscience. By 'The Scarlet Letter' he stands or falls." We should be sorry altogether to agree with that somewhat sweeping judgment; for, beautiful as "The Scarlet Letter" is, it cannot stand on its psychology. The "relentless pursuit of the symptoms and disordered conscience" in the book sometimes degenerates into pretty triviality. Its power lies in its elusive spiritual atmosphere, its half-drawn inferences, and its delicacy of style. Hawthorne was too introspective to write a really great book, but he lives, and will live.

We find the following lines as motto to Mr. Albert Chevalier's just published "Limelight Lays":—

Could we behold that wonder—
The sands of Time all sifted,
Should we find some called "Gifted"
But grains by Chance up-lifted
Mere atoms both of blunder?

This strikes us, as one of Mr. Chevalier's characters might say, as rather steep.

WE can hardly open any critical journal now-a-days without finding something about the "Decay of the Novel," and most of the writers of these melancholy articles are novelists themselves. The latest contribution to the discussion comes from Mr. Benjamin Swift, who writes concerning it in the New York "Critic." And what Mr. Swift has to say is precisely what everyone else has been saying for years past. Says Mr. Swift:—

I hope I shall not be guilty of injustice or of exaggeration, if I say, that the conditions under which modern imaginative work is produced are such as to encourage the creation not of the reality, but of the counterfeit. Indeed, the literary form of this sort of unconscious caricature threatens to drive the genuine article out of the market. Like everything else, literature is invaded by a parasite which destroys the body upon which it feeds.

Then follows this:—

I have always believed that if any artist is to attain his ends he must be allowed to make not other people's but his own emotions the basis of his creative work. This does not mean that he ought to turn himself inside out for the world's inspection, but only that his choice of material and his method of handling it must be determined by his own consciousness. Otherwise he becomes a journeyman.

This, surely, contributes nothing vital to the question—it is merely a restatement of the obvious. All depends upon the individual. It is all very well to say that modern conditions, serial publication, and so forth, are entirely against artistic work. But the strong man's work is still sometimes published serially, and he finds in modern conditions just the material for his art. And again, does not the writer who may be labelled "journeyman" often turn out the greatest things? In Mr. Swift's sense, were not Dumas and Balzac journeymen? Broadly we are in sympathy with Mr. Swift's point of view, but it is so easy to write glibly round a large question, so difficult to touch its essentials. And Mr. Swift has the irritating habit of saying the old thing over again: "The novel still remains a serious form of art because it has all human life for its basis." Of course it has: even the schoolgirl could have stated the fact in the same words. We may be sure that if the novel is in decay it is because writers are not strong enough to express their individuality, or that individuality is not worth expression. The ordinary writer writes for ordinary readers as he always did and always will. And if the extraordinary writer has anything to say he will eventually come into his own; but he must guard against the merely extraordinary, and be certain that his ideas are really worth consideration.

MRS. MEYNELL contributes to the "Atlantic Monthly" an article on "Dickens as a Man of Letters." In the main it is appreciative, and that in directions which may perhaps surprise those readers who are inclined to neglect Dickens nowadays. It is an appreciation of him as a master of style. We read:—

Dickens, however, was very much a craftsman. He had a love of his métier, and the genius for words, which the habitual indifference of his time, of his readers, and of his contemporaries in letters could not quench. To read him after a modern man who had the like pre-occupation, displayed it, and was applauded for it phrase by phrase,—Robert Louis Stevenson, for example,—is to undergo a new conviction of his authorship, of the vitality of his diction, of a style that springs, strikes, and makes a way through the burden of custom.

There follows this characteristic and true passage:—

The style of Dickens is assuredly not great. It has life enough for movement, but not life enough for peace. That it has life, whether restless or at rest, is the fact which proves its title to the name of style.

The instances which Mrs. Meynell quotes show a close and intimate knowledge of her author, as also do the instances quoted of Dickens's lapses into sentimentality:—

As you read him, you learn to understand how his vitality was at work, how it carried him through his least worthy as well as his most worthy moments, and justified his confidence where a weaker man had confessed unconsciously the ignominies of false art and luxurious sentiment. Charles Dickens seems to defy us to charge him with these. None the less do we accuse him—at Little Paul's death, for example. Throughout this child's life—admirably told—the art is true, but at the very last few lines the writer seems to yield to applause, and to break the strengthening laws of nature down. We may indeed say the strengthening laws; because in what Hamlet calls the modesty of nature there is not only beauty, not only dignity, but an inimitable strength. The limitations of nature, and of natural art, are bracing. A word or two astray in this death scene; a phrase or two put into the mouth of the dying child—"the light about the head," "shining on me as I go," phrases that no child ever spoke, and that make one shrink as though with pain by their untruthfulness—and the sincerity of literature is compromised.

With only one adjective employed by Mrs. Meynell are we inclined to disagree: she calls Dickens's writing "unrhetorical." But surely passage on passage might be quoted of almost pure rhetoric, passages in which the Macaulay influence to which Mrs. Meynell refers was rampant and unashamed.

SAYS the writer of "Literature and Life," in the "Saturday Review" of the "New York American":—

Booth Tarkington is making a novel of his adventures as a political canvasser in Indiana. He is writing also a novel of theatrical life. Gautier's "Capitaine Fracasse" is no longer true. The players of Moilère's company were intelligent, amusing, admirable. Some of them had titles of nobility in their portfolios.

But they were not of the social life. They were vagabonds, and their phrases of dignity were only make-believe. They were of an ideal world, where slaps in the face, kicks and cuffs, the penitentiary, dishonoured no one. Now it is different.

To be in the theatrical one does not have to quit the social life. The diamonds that the leading ladies wear are real. The leading man may not be kicked and cuffed on the stage. He has dignity. He is a Knight in England, a member of the Legion of Honour in Paris, a capitalist here.

He may not be beaten in a bug, as Geronte is, nor despoiled of the waistcoats that he has stolen as the valets are in the "Precieuses Ridicules." The players of to-day may not play everything. They have social obligations.

"This," the writer adds, "is why Booth Tarkington is writing a novel of theatrical life." It might have been done, we imagine, for less exalted reasons. And is Gautier's "Capitaine Fracasse" so entirely out of date after all? We doubt it.

THE current issue of "Baconiana," we learn, "marks the commencement of a new style and a new series." What formerly circulated amongst the elect of the Bacon Society is now to appeal to the world. "Baconiana," we read, "will base its faith upon facts, will print facts in preference to articles of a speculative and discursive character, and in its endeavour to pick Truth from the mud of Controversy, will be uninfluenced by the hobnail of the literary Hooligan." Who the "literary Hooligan" may be in this connection it is not difficult to conjecture, particularly when we add that the number contains articles on "Hidden Symbols" and "The Mystery of Shakespeare."

Bibliographical.

ONE cannot sympathise very strongly with Mr. F. G. Kitton in his proposal to collect and reprint the "Fugitive Verse" of Charles Dickens. The volume can have a success only of curiosity; it can have next to no literary value. I take for granted that Mr. Kitton will give us more of Dickens's verse than Mr. Shepherd included in his "Plays and Poems of Charles Dickens" (1882 and 1885); otherwise, the new collection will be doubly unnecessary. It will no doubt have the effect of introducing Dickens as a versifier to a large number of people. There are those who have never even heard of "The Ivy Green," though the song is embedded in "The Pickwick Papers," and was set to music by at least four composers—best of all, by Henry Russell. Most of the lyrics in "The Village Coquettes" have also been published separately, with the music by Hullah. It was in one of these, beginning—

Love is not a feeling to pass away,
Like the balmy breath of a summer day—that Dickens reached his highest level, not a very high one, as a Bard. It was reprinted, along with "The Ivy Green," in "Songs from the Novelists" (1885).

In "The Woman of Mystery" Messrs. Chatto give us yet another translation from Georges Ohnet—from the pen of the translator of "Love's Depths," which they published in 1899. We have also had from them "Dr. Rameau," translated by Mrs. Cashel Hoey (1888), as well as "A Last Love" and "A Weird Gift," both translated by Mr. Vandam, and both published in 1890. Of course, the most popular of Ohnet's books in England has been "The Ironmaster," of which there were two versions in 1884, one in 1892, another in 1899, and so forth. Of "Will" there have been at least three versions (1883, 1890, and 1896). Of "The Marl-Pit Mystery" there have been two (1889 and 1893).

More letters by Mrs. Carlyle? There cannot be too many. Of course we all have on our shelves the "Letters and Memorials" of 1883. Some of us have, also, the "Early Letters, with a Few of Later Years," which were edited in 1889 by D. G. Ritchie. What of the "Autobiography of Mary Smith" (1892), which was prefaced, I think, by a letter from Mrs. Carlyle? The letters by Miss Jewsbury, published in the same year, derived at least half their interest from the fact that Mrs. Carlyle had been the inspirer and the recipient of them. There are those who believe that Mrs. Carlyle's letters have as good a chance of floating down the stream of time as anything written by the lady's over-strenuous husband.

Two new editions of Macaulay's "Lays"! Of such there is likely to be no end. There was one last year and another in 1899; there were two in 1897; there was one in 1895 among the "Penny Poets." One came out in 1893, another in 1892 (this proved specially popular, being several times re-issued), another in 1889, another in 1887 (Cassell), another in 1886 (Ward and Lock), another in 1885 (Routledge), another in 1884, another in 1882. In 1881 came one which was illustrated by Mr. J. R. Weguelin. There had been in 1847 an edition illustrated by G. Scharf, junior. It looks as if the "Lays" would survive alike the "History," the "Essays," and the "Biographies."

In adding Dryden's "Virgil" and Pope's "Odyssey" to his "World Library," Mr. Grant Richards will be doing a good thing, for it so happens that neither of these works is accessible in very cheap and handy editions. Of the latter there was an edition in 1871 limited to the first four books; the poem was reprinted with Pope's "Iliad" so recently as 1896. Dryden's "Æneid" was included in 1891 in Sir John Lubbock's "Hundred Books." It had previously figured in Henry Morley's "Universal Library" (1883).

Mr. W. E. H. Lecky's "Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland," of which we are to have a new edition, came out originally in 1861. Ten years later it was reissued in a revised and enlarged form. Now it has been revised and enlarged again. Its interest is just a little remote. Swift, Flood, O'Connell, and Grattan—why don't our historians leave such contentious people alone?

Ouida's "Strathmore," which Messrs. Chatto are reproducing at the nimble sixpence, came out as long ago as 1865. We have reason to be grateful to it, for it suggested the "Strapmore" of Sir Frank Burnand—one of the very best of his parodies. I fancy the latest appearance made by "Strapmore" was in the volume entitled "Some Old Friends" (1892).

Rumour has it that there is to be yet another series of small biographies of men and women of letters, one of its features being the utilisation of unpublished material. May I suggest to the projectors of the series that another feature of it should be, in every case, a bibliography full and up-to-date?

Reviews.

The Unrest of Euripides.

EURIPIDES. Translated by Gilbert Murray. (George Allen.)

PROF. MURRAY is one of those rare classical scholars who add to their professional erudition a fine and ardent sense of things literary. This double quality marks every page of his contribution to the series of volumes on "The Athenian Drama." It is a book which should appeal to readers of all types and of every grade of attainment; charming in outward form, with its delightful illustrations from Greek vases; and singularly complete and satisfying in its union of great critical insight with exceptional felicity in the difficult art of verse translation. With the possible exception of Browning's "Balaustion's Adventure" and "Aristophanes' Apology," we know of no work which brings the English reader more closely into touch with fifth-century Athens and with the spiritual issues which were then swaying the minds of men so different and yet so strangely akin as Aristophanes and Euripides. Out of the material available for his purpose, Prof. Murray has chosen, firstly, the "Hippolytus" and the "Bacchae," to the latter of which, in particular, he devotes his introductory essay; secondly, the "Frogs" of Aristophanes, "the chief ancient criticism of Euripides, a satire penetrating, brilliant, and, though preposterously unfair, still exceedingly helpful"; and, thirdly, a certain number of the lost plays, the outlines of which he endeavours to trace from such notices and fragments of them as survive.

The "Hippolytus" is, of course, one of Euripides' earlier plays, written in the first eager days of the Athenian hegemony, when all the world seemed breaking into flower together, before the bitterness and the disillusion came. It tells how Hippolytus served the austere wood goddess Artemis, and neglected Aphrodite, and how Aphrodite would be revenged, and through her might made Phaedra a flaming sword and brought Hippolytus to ruin. It would not be from Euripides if it had not its irony and its questioning of established things; but in the main it is marked by the serene beauty of all the earlier plays. The quality of Phaedra's love, as Prof. Murray notes, "apart from its circumstances, is entirely fragrant and clear." And, from beginning to end, the piece is full of exquisite poetry. Hippolytus enters with a prayer to his mistress:—

To thee this wreathed garland, from a green
And virgin meadow bear I, O my Queen,
Where never shepherd leads his grazing ewes
Nor scythe has touched. Only the river dew
Gleam, and the spring bee sings, and in the glade
Hath Solitude her mystic garden made.

From the choruses we select that which is sung at the crisis of the play, while the poor love-distraught Phaedra is setting her white neck to the "noose of death" behind the stage. The pastoral aspiration comes as an interlude between two passion-flecked scenes:—

Could I take me to some cavern for mine hiding,
In the hill-tops where the Sun scarce hath trod;
Or a cloud make the home of mine abiding,
As a bird among the bird-droves of God!
Could I wing me to my rest amid the roar
Of the deep Adriatic on the shore,
Where the water of Eridanus is clear,
And Phaëthon's sad sisters by his grave
Weep into the river, and each tear
Gleams, a drop of amber, in the wave.

To the strand of the Daughters of the Sunset,
The Apple-tree, the singing and the gold;
Where the mariner must stay him from his onset,
And the red wave is tranquil as of old;
Yea, beyond that Pillar of the End
That Atlas guardeth, would I wend;

Where a voice of living waters never ceaseth
In God's quiet garden by the sea,
And Earth, the ancient life-giver, increaseth
Joy among the meadows, like a tree.

Half a century elapsed between "Hippolytus" and the "Bacchae." In the interval the tragedy of Athens had been played. All the high hopes had faded. Hegemony had degenerated into empire. And then came the war, with its pitiful relaxation of moral and intellectual fibre. Athens, once "farther removed from primitive savagery" than any other people, had learnt from Cleon not to be "mised by the three most deadly enemies of empire, Pity and Eloquent Sentiments, and the Generosity of Strength." Euripides himself had incurred the dislike of his fellow-countrymen, and had had to leave Athens, under circumstances unknown to us, "because of the malicious exultation over him of nearly all the city." He fled to Macedonia, and dwelt on the wild northern slopes of Olympus:—

In the elm-woods and the oaken,
There where Orpheus harped of old,
And the trees awoke and knew him,
And the wild things gathered to him,
As he sang amid the broken
Glens his music manifold.

Here he wrote the "Bacchae," which was produced, not quite finished, after his death. It is a story of how a god came to his own and his own received him not. The god was Dionysus:—

A man of charm and spell, from Lydian seas,
A head all gold and cloudy fragrances,
A wine-red cheek, and eyes that hold the light
Of the very Cyprian!

Having won all the East to his worship, he set his foot in Thebes, the home of his mother Semele. And all the women, led by Agave, sister of Semele, and mother of the King Pentheus, followed him in his wild rites upon the hills. Even the ancient Cadmus and Teiresias took the thyrsus in their hands and set the ivy-wreath upon their heads. Here is a chant of the Bacchanal maidens:—

Where is the Home for me?
O Cyprus, set in the sea,
Aphrodite's home In the soft sea-foam,
Would I could wend to thee;
Where the wings of the Loves are furled,
And faint the heart of the world.
Aye, or to Paphos' isle,
Where the rainless meadows smile
With riches rolled From the hundred-fold
Mouths of the far-off Nile,
Streaming beneath the waves
To the roots of the sea-ward caves.

But a better land is there
Where Olympus cleaves the air,
The high still dell Where the Muses dwell,
Fairest of all things fair!
O there is Grace, and there is the Heart's Desire,
And peace to adore thee, thou Spirit of Guiding Fire!

Only King Pentheus will not hear; and calls the stranger before him, and lays gyves upon him. And the god sends a frenzy upon Pentheus, and leads him to spy out the revels on Cithaeron, and there at the bidding of Dionysus he is taken by the inspired women and torn limb from limb. In one of the best critical essays known to us, Prof. Murray endeavours to elucidate the bearings of Euripides' thought in this difficult and enigmatic play. In one of its aspects it is clearly like much that he wrote, an impeachment of the divinity.

The sympathy of the audience is with Dionysus while he is persecuted; doubtful while he is just taking his vengeance; utterly against him at the end of the play. . . . The most significant point against Dionysus is its change of tone—the conversion, one might almost call it, of his own inspired "Wild Beasts," the Chorus of Asiatic Bacchanals, after the return of Agavé with her son's severed head. The change is clearly visible in that marvellous scene itself. It is emphasized in the sequel. Those wild singers, who raged so loudly in praise of the god's vengeance before they saw what it was, fall, when once they have seen it, into dead silence. . . . And they go off at the end with no remark, good or evil, about their triumphant and hateful Dionysus, uttering only those lines of brooding resignation with which Euripides closed so many of his tragedies.

On the other hand, there is equally clear in the play an attempt to find expression in the symbols and utterances of the Dionysus-worship for certain aspirations and ideals, which had come, at the gray end of his vexed life, to be Euripides' own. In the cool of the hills, away from the bad dream of a disillusioned Athens, he had grown, as the whole of Greek thought shortly after him was to grow, to look for glimpses of the joy and truth of life, not in the wisdom of civilisation, but in the content of a soul which has accepted the harmony of nature, and holds the key to some of her intimacies.

Knowledge, we are not foes!
I seek thee diligently:
But the world with a great wind blows,
Shining, and not from thee;
Blowing to beautiful things,
On amid dark and light,
Till Life through the trammellings
Of Laws that are not the Right,
Breaks, clean and pure, and sings
Glory to God in the height!

The quotations which we have given will serve to show the quality of Prof. Murray's translation. It seems to us very remarkable indeed. He is one of the very few translators whose work gives the effect, not of a translation at all, but of a substantive poem. More than adequate in the dialogue, he rises at times in the lyrics to heights of quite extraordinary felicity. We do not believe that he has ever published a volume of poems, but it is impossible that he should have none of his own to give us. As a translator, his method is audacious, and fully justifies itself by its success. First, he tells us, came "close study of the letter, and careful tracking of the spirit by means of its subtleties." This took shape in translations or paraphrases made for lecture use, which were "prose, stilted and long-winded prose, and the original is gleaming poetry." Then comes the second part of the task. "The groundwork of careful translation once laid, I have thought no more about anything but the poetry." The course has its pitfalls, and Prof. Murray fears that many scholars will think that he has made Euripides too "modern."

My answer is that, if in a matter of scholarship, it is well to be "safe" or even to "hedge," in a matter of Art any such cowardice is fatal. I have in my own mind a fairly clear conception of what I take to be the spirit of Euripides, and I have kept my hands very free in trying to get over it.

We should add that the one thing which has been most effectively borne in upon our minds in reading this book is that Euripides precisely is "modern." After all, the world has not moved very much, in essentials, since the fifth century B.C. We have the electric light, and we can no longer paint vases. But those are details, and the problems and the unrest of Euripides are still our problems and our unrest.

An Atmospheric Tragedy.

FRANCESCA DA RIMINI. By Gabriele d'Annunzio. Translated by Arthur Symonds. (William Heinemann.)

MR. ARTHUR SYMONDS has fairly established himself as the translator of D'Annunzio's poetic work, even as Mr. Alfred Sutro has become the recognised translator of Maeterlinck. Here he gives us a rendering of D'Annunzio's latest and hotly debated drama, "Francesca da Rimini." It is Englished with the cunning grace and formal perfection which we look for from him; and which only the practised hand, the sympathetic and plastic mind of a poet could compass. He has had a specially difficult task; for the drama is written in those unrhymed lines of varying length which English poets have only (and rarely) used for lyric purposes. "Samson Agonistes" is the best-known example. The more need have we to congratulate Mr. Symonds on the large measure of success he has achieved in a language so much less ductile than Italian—a success only to be gauged by comparison with the original, which explains features at first sight questionable.

"Francesca da Rimini" is the least morbid drama D'Annunzio has written: it is, indeed, as little morbid as is possible to the author. It does not therefore result that it is his best. On the Italian stage it is said to have obtained great success; though it is also admitted that extensive "cuts" have been required. In the closet, one would scarce conceive it a successful stage-play. There is a conspicuous lack of coming to the point, a meticulous over-loading with minutiae of detail, a dream-like languor of procession (though with underlying and informing passion enough). It breathes, one would say, rather the spirit of Greek than Gothic tragedy; the passion is static and slowly cumulative rather than dynamic and sweeping through swift action: and this despite the sedulous turbulence of accessory action—background action, we might say—in which it is involved. From the beginning of the second act the central situation is really in suspense, revolving round itself rather than advancing. The close is merely the fall of a calamity long foreseen, incumbent, and discounted beforehand by the reader. On the stage the effect may be different.

Of character there is little. The personages are generalised and typical, not individual. Francesca is any sweet, innocent, and Italianly impassioned woman. Paolo is the handsome young lover of a hundred plays, Giovanni Malatesta the rough, gloomy, honest husband of tradition, Malatestino the felinely cruel villain of Latin romance. The rest are supernumeraries. But there is poetic beauty throughout, at once direct and subtly suggestive; there is passion, which is dramatic passion. We cannot say that the drama (as a reading-drama) moves us, or leaves on us any depth of impression. But it excites constant admiration; there is the sense of a vital power behind the speeches, of a living conception holding the slow procession of emotions in coherence: it is, in fine, work of genius, though ourselves we cannot feel it to be triumphant genius. The depiction of innocent girlhood in the speeches of Francesca and her sister suffuse the first act with a rare beauty. The famous scene of the fatal kiss and declaration between the lovers is treated with a classic simplicity and reserve which, powerfully acted, should make it the most effective in the play. In the final scene, natural accessories are introduced with a Shakespearean pathos of reticent allusion; and something of this has also, perhaps, been learned from Maeterlinck. Quotation could give no suggestion of the poetic loveliness in the speeches; they are organic, and depend on relation to their setting in a severer way than in any other drama of D'Annunzio's. The whole play is steeped in that power of atmosphere which is wonderfully D'Annunzio's own. It is this rather than the characters, rather even than their passions, which makes the significance of the tragedy. You feel, as you feel a mist, the gathering and descent of a fate. And the slow passing over you of that sensation is the play.

John Gower.

WORKS OF JOHN GOWER. Vol. IV. LATIN WORKS. Edited by G. C. Macaulay. (Clarendon Press.)

WITH this volume Mr. Macaulay's elaborate edition of Gower—a monument of his own untiring industry and of the munificence of the Clarendon Press—comes to an end. The French "Mirour de L'Ommie" (never before printed) and "Cinkante Balades" saw the light in 1899. Last year followed the immense English "Confessio Amantis"; and now with the "Vox Clamantis" and a few minor Latin poems the tale of this singular trilingual writer, tedious enough from the literary point of view, but remarkably characteristic, both in his defects and in his achievements, of the dying middle ages, is complete. The readers of the ACADEMY would hardly thank us for any minute or detailed criticism of the "Vox Clamantis" itself. In some 10,000 lines of elegiac couplets, evidently based upon Ovid, and divided into six books, it deals didactically and satirically with the England of about 1382, starting with a description of the peasants' rising of the following year, and passing into a general indictment of contemporary society in all its orders, of prelates and priests, of monks and friars, of knights and peasants, of craftsmen and lawyers. Afar off it recalls the temper of Langland's infinitely more vigorous and important "Vision of Piers the Plowman," a temper whose undisputed appeal to the finer spirits of the closing fourteenth century is sufficient of itself to show how near the vast structure of mediævalism was to its ruin. In a brief, carefully weighed and eminently sceptical preface, Mr. Macaulay puts together the extremely little that is known of Gower the man. His arms, his dialect and other indications show that he was of a Kentish family, although he has been claimed on the very slightest evidence for Yorkshire, and on none whatever for Wales. In 1378 he received a power of attorney from Geoffrey Chaucer, on the occasion of a foreign journey made by the greater poet. In 1398, he is described as "esquire," and Henry, Earl of Derby, presented him with a collar, worth 26s. 8d. In 1398 he obtained a licence to marry Agnes Groundo'f, who appears to have been his second wife. Clearly, therefore, he was not, as has been thought, a clerk, and the tone of his writings suggests that he was connected with the merchant interest of London. In his later years he was blind, and when he made his will in 1408, he seems to have been lodged in the priory of St. Mary Overey, where he had a "hospitium" with an oratory attached. He left property to the priory, in which he had already endowed a daily mass for his soul, and he was buried in St. John Baptist's chapel in the priory church, now known as St. Saviour's, Southwark. Here, says Mr. Macaulay, is still—an altar tomb, on which lies an effigy of the poet, habited in a long dark-coloured gown, with a standing cape and buttoned down to his feet, wearing a gold collar of SS. fastened in front with a device of chained swan between two portcullises. His hand rests on a pile of three folio volumes marked with the names of his three principal works, "Vox Clamantis," "Speculum Meditantis," "Confessio Amantis." He has a rather round face with high cheek-bones, a moustache and a slightly forked beard, hair long and curling upwards, and round his head a chaplet of four red roses at intervals upon a band, with the words "merci ilif" (repeated) in the intervals between the roses: the hands are put together and raised in prayer: at the feet there is a lion or mastiff lying.

The painting of the tomb appears to have undergone various alterations in the course of the centuries. Miniature representations of John Gower are also to be found in more than one manuscript of his poems. One of these is reproduced as a frontispiece to the present volume, and shows him as an archer in a long fur-lined gown and a round crowned hat, shooting an arrow at the world. The beard is forked, the face prognathous and the nose flattish. Talis, dum vivit, was "moral" Gower.

Little Lyrics.

LATER LYRICS. By John B. Tabb. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

FATHER TABB'S previous work has secured deserved admiration both in England and America. The art in which he excels is the difficult one of the single brief poem, seldom exceeding a stanza or two. It requires a single idea, perfectly put, and not over-put. Indeed, much of the art of such poetry is in knowing where to leave off. It may look easy and trifling enough to the unwary reader; but a little experiment is calculated to humble any such feelings. In the present volume Father Tabb has to stand comparison with himself; and we are not sure that he stands it successfully in all respects. There are poems which fairly sustain his reputation. For instance, "The Shell":—

Silence, a deeper sea,
Now sunders thee,
Save from the primal tone—
Thy mother's moan.

Within her waves, hadst thou
No voice as now;
A life of exile long
Hath taught thee song.

The style of that is all his own. And there is plenty like it, as we shall show. But speaking generally, and comparing the present volume with the first particularly, we notice in it a less amount of thought, and a greater preponderance of fancy. It is, of course, perfectly within a poet's right to give predominance to whatsoever quality he may please. It is a fault, however, that the fancy is not infrequently of a too resolvedly ingenious kind. It is, in fact, perilously like a conceit, in the modern and unfavourable sense of the word. "The Truant" is an example:—

Listen! 'tis the rain
Coming home again;
Not as when he went away,
Silent, but in tears to say
He is sorry to have gone
With the Mist that lured him on;
And he promises anew
Nevermore the like to do.
Alas! no sooner shines the sun
Than the selfsame deed is done.

Such an arbitrary and wirespun bit of allegory has no poetic value.

Again in "Life's Ramah" we find the like fault:—

Day after day,
The Herod Morn
Of dreams doth slay
The latest-born;
And Love, like Rachael o'er her dead,
Will not again be comforted.

It is an "ingenious fancy"—much too ingenious: it is cut out (so to speak) with a pair of scissors, like shapes in paper, rather than born of free impulse. But if these show the weaker side of the poet's fancy, examples of its excellence are not far to seek nor few. Take "Love's Repetend":—

Do ye forget the blossom-time?
Or tint for tint, as rhyme for rhyme,
Would ye, O leaves, supply;
To prove, as echo to the ear,
That Near is Far, and Far is Near,
In circling home to die?

That has a touch of something subtler than fancy. A larger number of poems than we could wish fail through sheer insufficiency of motive. "Desert-Orbs," however, has that central motive, and may fitly close our quotations:—

The world, they tell us, dwindles,
When matched with other spheres;
And yet in all their amplitudes
No place for human tears.
How sterile is the sunshine,
How masculine the blue,
That breeds no shadow, nor betrays
A memory of dew.

Fiction.

THE VOICE OF THE WORLD. By Arthur H. Holmes. (Burleigh, 6s.)

FOR the text of his book Mr. Holmes takes these sentences from Jean Paul Richter: "And now the most beautiful dawn that mortal can behold, arose upon his spirit—the dawn of a new composition. For the book that a person is beginning to create or design contains within itself half a life, and God knows what an expanse of futurity also." This, of course, implies that "The Voice of the World" is a literary novel, and so it is. But it can by no means be compared with the literary novel which is usually full of crudities and lack of knowledge. Crudities there are, and perhaps even lack of knowledge, but Mr. Holmes writes well, almost convincingly, and with a sense of the things that matter. The book is one rather of aspiration than of achievement, rather of introspection than of real human contemplation; yet it is done with a true sense of art, an actual striving to express something worth expression. Here and there we find beauty, here and there insight, here and there the thrill of humanity on the sharp and invincible note of passion. If the book fails, as we think it does, it is a failure worth a dozen easy successes.

Briefly, we have a man who goes to nature for inspiration. He is married, and has a child. But the wife grows weary of the mountain life, and though entirely loyal to him she longs to express her own individuality. They separate for a time—she to go into the world to cultivate her gift of singing, he to remain on the hills to cultivate his own soul. Then, by chance, he takes for servant a woman who had precisely the wife's idea—to cultivate her own possibilities. But she happens to be beautiful, she happens only half to understand Nane, and the tragedy follows. It is a tragedy not without poignancy, not without essential truth, yet with it begins our quarrel with Mr. Holmes. His women, with certain reservations, we may accept, but not the too literary Nane. For the man, save under the strong immediate influence of women, is never a sensualist; he is never the predominant force, he is always the receptive medium. Yet we are to suppose that he grows to a knowledge of life, to a passionate eagerness to express life, through the influence of these two women, each infinitely superior to himself both in vision and human sympathy. There, we conceive, Mr. Holmes goes wrong; and certainly Nane's desertion of Rosina (for it amounts to that, in spite of a mechanical contrivance to suggest her ultimate happiness) is entirely caddish. The comparatively complaisant attitude of the wife is equally unconvincing. We feel that Nane is hardly a man to write good literature, but certainly a man to be kicked. He gets his impression of life not from his own incentive, but from the misery which he has brought upon others. Thus, in an interview between him and his wife after the other lady has intervened, we read:—

She [Coris] sat before him the embodiment of a life, a condition, fully charged with interest; the world of feeling, of action, out of which she had stepped, it was his longing to step into; to learn its foibles, trace its tragedies, weave upon its motives.

The attitude is that of the man who wants his work done for him, the man so open to influence that he cannot reasonably command his own instincts. We feel that when Coris says, a little later, out of a rush of practicality: "You might do 'pars' for a paper, you know, if you want to write," that she measured Nane up. But Mr. Holmes appears to think otherwise.

Yet, when all is said, "The Voice of the World" is a novel far above the average. It has thought, poetry, and style, though the style is reminiscent and the thought often curiously unclarified. Mr. Holmes has at any rate written a book which is worth serious criticism, and, more, is full of promise.

THE MISFIT MANTLE. By Charles Gleig. (Treherne, 3s. 6d.)

A SIMPLE story carried to a pleasant end by the impulse of a single picturesque idea is not very often met with. Such a one, however, is "The Misfit Mantle," the story of a peer who, to escape prosecution for an assault, assumed an alias and masqueraded as a popular novelist in a seaside boarding-house. The frankest of facetious prefaces assures us that the "purpose" of the book is to bring grist to Mr. Gleig's mill, and there is no harm in saying that we should have guessed as much without a preface. There is a briskness of movement—a little exaggerated—as of a public entertainer who dreads a yawn more than seven blue devils and (twice) a little very mild and suburban indecency. But in the main the book goes good-humouredly and humourously. A man of rank and fortune playing at twopenny cockshies with the hope of defraying "the cost of his tea" touches one's sense of the absurd, as does his reflection that "for half-a-crown he might have purchased a fair-sized sponge, or four collars, instead of wasting it in gambling." The nice girl who would have "tried ever so hard" not to love him had she known that he was a peer is a commonplace of romance, but she is in her latest rôle an excellent restorative for jaded optimism.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

BUSH STUDIES.

By BARBARA BAYNTON.

This is the fifth issue in that rather remarkable little series called "The Greenback Library." The author's name is new to us. Mrs. Baynton possesses a vigorous yet reticent power of description, and an unsentimental outlook, rare in a beginner. The volume contains six sketches of bush life in New South Wales.

THE SLAVES OF THE PADISHAH.

By MAURUS JOKAI.

Another of Jokai's almost innumerable romances. The book is a sequel to "Midst the Wild Carpathians," and centres round Michael Apafi, the last independent Prince of Transylvania. Mr. Bain's translation is good. (Jarrold, 6s.)

THE LONG VIGIL.

By F. JENNER TAYLER.

A modern story of middle-class life. "I, Gordon Pole, was a clerk to Wilkinson and Wells, merchants and bankers, of Dunselm Lane, London, E.C." Into these unlikely surroundings is introduced the figure of St. John the Evangelist. "My original act of disobedience would have to be repaired. In other words, I must do St. John's bidding; I must marry Miss Pratt or my desire to amend would avail nothing." That has a note of bathos, but the book is sincere and reasonably well written. (Unwin, 6s.)

IN CLARISSA'S DAY.

By SARAH TYTLER.

A story of the days of Blenheim and the Duchess Sarah. "In a gray old college in Oxford, two girls sat perched on a window seat in the deep embrasure of a mullioned window lighting up the dark oak of a long corridor." The two girls were Clary Hill and Bell Annesley, and the story tells of their adventures and their loves. The atmosphere of the time is not very successfully indicated. (Chatto, 6s.)

Education Supplement.

SATURDAY: 17 JANUARY, 1903.

Conflict of Studies.

THE forces operative in bringing about a conflict of studies are the squeezing out of the classics, by practical science, the improvement in the way in which the various studies are presented, and the tendency to give teachers subjects to teach throughout the whole or portion of the school, instead of keeping them to one class for all subjects. Each specialist demands more time for his subject, and consequently a readjustment of the curriculum is inevitable; and the question arises, what subjects must be retained. One immediate result of all these forces is the lengthening of the school period; but a determination of the relative values of the subjects taught is the most felt need of the school world.

At the Headmasters' Conference, a fear was expressed that science was trespassing in the domain of the humanities, and in more than one daily paper, commenting on the action of the Universities in reference to the retention of Greek, it was stated that no one can be liberally educated who has not a knowledge of Greek. But such fears and such idle statements will bring us no nearer the solution of the problem. What we want to know is, why certain subjects must be taught, and how much time must be given to them. If there were a generally accepted theory of education, nothing, of course, would be easier than the solution of this problem; but there is no such theory, and so far, at any rate, the help of the psychologist is infinitesimal.

The mathematicians tell us that Euclid is dethroned, that the Universities and other examining bodies no longer demand Euclid's proofs nor his sequence. At Chelsea, last Friday, teachers from public, secondary, and primary schools met to discuss the teaching of geometry. In a well-filled hall there was not a single speaker who did not urge that geometry must be taught like any other science by experiments. The young geometer was to be sent on a voyage of discovery armed with compasses, a ruler, and squared paper. Because Euclid never used compasses for marking-off distances, is that a reason why a beginner should draw five circles in order to cut off from one line a part equal to another? And so to-day we are beginning to teach geometry in our schools precisely in the way advocated by Socrates in the "Meno."

In that dialogue a boy is asked to make a square equal to double a given square, and Socrates, instead of blurring out the method, persuades him to discover for himself that areas of squares do not vary as their sides. It is quite true that without Socrates' help the pupil would only at the end have obtained a square approximately correct, but then we are to-day in no better case. We have yet to find out a method by which a boy could be led to discover the famous Pythagorean problem for himself, as he may be led to find out that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles. The result of the acceptance of this new method of teaching will be that unless more time is given to mathematics the school course will not cover sufficient ground, for as soon as this subject is taught intelligently, the barriers between elementary and higher mathematics fall down. To satisfy the teachers of mathematics is not a very difficult task, but other groups of specialists also put in their claim for a fair share of school time.

The drawing-master is no longer satisfied that his pupils should draw ruined cottages from copies on tinted papers with a white circle scratched in to represent the moon. The drawing lessons, he insists, must be made educative, therefore the child must draw things direct from nature; he must be trained to use pencil, pen, crayon, brush. The object is not to make an artist of him, but to give him training in manual skill and in the expression of ideas by form and colour, and to increase for him his pleasure in using the language of form. Besides, unless a child has some power of drawing, how is he to get the full benefit out of his nature studies?

Next the science master urges that it is not sufficient to give class demonstrations; each pupil must set up his own apparatus and devise experiments for himself; and if it is remembered that no practical lesson can well be shorter than an hour and a half, and that a recent regulation of the Board of Education makes it a condition of giving a minimum grant that nine hours at least must be devoted to science and mathematics—more than a third of the whole time—it will readily be granted that there is very little ground left to plot out. No matter how much the headmaster would like to reserve the rest of the time for the humanities, he cannot do so.

Again what would the educationist of any school say if music were exiled from the time-table? In former days, a hymn in the morning supplemented by a lesson a week made up a total of vocal practice. But to-day the music master cannot be put off so easily, for although he does not pretend, like Molière's le maître de musique, that all the disorders and all the wars in the world are due to ignorance of music, yet he is rightly dissatisfied with the mere learning of tunes. Music, at the least, must include some practice in singing from notes, but if we extend the term music so as to include physical exercises and æsthetics, it becomes evident that this subject will absorb two or three hours a week at least.

So far, we have made no mention of languages. It is agreed that every boy should learn one modern language, and four or five hours a week is admittedly a minimum time to give to it. For English literature, grammar, history, and geography, where are we to get their portions of time from? It is therefore quite true that the humanities are going by the board.

From this rough sketch it is evident that with increased training teachers will become more expert, and will teach more intelligently, with the result that the struggle for possession of the time-table will become more acute. It is for the schoolmaster to co-ordinate the subjects; he must look to the end of education. He should be endowed with a sense of proportion, and remember that all specialism tends to abnormality. He is concerned with the school as a whole and with the average boy. What are the potential powers of the average boy, and how is he to actualise them? He would like to arrange the work of the school so that he might bring each pupil up to a golden mediocrity, but who is there to teach him the value of Greek, say, compared with history, of French compared with woodwork?

He feels vaguely that all boys are endowed by nature with emotions and intelligence, and that they are incessantly desirous of manifesting the life that is in them, but how is he to give the right kind of help, or to refrain from helping in order that he shall not arrest development? It may be objected that to develop all the faculties equally, supposing that were possible, is undesirable, because a world full of people of all-round development would be intolerable. It is quite true that it is the eccentrics, the over-intellectual, the over-righteous, the over-æsthetical, who make the world interesting, but there is little cause to fear that the master's tyranny will ever make much effect on nature. The schoolmaster need not trouble himself unduly: let him keep his pupils' minds and bodies in exercise, and native bias will do the rest. How much education can do for good or ill is in the present state of our knowledge indeterminate.

What we do know is that knowledge is a precious thing, and that most human beings can be trained to become experts in something or other; but beyond this, how little we know? Another moral of all this conflict and difference of opinion is surely that each master should endeavour to teach well those subjects he knows best. In this way some schools will do well in mathematics, others in classics, others in modern languages. If a subject is taught intelligently, the mind of the learners will be exercised, and this is after all perhaps in education the one thing needful.

Let us now examine the complaints of the Classicists. They contend that the ancient languages are the best for cultivating the imagination and the intellect. We ask for proof; there is none forthcoming. The masters in public schools admit that the public school boy is not, whatever else he may be, over intellectual. Mr. Benson confessed so much in his book, and in his reply to Sir Oliver Lodge he practically admits that intellectual training is sadly lacking. If Latin were taught intelligently, if, for instance, instead of wasting time in turning good literature into bad Latin, an effort was made at mastering a single book of a classical writer and then reading the rest of his works in translation; if when this was done the pupil was made familiar with the history of the century in which his author lived; if the lessons were vitalised by maps, by photographs, by discussions, then indeed there would be little room for complaint. As it is the public school boy never enters the promised land; for years he is enmeshed in accident and syntax, and never once feels the pleasure of an untrammelled walk through the field of literature. How many boys who read Cæsar or Livy really become interested in the campaigns therein described as they would have done had they followed the narrative point by point in English? Does not the mastery of a book too often mean ability to translate it badly? Does it ever mean apprehension of the arguments, intellectual sympathy with the author? Let the teachers of the ancient languages endeavour to make their pupils realise that the primary object of a writer is to express his ideas, and we should hear little of the peril of public schools.

In conclusion, then, in the absence of help from the psychologist or the educational reformers as to the values of various mental exercises, we are compelled to continue more or less as tradition bids. First, then, the exercise of faculty should be pleasurable; boys should not be compelled to learn anything they don't like. If they are too dull for studies of any kind they should be allowed to employ their time at woodwork or in a laboratory. The average boy, however, finds any lesson interesting if the teacher is well trained and knows his work. Reduced to its primary elements the curriculum must include reading and discussions; experimental work (science, mathematics, &c.), and music (drawing, singing, drill). These three, but the greatest of these is reading.

A Rare Schoolmaster.*

PORTRAITURE is the art of sacrificing those traits in a character which are common to everybody and accenting those which are peculiar to an individual. The author of the "Memoir" before us has failed to grasp this, and accordingly his picture of his very remarkable relative, Edward Bowen, will not, we fear, survive to other generations. But if the reader cares to delve indefatigably in the four hundred pages he will be rewarded; gradually the sweetness and fascination of Edward Bowen, his gentle and chivalrous spirit, his keen and delicate intellect, seem to emerge from the congested mass of technical educational matter and miscellaneous biographical information offered us. We need say no more on this head, since it is obvious that the "Memoir" has been a labour of love to its author, and that he has brought together, with much pains, a quantity of material which at least old Harrovians will prize.

Edward Bowen, it is evident, was at heart an iconoclast in our orthodox scholastic world of imposing educational graven images. Many headmasters would have shown themselves so antagonistic to Bowen's theory and practice of teaching that he would probably have had to quit the scholastic for the political world, had not he found under Dr. Butler's rule at Harrow a mental atmosphere congenial to him. What a keen critic of pedagogic fallacies Bowen was appears from his satirical paper on those members of his profession who ape Arnold of Rugby. In a paper called "Arnoldides Chiffers" he very neatly pulls away the props by which the conventional schoolmaster holds up the Arnoldian lay figure before an admiring world; and in turn he combats the ideals of "Work while you work, and play while you play," "Let the schoolmaster be a boy among boys, at the games," "Bring your moral energy to bear on the boys," "Let boys select their friends among those only who are good"; and he demolishes with great directness various priggish assumptions of infallible virtue on the pedagogue's part. The refreshing originality of Bowen's mind led him to substitute the indirect sympathetic methods of the subtle man for the cast-iron rule of the stiff moralist. The art of teaching, he held, cannot be taught, so training colleges for teachers are more or less of a delusion, and this is admirably summed up by two questions he answered in his evidence on Secondary Education before the Commissioners:—

Q. Then you take the view that the art of teaching in practice, and discipline in particular, may be considered as very largely the reflex of a man's character upon the children?

A. Yes.

Q. And therefore nothing but inherent character can go a very long way toward effective teaching?

A. I would go a very long way towards that.

How admirable this is, and how far its penetrating sense goes to expose the central fallacy which underlies our whole educational system. Instead of carefully selecting the born teachers, those men whose "tone and temper of mind," whose natural sympathy with the young qualify them for the extremely delicate art of instruction, we throw open the profession to any ordinary young man who can pass college examinations. In the practical walks of life we select our gardeners or our coachmen for their innate and trained skill in dealing with plants or horses; but let any man look back at the list of assistant schoolmasters whose hands he passed through, and he will have been lucky if he can remember one man out of his half-dozen masters who showed any strong aptitude for training the young. As with the Church so with schoolmastering, to allow the ordinary man to find his "profession" in the one or the other is to invite failure and to damage the machine. The refreshing originality of Bowen's mind is also well represented in his paper on "Teaching by Means of Grammar." How apt and witty is the remark "the use of grammar has been defended on the score that it, after all, does give something for dull boys to do. The argument is perfectly clear. It is upheld as being, after all, an excellent substitute for education." And again his comment on "fine scholarship" should be commended to all schoolmasters: "A man is a fine scholar, a beautiful scholar, a finished scholar. What does that mean? It is simply that he remembers accurately the words and phrases that each particular Greek or Latin author was most in the habit of using—or, it may happen, of abusing. . . . How far in intellectual growth has such an accomplishment brought him? . . . One is driven, sometimes, in thinking of these and similar mistakes, to the verge of asserting that books are the great obstacle to education. Whether this be too audacious a paradox or not, our teaching wants sadly to be humanized." The clause italicised indicates the secret of Bowen's charm and power better than any formal summary. He humanized his pupils. He detested pedantry of every kind; all routine work, all conventional ideas. He made work pleasant for his boys, he set them personally the highest standard in keenness of mind, gentleness of heart, and of pluck and endurance in athletics. He aimed at developing his pupils' intelligence, not in making them walking receptacles for learning, but in stimulating their perception of beauty both in conduct and in nature. Therefore he was beloved by his boys, and remained an influence in their conduct for life. Bowen's own opinions on various subjects outside the sphere of his profession always testify to his engaging originality of mind. His excellent letters from Paris in 1871 in defence of the Commune, his hatred of militarism, his dislike of the late Transvaal war, his distrust of all formal influence, over centralisation, and of what we may call, for lack of a better term, the Prussian ideal in discipline and conduct, show that that dangerous career of professional schoolmastering had no dangers for a man of his rare intellectual honesty. We are not surprised to learn that Bowen was rather of Anglo-Celtic than of Anglo-Saxon blood. Would that he had attained ultimately to the headmastership of Harrow, for then by his influence on the humanizing of education he might have left a great tradition in the scholastic world, a tradition which would have notably enriched the science and craft of that educational world which has so narrow an outlook to-day.

* "Edward Bowen: A Memoir." By the Rev. the Hon. W. E. Bowen. (Longman, 12s. 6d.)

ARISTOTLE'S PSYCHOLOGY. By W. A. Hammond. (Sonnenschein. 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS volume contains not only a translation of the "De Anima," but also of the "Parva Naturalia," a series of opuscles dealing with psycho-physiological subjects and forming a supplement to the "De Anima." Too high praise cannot be given to Mr. Hammond for the masterly way in which he has done his work. The English reader of Aristotle can gather from this book just the information he wants; every difficulty is carefully considered, and, in addition, there is an introduction in which is discussed very fully and lucidly the essential principles of Aristotle's teaching on the Soul. Indeed, so admirable is the exegesis, that the young Aristotelian will, on turning to the original, feel that his editor has lapped him into a false security. It is not, of course, that every interpretation cannot be justified by the text which makes it unwise to read the introductions first, but that certain aspects of the reasoning are thrown into relief which in the original are found commingled with others. Then, of course, there is the bias of the editor, and if he is a psychologist himself, an almost unconscious tendency on his part to bring his author up to date and to make him anticipate modern discoveries. Mr. Hammond is himself aware of this defect, and, in quoting an interpretation of Wallace's, hints that it is coloured by English Hegelianism. Here and there it seems to us that Mr. Hammond's treatment of Aristotle's ideas on "creative reason" errs by a too great consistency; it is only fair to say, however, that Mr. Hammond expressly warns his readers against regarding his interpretation as more than "tentative and speculative." For instance, is it not dangerously near a misinterpretation of Aristotle to write: "It (the creative reason) is no part of the entelechy of the body, but is transcendent . . . it acts as the 'unmoved mover' who is immanent in the world without being a part of it." If this is genuine Aristotle, how slight the progress psychology has made along some lines. Compare the above statement with this taken from a modern text-book: "The world of material phenomena presupposes a system of immaterial agency. In this immaterial system the individual consciousness originates. To it, in some way, the sensational experiences are due which form the basis of our knowledge of the material world." There is, of course, a difference here, but how little, and, for all our knowledge, are we not left to-day with many questions still unsolved which the Greeks propounded? "We are still anxious to know whether our perception of a real world comes to us by the exercise of thought or by a simple impression of sense" (Wallace, "Outlines of Philosophy of Aristotle," page 16).

Although Mr. Hammond has written this book primarily for the use of the historical psychologist, yet it will prove of the greatest service to the student of Dante and of mediæval writers generally, who were saturated with Aristotelianism. At a time when Christianity was on the point of dying of sheer inanition, the translation into Arabic of Aristotle by Averroës, supplemented by the higher culture of the Arabs generally, gave it new life and produced that curious amalgam of Christianity and Paganism called Scholastic Philosophy. Much that is in Dante only becomes intelligible in the light of Aristotle's writings. It is an extraordinary fact that Aristotle, the first great genius who deserted the "high a priori road," the first great philosopher who built his philosophy upon ascertainable knowledge, did himself indirectly become the greatest obstacle to advance in the study of natural phenomena. And to-day the Aristotelian system of logic is the only one taught at the Universities to the great detriment of the art of reasoning. We reverence the masters of antiquity by reversing their methods, and we honour the master of those that know by stereotyping his "formal logic" and refusing to admit its inadequacy for modern dialectics.

School History.

ANCIENT HISTORY FOR BEGINNERS. By G. W. Botsford. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d.)

THIS volume will make an admirable reader for fifth and sixth form boys. The author has so written it that the recommendation of the American Historical Association may be easily carried into effect in those schools where time can be found for ancient as well as modern history. The story is told of Greece from earliest times to the battle of Arbela, and of Rome from the beginning to the close of the eighth century. There are chapters devoted to Art and Literature. Many maps and illustrations make the reading more interesting, and at the close of each chapter a list is added of books suitable for more advanced students. The first essential of a history is that it shall be readable; no matter how accurate the author is or how careful he has been to exclude difficult details, unless he has the gift of holding the schoolboy's attention his work is vain. Mr. Botsford has this faculty of clearness and interestingness in a very unusual degree. When one reflects how great a number of school-histories are turned out every year, and how deadly dull most of them are, one is driven to recommend the use in school of the Chronicle writers, although this means the substitution of naïve credulous narratives, indispensable to the historians, but unsuitable in many respects for school purposes. We do not want a boy to think with nausea of his school studies. It is of the very greatest importance that when a boy leaves school he should have the technical skill to enjoy and master the works of at least one Olympian writer. For Europe as for America there is the danger of overlooking the fact that neither mathematics, nor science, nor manual skill can quite satisfy the cravings which most minds have for reality, and the most real things in the world for man are his social environment, and the world of thought and imagination found in books.

Our space has only permitted reference to one essential of a school history; but are we never to have a history in the class-room written entirely from the sociological and geographical point of view? For instance, how could Mr. Botsford refrain from following up his account of Thessaly, without hinting at the effect of living in a plain surrounded by mountains?

School Management.

PRINCIPLES OF CLASS TEACHING. By J. J. Findlay. (Macmillan.)

MR. FINDLAY, as a former lecturer on education for the College of Preceptors, and as headmaster during the last four years at a secondary school, is well entitled to a hearing on the subject of his life's work. This book is written to help the teacher just beginning his career, fresh from college or university, it may be, who finds himself in front of a class of boys, very often with no more notion what to do with it than a child with a complicated piece of machinery. And it is because this is the deliberate aim of the author that we think the book as a whole unsatisfactory, though full of good things. If considered in regard to actual practice in schools, it serves to show the dark places in English practical pedagogy. But the very first essential of a volume on teaching is to avoid the obvious, to give the reader surprises, to give an impression of freshness. In the slow movement of his style and in his labouring of the obvious, Mr. Findlay resembles Sir Joshua Fitch. Mr. Findlay follows up a lesson in geometry by five pages of a wearisome dialogue between the "author" and "old school," of no possible use to anyone so far as we can see. Let the dead bury their dead. But the author betrays that he himself is still interested in Euclid's order, else why trouble us with a lesson to boys of 13 on parallels? Again, the lesson on Boyle's Law is defective. It is evident that the author is a much more competent teacher of literature and languages than of either science or of mathematics. His series of lessons in German is in every way admirable. The author's method of teaching history by readings from contemporary writers followed by discussion, is much more intelligent than the current methods, even the best of them; but why does Mr. Findlay dilute the effect of the reading by such remarks as this: "Why did the people of England honour him (Earl Simon) so much above all the other barons? Because he was faithful to his duty to the nation, instead of taking the part of his brother-in-law, the King, in opposing the people. The old chronicles compared him with Simon Peter; we may compare him more fitly with that great Bible hero who 'chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.'" Why draw obvious morals, and spoil the effect of a quaint writer by drawing attention to our own pietism?

For Schoolmasters.

THE SCHOOLMASTERS YEAR-BOOK DIRECTORY FOR 1903. (Swan Sonnenschein. 5s.)

BEFORE opening the book the question occurs, Why Schoolmasters Year-book? Schoolmistresses are engaged in precisely the same occupation, and are as interested in all matters relating to teaching as schoolmasters. Why should this Directory divide what common aims, common aspirations, innumerable guilds and societies have brought together?

Within, we find, on a rough estimate, the names of from 7,000 to 8,000 teachers, who represent, allowing thirty pupils to a teacher, about a quarter of a million boys in attendance at non-primary schools in the British Isles. Again, in a large town like Leeds, we find some 1,200 boys in secondary schools accounted for. Clearly the Editor's nine months' labour needs supplementing.

The first part contains much useful information concerning organisations and examinations, and the third part of 100 pages is filled with articles by educational experts and reviews of educational books.

Mr. Minchin, in an article on the reform of mathematical teaching, covers with well-deserved ridicule the staunch adherents of Euclid—the book whose authority has done so much to keep geometry out of the schools.

Mr. Gull writes ponderously on military training in secondary schools, and Mr. Cloudesley Brereton, whom we learn played La Crosse for Cambridge University, states the case for the Education Bill of 1902 very effectively. We must find space for one sentence: "The strength of English education lies in its diversity and elasticity; to substitute for it a rigid uniformity untempered by that passion for knowledge that is the virida ris of German education, would be a national disaster."

The Editor has done a little well, but the Directory is very incomplete in many respects, and we hope that before long no master's name will appear unless he can produce a teacher's diploma. Meanwhile the most pressing thing is a complete list of secondary and proprietary schools classified as efficient and inefficient. This is a task which the new Education Committees will have to undertake.

Text Books, School Books, &c.

English.

THE business of selling school-books, especially annotated texts, is evidently a very profitable one, although but little of the profit generally finds its way to its actual compiler; and there is a good deal of competition amongst rival publishers to secure a cut of it. This shows itself, on the one hand, by much ingenuity in the devising of new and often experimental features; on the other, by a less desirable tendency to multiply practically identical editions of the more obvious texts, or to apply the old methods to others, which, perhaps because they were not really suitable, have escaped being so handled before. And in the meantime, in the opinion of many well competent to judge, the day of annotated texts is at an end. It is rapidly coming to be recognised that, though they certainly save labour for the teacher, they equally save the necessity for an expenditure of mental energy on the part of the pupil, and the school-book of the future will probably be a well-selected and well-printed but plain text, the comment to which, where comment is wanted, will be supplied by the teacher himself.

NEITHER series makes its appearance for the first time. Each in its way is good. "The Picture Shakespeare" has brief, although sufficient explanatory matter. No form of treatment, however, will make "Hamlet" a possible play for junior classes. Messrs. Dent's plays are adaptations for school use of a well-known edition for the general reader. Although a trifle less full, it is on the scale of the well-known "Pitt Press" and "Warwick" series. Its archaeological illustrations are interesting, but occasionally need explanation. Both editions have also imaginative illustrations by modern artists, which seem to us less helpful. And the coloured ones should certainly be excluded, for nothing is so unattractive as cheap colour printing.

MACBETH. "The Student's Shakespeare." Edited by A. W. Verity. (Cambridge University Press.)

MACBETH. "The Pitt Press Shakespeare for Schools." Edited by A. W. Verity. (Cambridge University Press.)

Two new editions of Macbeth, both having the same editor. The "Student's" edition is an amplification of the "Pitt Press" edition, the former being especially designed for candidates preparing for such examination as that for the Higher Certificate of the Oxford and Cambridge Joint Board. Both editions should admirably serve their purpose, though we should be inclined to recommend the fuller edition to all students who are interested in more than mere "cram."

PARADISE LOST. Books V. and VI. Edited by Flora Masson. (Dent. 1s. 4d.)

THIS has the minimum both of introduction and notes, and these are largely drawn from the excellent editions by Miss Masson's namesake. The chief defect of the book is that the print, although clear, is a trifle too small for young eyes.

MILTON'S ODE ON THE MORNING OF CHRIST'S NATIVITY. Edited by M. O. Kennedy. (Blackie. 2d.)

SELECT POEMS OF KEATS AND SHELLEY. Edited by E. H. Blakeney. (Blackie. 2d.)

MESSRS. BLACKIE have succeeded in producing these little paper-covered volumes (of about thirty-two pages each) at a wonderfully cheap rate. An extra penny will procure a cloth binding. The editorial work, however, is unequal. The two excerpts from Milton are well enough done; but Mr. Blakeney's Keats and Shelley are a great deal too ambitious and literary. The parallel passages quoted are alone more than we should either expect or desire for the money.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. Edited by E. E. Smith. (Black. 1s. 4d.)

UNFORTUNATELY Miss Smith does not give us Bunyan, but Bunyan pruned and abridged with a liberal hand to serve as a "Continuous Reader." This is a very different thing and a very unnecessary bit of vandalism. Several pencils have contributed to the illustrations; one of them, responsible for the designs representing "Experience" and "Worldly Wiseman" has a vigorous and effective touch.

SKELETON GERMAN GRAMMAR. By Prof. H. G. ATKINS, M.A., King's College, London. Printed in red and black, 1s. 6d.

SKELETON FRENCH GRAMMAR. By Prof. H. G. ATKINS, M.A., King's College, London. Printed in red and black, 1s. 6d.

The Modern Language Quarterly (Dec. 1902) says:—"This appears, in my opinion, the best attempt that has been made to provide us with the essentials of French Grammar in as small a compass as possible. Hitherto such a book has not been known to me, but now Prof. Atkins in these 51 pages has given us sufficient for the first two or three years of a student's career. The device of printing in red the important points, such as the endings of verbs, is an enormous advantage, and must strike a student's eye at once, should remain photographed in his memory. The book is so good that I venture to suggest a few points that, in my opinion, would make it even better still."—DR. V. PAYEN-PAYNE.

The Guardian (Jan. 7th) says:—"This is, on the whole, one of the best summaries of mere elementary grammar at present available."

The School World (Jan. 1903) says:—"It seems a pity that the book was not written in French; at least that is what the teacher on reform lines will think. Others will welcome it unreservedly."

First Latin Course

A LATIN BOOK FOR BEGINNERS. Based on Conversation throughout. By E. H. SCOTT, B.A., and FRANK JONES, B.A. 1s. 6d.

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The School World (Jan. 1903) says:—"The most noteworthy books of 1902 (classics). There is one which may be said to mark a new epoch in the teaching of Latin, and this must have the place of honour. A First Latin Course, by Scott and Jones (Blackie). This is quite the best book published hitherto for beginners, and we venture to prophesy that this, or others written on the same principle, will supersede all existing manuals."

The Journal of Education (Oct. 1902) says:—"We greatly prefer this Latin book for beginners to the comic Latin Primer, which was the last book of the kind we noticed. This bears on the face of it the marks of direct experience. The plan of the book is thoroughly sound, and it has been well carried out."

SCOTT'S LORD OF THE ISLES. Edited by F. H. Flather. (Pitt Press. 2s.)

MR. FLATHER'S work is well and conscientiously done, but the notes are rather difficult for boys of the "Scott" age; and the introduction is too much inclined to quotation. The opinions of Jeffery, although not without interest to the student of literary criticism, hardly concern nowadays the reader of poetry. A more important objection to the book is that "The Lord of the Isles" could scarcely be preferred either to "Marmion" or to "The Lady of the Lake," and that no boy would have time to study a third poem by Scott in so minute and detailed a fashion.

MISS THOMSON'S school-books always seem to us amongst the most attractive of those which we receive. The two before us have decorative covers and delightful illustrations by the Misses Stratton. A child could have no more fascinating introduction into the happy fields of Greek and mediæval romance. Beyond the selection in the one case and its retelling in the other, there is hardly any editing; but as we have pointed out above, that is the goal to which we are now tending.

THE HEROES. By Charles Kingsley. Edited by Ernest Gardner. (Pitt Press. 2s.)

FOR more than one generation Charles Kingsley's book has been the introduction to romance, and doubtless will be for many more. Prof. Gardner, than whom could be no better authority, has equipped "Perseus," "Theseus," and "The Argonauts" with notes which can do no harm, and with maps and a series of reproductions from Greek vases which are a very real gain.

THE FAERY QUEENE. Book I. By Edmund Spenser. Edited by William Keith Lensk. (Blackie. 2s.)

THE editor, because "young gentlemen generally has been over-dosed with taters," in his notes has cut down the philological element to the utmost, though he has preserved the Spenserian spelling for the sake of its piquancy. His notes comprise a good deal of such comparative criticism as makes them proper for the use of schools in which the Latin classics hold their own as the standard of letters.

ESSAY ON CRITICISM. By Alexander Pope. Edited by B. M. Wantilove. (Dent.)

AN excellent contribution to Dent's "Temple Series of English Texts." The introduction is sound and lucid; the text is clear and faithful; the notes are scholarly and sufficient.

THE LORD OF THE ISLES. By Sir Walter Scott. Edited with Biographical Introduction, Notes, and Glossary by W. Keith Lensk. With numerous illustrations. (Dent.)

IT is good to see Scott frankly recognised as a classic. "There is no rank or condition," said Ruskin, "of which he has not shown the loveliest aspect." And his present editor lays a wise finger on the secret of the momentary neglect which has befallen his work when he writes: "His very simplicity, like that of Homer, has perplexed the smaller critics." This poem is well printed, with sufficient serviceable notes.

THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL. By Sir Walter Scott. With Introduction and Notes by Ernest S. Davies. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d.)

THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL. ("Sir Walter Scott" Continuous Readers.) By Ernest S. Davies. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 4d.)

THE editor of these two books is making progress with his laudable work of introducing Scott to the modern British boy. Eight of the novels have been reproduced under his editorship, and the present is the tenth of the "Continuous Readers." In both cases the work of Sir Walter is introduced with a broad and wise discretion, and annotated with tact and simplicity that does not exclude occasional snatches of curious research.

THE DALE READERS. Book I. Written by Nellie Dale. (Philip. 1s.)

FURTHER NOTES ON THE TEACHING OF ENGLISH READING. By Nellie Dale. (Philip. 3s.)

BOTH volumes belong to a series in which Miss Dale endeavours to put the teaching of reading upon a scientific basis, and to correlate it with the natural development in childhood at once of the perceptions and of the instinct to find means of expression in rudimentary artistic and dramatic forms. It would be impossible to speak too highly of the freshness and ingenuity with which the methods suggested are worked out, and illustrations provided for them. The whole scheme is a little difficult to follow in this fragmentary shape; but it is clearly capable of affording endless stimulus and suggestion to the kindergarten teacher, who has succeeded in thoroughly grappling with it. The "reader" has the advantage of innumerable and most charming little drawings by Mr. Walter Crane.

ENGLISH HISTORY ILLUSTRATED FROM ORIGINAL SOURCES, 1660-1715. By J. Neville Figgis. (Black. 2s. 6d.)

THE selections from contemporary narratives here gathered together are intended to form a history-book for the upper and middle forms of schools. The idea is a good one, and it is well worked out, the material available during the period chosen being of course abundant. It is suggested that the book might "supply the place of text-books, in the hands of a class." We should have thought that it was admirably designed to supplement a text-book. Some thread of continuous narrative is essential to form a background for the series of exceedingly interesting scraps provided. And even then there will be a good many allusions which will require a wide and detailed knowledge in the teacher to supplement Mr. Figgis's rather sparse notes.

COLONIAL CHILDREN. Selected and Annotated by Albert Bushnell Hart. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d.)

THIS book belongs to a series of "Source-Readers in American History," and is much on the lines of that by Mr. Figgis. But it was rather idle to import it into this country, as, however useful in America, it would serve no purpose in the education of English children.

THE COMPLETE HISTORY READERS. Book V. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

TWO hundred pages cover the whole of English history from the "Celts or Britons," to the coronation of Edward VII. Naturally the result is terribly arid and chippy. There are a number of illustrations, but they are not very attractive, and the coloured ones are particularly hot and ugly.

JAMES I. to JAMES IV. History in Biography (Vol. IV.). By H. J. Powell. (Black. 2s.)

THIS book, according to the scheme of the series to which it belongs, presents the history of its period in the form of biography. The inevitable element of partisanship is neutralised by a frank recitation of authorities; by reference to which, for instance, the youthful reader may evade the peril of conversion to the standpoint of High Church Anglicanism, while he is stimulated to a serious study of the history of his country. "Illustrative maps, pictures, and genealogical tables are also given, and a full index, which, it is hoped, may be found useful in training young students to compare and rearrange facts for themselves, and to work out subjects from the incidental references scattered through the different biographies."

THE MAKING OF ENGLAND. The Temple History Readers. Second Book. By R. T. Yates. (Dent. 1s. 3d.)

THIS is a Reader for Standard IV. The story starts from a Druidical Altar near Bradford and concludes with the Great Charter in a passage (adapted) from Macaulay. Edward "did, however, build a great church close to his own palace at Westminster, on the site of an older church, and which was known as the Church of the Abbey of Westminster, but now generally called Westminster Abbey, though" Such is the style of it.

Latin and Greek.

POEMS OF OVID, SELECTIONS. By Prof. Wesley Bain. (Macmillan. 6s.)

A NEW feature of this volume are word-lists grouped according to their roots; for instance, under the root H A B, besides the ordinary words which will occur to all, we find "debeo" (de + habeo) praebeo, habena. As far as we know this is the first time that Aryan roots have been used as an aid to memorise kindred words. Another feature is the selections, with notes at the foot of the pages, for sight reading. The volume represents a lot of work, and few students will desire a more intimate familiarity with Ovid's work than is here supplied.

THE ODES OF HORACE. By Stephen Gwynn. (Blackie. 5s.)

THE most interesting part of this edition of Horace's Odes is the introduction. "Horace," says the editor, "is pre-eminently the poet of those who do not care for poetry." We would gladly have spared Mr. Gwynn the trouble of writing notes which are in no way distinguished, for essays on Horace as a literary artist. Why Horace ever got into the class-room at all is a question much better worth Mr. Gwynn's consideration than sparking his notes with excellent paraphrases. Horace is the very last poet to put into the hands of a schoolboy, not that the schoolboy has an instinct for poetry, but because the experiences upon which Horace draws are alien both to the imagined and realised experiences of youth. His patriotic odes at the beginning of the third book do not ring true. The real Horace comes out in his odes to his mistresses and in the pathetic insincerity of the Seventh Ode, book IV. "You may turn over Horace," truly says the editor, "from cover to cover without meeting a thought which might not have occurred to anyone; there are platitudes on almost every page."

We hope Mr. Gwynn will not follow this volume with volumes on the Epistles and Satires—Messrs. Wilkins and Gow may be left securely to that task—but we do hope that he will continue to interest us along the lines of the present felicitous introduction.

LATIN ELEGIACS. By C. H. St. L. Russell. (Macmillan.)

THE whole of the material for practice in writing elegiacs is here—all that the pupil has to do is to so re-arrange the order of words that the metrical rules are kept. In this way he learns very rapidly quantity and scansion, a necessary preliminary to the writing of nonsense verses or bad paraphrases of good poems.

CÆSAR'S GALLIC WAR. Book I. Edited by Prof. A. S. Wilkins. Books II. and III. Edited by A. C. Paterson. (Dent.)

IN the absence of a preface we do not know what the ideas are of the editors in publishing these books. In most respects they resemble many other editions of Cæsar's Commentary. Both volumes are well done; notes, illustrations, introduction, and vocabulary overcome for the pupil every difficulty saving the difficulty of his own initial effort.

STUDIES IN THEOGNIS. By E. Harrison. (Cambridge Press.)

THE object of these studies is to demonstrate that Theognis "wrote all or nearly all the poems which are extant under his name." It is a learned work almost wholly taken up with textual criticism, and we are confident that students of Theognis as well as classical scholars generally will welcome this addition to the literature of the poet. The text of about 1,400 lines with variants is prefixed to the essays for reference.

CICERO PRO LEGE MANILIA AND PRO ARCHIA. By K. P. Wilson. (Blackwood. 1s. 6d.)

LIVY. Book 28. By Middleton and Souter. (Blackwood. 1s. 6d.)

WE have referred so frequently in high praise of this series that it must suffice to say here that these books maintain the standard of the earlier volumes.

THE ILIAD. Vol. ii. Books 13–24. By W. Leaf. (Macmillan. 18s.)

THE first edition of this volume was issued in 1888. This edition does not differ in any important particulars from that. The attention of scholars need not be called to this work, but the young student who finds Homer only moderately difficult would do well to keep this volume by him for reference. The appendices are particularly interesting.

THE REPUBLIC OF PLATO. By James Adam. Vols. I. and II. (Cambridge Press. 15s. and 18s. net.)

WE cannot pretend to do more than call attention to this very able and learned work. Mr. Adam has prepared these volumes for scholars, and has, we regret, carefully avoided discussing those questions which are interesting to the intelligent reader of Greek literature who is not, however, necessarily interested in textual criticism and detailed exegesis. At the same time the fixing of the text and the examination of disputed meanings must necessarily precede fruitful discussion. How well Mr. Adam could write these essays on Platonism a very cursory glance through the notes and appendices abundantly proves. Such studies the editor is so far from undervaluing that he expressly states that he has held himself back from these discussions in order that he might the better do his work as commentator. The appendices deal mainly with readings, but they also contain valuable, if brief, articles on Plato's theory of ideas, astronomy and education. These volumes represent years of patient labour, and yet the editor sends them into the world glowing with an ardour which we associate rather with a neophyte than a ripe scholar.

A FIRST GREEK READER. By R. A. A. Beresford and R. N. Douglas. (Blackie. 2s.)

THE text is made up of simple sentences and short consecutive pieces composed by the authors, the subject matter of which turns on the myths and history of Greece. It is admirably illustrated and carefully graduated. The beginner can use it as soon as he knows the simple tenses of a regular verb and the declension of nouns and adjectives. The vocabulary gives the principal tenses of all irregular verbs.

ANCIENT GREEK LITERATURE. By H. N. Fowler. (Hirschfeld Bros. 6s. net.)

"THE book," says the author, "contains little or nothing which should not be familiar to every educated man and woman." This sentence sets forth a curious heresy of writers; the idea of makers of text-books seems to be that what is in their books should be known by all, whereas our conception of an educated person is one who has used his time and brains to lay hold of principles and to interpret life through his experiences. Let us look at two ways of writing a literary history: one way is, to give the reader a concrete example of a writer's work, to give him a chance for a brief moment of watching an antique mind at work; and, to indicate the intellectual, artistic, social, economic environment of this mind. With such history the student gets a glimpse of the coming age, sees the moving drama; his imagination and intelligence are stimulated to anticipate the future. Another way is to take a writer like Aristotle, say where and when he was born, what he produced, and what school of philosophy he created. The latter is Mr. Fowler's method, a method which is only useful in so far as it supplements the reader's knowledge of Aristotle gained through his works. Therefore we consider that had Mr. Fowler definitely formulated to himself what is meant by being educated, he would not have confused an educative process with the mere acquisition of facts. He would know, for instance, that the only justification in this century for a text-book is that every person using it intelligently would be in process of being educated. This much has been called forth in criticism because this book purports to be abreast of the best thinking of the time, and is produced under the agis of Harvard, Yale, and Princetown Universities. No writer of a twentieth century text-book can afford to ignore the psychological data which the scientific departments of these and other American Universities are steadily accumulating.

On the old lines, then, the book is well written; it is full of illustrations, and contains a useful bibliography.

SENECA'S TRAGEDIES. By W. Bradshaw. (Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.)

"SENECA'S TRAGEDIES" reach the nadir of dulness, and we cannot respect Dr. Bradshaw sufficiently for carrying through this self-imposed task to the end. It is true that Dr. Bradshaw is angry with the critics who deny the title of poet and tragedian to Seneca, and is finely careless of the "aspersions" that have been levelled at the character of Seneca, but this only proves Dr. Bradshaw's superiority to the critics, and in no way detracts from the monumental grandeur of his work. Had it not been for Dr. Bradshaw we might never have had an English translation of these forgotten tragedies; for, as the translator very wisely notes, those who cannot read the foreign language in which the translation is made would naturally be "quite at sea in comprehending them" (the tragedies). Our gratitude to Dr. Bradshaw can only be faintly indicated here by giving a quotation—all too short—from the Oldipus:—

TIRESIAS. "Which of the two was the more lively, after the smaller wound, or did the blood flow more freely after the deeper gashes?"

MANTO. "A perfect river flowed from the opening where the chest was laid bare—the heavy blows only resulted in a small escapement, but a great quantity of blood seemed to make a retroflex course, and showed itself about the eyes and mouth."

After this we can believe quite readily, without reference to the Latin, that Dr. Bradshaw has rendered Seneca into English prose "as equivalently as the idioms of both languages permit."

ST. MARK IN GREEK. By Sir A. F. Hort. (Cambridge Press.)

FOR boys who are ready for an easy reader this Gospel is well adapted for the purpose. The editor has done his work as if interested in it, and there must be few difficulties left when those in the notes are known.

XENOPHON CYROPAEDEIA. Book i. By E. S. Shuckburgh. (Cambridge Press.)

THE notes and introduction are founded on those of H. A. Holden. This edition contains a complete vocabulary.

XENOPHON'S ANABASIS I. Edited by C. E. Brownrigg. (Blackie.)

THIS is a reprint of the 1894 edition; it is illustrated, and much improved in many respects.

French and German.

SIEPMANN'S PRIMARY FRENCH COURSE, FIRST TERM. (Macmillan. 1s. 6d.)

SIEPMANN'S PRIMARY FRENCH COURSE, FIRST YEAR. (2s. 6d.)

WE have advocated in these columns for several years the use in teaching French of the phonetic script, preferably that of the Association Phonétique Internationale, because it is an invaluable aid to correct pronunciation. Also, since it is better that a child should learn one thing at a time, the words in his first reader in any language should be spelt phonetically and the ordinary spelling should be carefully kept out of sight. If English people were to read through a newspaper in phonetic symbols, they would learn with surprise how many words they habitually mispronounce. Again, when a reader is illustrated the pictures should be pictures and not symbols, nor should they do violence to a child's experience by crowding together a quite impossible series of forms merely for their symbolic value. And finally, the language learnt must be learnt in the language itself. This does not mean, of course, that English should never be spoken, it only means that each pupil should have as much conversational practice as possible each lesson. The above primer satisfies all these conditions, and we hope that those teachers who still stand aloof from the reform method will give it a trial. After the first term Mr. Siepmann resumes the ordinary script, but we think that for quite a year this change might with advantage be deferred.

RACINE'S ATHALIE. By Prof. F. C. de Sumichrast. (Macmillan.)

ALL that careful and sympathetic editing can do Prof. de Sumichrast has done for this play. The high place which Voltaire gave to Racine in referring to this play as "le dernier effort de l'esprit humain"—an estimate which he afterwards withdrew—is no longer held by critics. When the editor says that Athalie is not inferior to the greatest work of Æschylus or Sophocles, he is using the language of predilection, not of criticism. The plays of Sophocles give us the age of Pericles at its highest; we can, through them, think ourselves back into Athenian life and ideals, but Racine's art does not enable us to re-create his age. The slow movement of the action, the long explanatory speeches, the complete absence of everything which we think of as characteristic of the Gaulois spirit are sufficient to forbid our leaving a place for Athalie among the world's few great masterpieces; but it is a great play—perhaps the greatest derivative play ever written. The author's high opinion of Racine nowhere interferes with its usefulness as a class-book, and we heartily commend this volume to all teachers in search of a well-edited play of Racine.

LE BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME. Edited by M. A. Gerotwohl. (Blackie. 8d.)

YEAR by year we wait, apparently in vain, for the editor of French classics who will give us the notes, in French, at the foot of the page, and where a vocabulary is added to trust us with French-French rather than French-English. It is often said that boys do not use the notes in a book; it is quite true, they abuse them by reading the English. If a French metaphor is turned into a corresponding English one, he does not stop to ask the literal meaning of the French or how it would be expressed unmetaphorically. For instance, why should not the equivalent of "tient bien au cœur" be given in French rather than in English? If French were used throughout, the objection to notes at the foot of the page would disappear, and the pupil would, from beginning to end of his lesson, hear and read nothing but French. Let such editions of classical and modern texts be published, and we are confident that they will soon banish from the schools the hybrid stock.

CONTES ET PRÉCEPTES. Edited by F. B. Kirkman.

RIRES ET LARMES. Edited by F. B. Kirkman. (Black. 6d. each.)

THE interest of these books is in the promise they contain of companion volumes which will supply the teacher with questions for voir et oïre work in the text, with exercises in grammar and composition. The illustrations are to be used too according to the Reform method. Here a caution seems necessary: the pictures must be primarily interesting as pictures. To draw a head or a human body and map it out with parallel lines with numbers at the end of them is to learn a language at the expense of aesthetics, a tendency which must be resisted, especially in these days when science and mathematics are encroaching on the domain of literature and drawing. It is only fair to add that some of the drawings are quite tolerable.

MEDIEVAL FRENCH LITERATURE. By Gaston Paris. (Dent. 1s.)

No one was more competent to write on mediæval literature than M. Gaston Paris. All workers in that field know well their great indebtedness to him, and few are the books dealing with linguistic research which do not bear witness in some form or other to his labours. But just as it by no means follows that a Wrangler will be able to write an elementary text-book on geometry, or to treat, indeed, any branch of his subject freshly, so something more than scholarship, accuracy and gifts necessary for writing books for students is needed for compressing into a primer an enormous quantity of material, and of arranging the matter in such a way that the reader ignorant of the original literature may find the reading not only interesting, but also helpful to him as a guide through the maze of mediæval literature. M. Gaston Paris has done for a part of French literature what Stopford Brooke's little book did for English. This admirable primer supplements two other books, recently noticed in these columns: Prof. Weekley's "Primer of French Literature," and Messrs. Strong and Barnett's "Historical French Reader." All three volumes prove conclusively that a primer need not be a "cram" book, and that an elementary knowledge of a subject need not be superficial.

We have left space for a short quotation, which may give some idea of the interest of the book, if not of its structure and completeness:—

It is in reading them [the prose passages of "Aucassin and Nicolette"] that we understand why the French of the middle ages seemed so "délicable" to foreigners; impossible to imagine a language at once more precise and more expressive, more simple and more supple. It is handled by an artist who knows the value of words and the rhythm of phrases, and who joins the candour of a child's soul to a certain malicious irony, and who, besides, has a very lively sense of the picturesque and plastic . . . This work, both delicate and simple, naïve and affected, recalls the most daintily wrought mediæval ivories bequeathed to us by an art comparable with the author's; with the song of Roland of quite a different kind, it is without doubt what posterity will preserve as most representative of French poetry in the middle ages.

BERTHE AUX GRANDS PIEDS. By Mrs. J. G. Fraser. (Black. 6d.)

THE only justification for re-telling Adenet's dull story is probably that Mrs. Fraser chose to do it. We are certain that from the coinage of her own brain Mrs. Fraser could find something which would better repay the young reader's time than this forceless and wearisome fairy tale. There are a few notes, a vocabulary, illustrations and an amusing preface—in charming contrast with the legend.

COLUMBA. By P. Mérimée. Edited by E. T. Schoedelin. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

THIS famous story of a vendetta may have a new lease of life granted it by Mr. Gosse's inclusion of it in his translations of nineteenth century French masterpieces. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has been familiar in the class-room; and the reason of its being such a favourite with boys is not the impeccable style in which it is written, but Mérimée's marvellous gift for telling a story without once letting the reader's attention flag. Besides a full vocabulary, there are sixty pages of notes.

CHICOT CHEZ HENRI DE NAVARRE. Edited by A. Florian. (Black. 6d.)

THIS excellent selection from Dumas' "Quarante Cinq" is a delightful reading-book for boys.

MADemoiselle de la Seiglière. Edited by A. R. Ropes. (Cambridge Press.)

THIS edition contains an introduction followed by text, and nearly 60 pp. of notes.

SELECTIONS FROM L'INSECTE, Michelet; CONTES FANTASTIQUES, Erckmann-Chatrian; POEMS FOR RECITATION; AN EPISODE DE GUERRE, Stendhal; LA MULE DU POPE, Daudet; SELECTIONS, Buffon; SELECT BALLADS, Schiller; THE NIEBELUNGENLIED, Part I.; DIE HARTZEISE, Heine. (Blackie's Little Classics. 4d. each.)

A USEFUL little series of texts, which we have commended in former issues.

GERMAN IDIOMS AND PROVERBS. By A. Oswald. (Blackie.)

MR. OSWALD has collected in this book of 116 pp. some very important idioms. He does not suggest how they are to be learnt.

PRACTICAL GERMAN COMPOSITION. By A. Oswald. (Blackie.)

THIS book has three parts: hints to the translator; pieces to be done into German; special vocabulary for each piece.

A NATURALIST IN INDIAN SEAS. By A. Alcock. (John Murray. 18s. net.)

TEXT-BOOK OF PALEONTOLOGY. Volume II. By Karl A. Von Zittel. Translated and edited by Charles R. Eastman. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

A UNIVERSITY TEXT-BOOK OF BOTANY. By Douglas H. Campbell. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 17s. net.)

MINERALOGY. By Henry A. Miers. (Macmillan. 25s. net.)

DR. ALCOCK's handsome volume, written as it is in simple, interesting language, irresistibly reminds the reader of certain books which have become biological classics—books like Darwin's "Voyage of the Beagle," and Wallace's "Malay Archipelago," to name two examples. It is the story of four years with the Royal Indian Marine ship "Investigator," which Dr. Alcock joined in 1888 in the capacity of surgeon-naturalist. The "Investigator" was only a wooden paddle-steamer of 581 tons displacement, but the life aboard her, to judge from the narrative before us, and the numerous important memoirs which have come under our notice from time to time, must have been both exhilarating and scientifically profitable. The task with which the crew of the little steamer was entrusted was to assist, by careful surveying, in safeguarding navigation along the local lines of commerce, and as opportunity should offer, to gain some knowledge of the hydrography of the local sea-basins, of their depth and temperature, of the deposits forming in their abysses, and of the life that inhabits them. Of this oceanic life Dr. Alcock has much to say that will prove absorbing even to the general reader, and his narrative reads in places like a fairy tale. In one part we are told of a blanket-crab,—the result of an extraordinary partnership: "a hermit-crab and a sea-anemone live together; the hermit-crab, being by nature a very ill-clad and vulnerable animal, acquires by the partnership a thick and easily adjustable greatcoat, while the sea-anemone, being by nature a hopeless lump of an animal, dependent on chance currents for its food and oxygen, acquires an engine and an intelligent engine driver all in one, which are always carrying it in the way of the necessities of life." In another place the strange doings of a little beast, half amphibian and half fish, are described. This tiny goby fish, though it breathes by gills, has a passion for the land, and may always be seen ashore during the daytime, basking in the sun or hunting for food, raising itself on its breast fin as a man whose legs are paralysed might use his arms. When pursued, it takes great springs, and if it cannot escape into the sea will dive down a crab's burrow, or dash into a bunch of mangrove roots. But these two instances are merely typical of a multitude of wonderful cases of adaptation to surrounding circumstances; if space permitted, details of the way in which crabs have grown to look like the coral among which they live, might be given, or the history of a deep sea shrimp in which the eyes are completely aborted, and the eyestalks reduced to scales so that the animal is completely blind.

The volume is, indeed, full of interesting information about the inhabitants of Indian seas, and it reveals Dr. Alcock as an ardent and sympathetic observer of nature. The descriptions are accompanied by 98 beautifully reproduced illustrations—some of which, by the way, are from drawings by Babu Shih Chunder Mondul and his predecessor, Babu Abhoya Charn Chowdry, artists to the Marine Survey. The book can be confidently recommended as an inspiring addition to a school library, or as a gift book to any person interested in natural history.

The second volume of Prof. Zittel's "Text-Book of Palæontology," is wholly taken up with detailed descriptions of fossil fishes, amphibians, reptiles, and birds, and corresponds to the third volume of the author's "Handbuch." In preparing this English edition, Dr. Eastman has had the assistance of Dr. A. S. Woodward in dealing with the fishes, of Dr. E. C. Case in the section describing the amphibians, of Profs. Osborn and Willeston, and of Dr. Hay and Mr. Hatcher in writing the chapters on reptiles, while Mr. Lucas has assisted in the description of the birds. The result of this strong combination has been to produce a book better adapted for the use of students than the original, and in closer touch with recent work; Dr. Traquair's discoveries of fossil fishes, for instance, are fully described. Somewhat technical as the book is, a glance through it is enough to remind the student that there has been a gradual evolution in the animal forms which have from age to age appeared on the earth. But while many animal types have completely disappeared to give place to others more suited to the existing environment, here and there the record of the rocks reveals traces of animal forms which have persisted from one geological age to another, and are to be found living in some parts of the earth to-day. For instance, the mud-fishes of certain South African and South American rivers, Protopterus and Lepidosiren as they are respectively known to zoologists, and the Burnett salmon of Queensland, differ very little from dipnoid fishes found in abundance, as fossils, in Palaeozoic and Mesozoic rock formations in each one of the great continents. Then, there is the lizard-like reptile of New Zealand, Hatteria, which is the sole survivor of an ancient and primitive order of reptiles which reached the zenith of their glory in the geological age called Triassic. Other examples could be given from the present volume, while, if the preceding parts of the text-book could be drawn upon, quite an imposing array of these persistent types could be marshalled.

This new volume of the English edition of Prof. Zittel's Text-Book is one of those standard works of science which the student who would make real progress must consult. There is no other book which so well represents the present state of knowledge of the branches of palæontology.

In passing to the consideration of Prof. Campbell's treatise on botany, the animal kingdom is replaced by the world of plants. But the phenomena of life are still the subject of study, and as Prof. Campbell shows in his introductory chapter, the essential structure of plants and animals is extraordinarily similar,—so similar, indeed, that among the simpler forms it is often difficult to decide the kingdom to which they belong. Reviewing, as the author does, the whole of the vegetable world, there is to be found in his book a description of the remarkable diversity which characterises plant life. In one place the bacteria are described; they comprise the simplest of all known organisms, as well as the smallest; but nevertheless the existence of all the higher forms of life more or less directly depend upon them. Then, after acquainting himself with organisms such as these, so small some of them that it is difficult to make out their structure under the highest practicable magnifying power, the student may find in another part of the volume a description of the oak, while the frontispiece shows one of the big trees of California, the largest living specimens of which are probably over two thousand years old.

Though almost everything that Prof. Campbell has to say is the direct outcome of experiment and observation, his book is in no sense a laboratory manual; it is rather a work of reference, and intended as it was primarily for American students, the greater number of illustrative examples are taken from American plants. This will in some measure detract from its usefulness as a text-book in English classes, though it should serve a very useful purpose as a supplementary volume to those which deal exclusively with British flora. The illustrations are abundant and good, and the treatise may be consulted with confidence.

Prof. Miers writes on a branch of inanimate nature; but though minerals are non-living things, some of their characteristics suggest the phenomena of life; for crystals grow, not only in size, but sometimes in such a way as to repair any damage which they may have experienced. But apart from these facts, minerals have little in common with living things. Prof. Miers, who is one of our highest authorities in mineralogy, only treats of the characters and properties of minerals. He has left on one side the consideration of their modes of occurrence, their geological distribution, their origin, and their artificial reproduction, so as to give more space for the task he had in hand. The consequence is that we are here provided with a work on the characters and properties of minerals which will take its place side by side with Dana's "Text-Book of Mineralogy" and similar standard treatises. The letter-press is illustrated by 666 figures and two plates, which are excellent examples of three-colour colotype printing.

Students of mining and crystallography have looked forward to the publication of this book, and now that it is available they will have at hand a trustworthy book of reference that will clear up every difficulty as it arises, and provide material for the identification of doubtful minerals.

WAVES AND RIPPLES IN WATER, AIR, AND ÆTHER. By J. A. Fleming. (S.P.C.K. 5s.)

THIS book represents a course of Christmas lectures delivered at the Royal Institution. Starting with waves in water, Dr. Fleming first explains the way in which these waves result from movements of the separate water particles, movements which are repeated again and again while the several particles along any line perform the same motion one after the other, that is lagging behind each other, and not simultaneously. A more detailed examination of surface waves follows, and a distinction is drawn between waves and ripples. Then follows an examination of the interference, reflection, and refraction of waves in water. The waves and ripples made by ships, the waves in air which constitute sound, a comparison of sound and music, electric oscillations and electric waves, and a study of the waves and ripples of the æther form the subjects of successive lectures. No one can read these clear expositions without appreciating what an important part waves take in producing natural phenomena. Without air waves there would be the most absolute silence; without the wave motion in the æther a profound darkness would reign perpetually, and the wonders of wireless telegraphy be unknown. Though it is difficult for a person with no scientific training to understand fully the question of wave motion, Dr. Fleming's simple language and lucid explanations will go a long way towards clearing up the difficulties surrounding the subject, even though sometimes it is difficult to imagine some of the results described without seeing the experiments which accompanied the lectures. The book deserves to be widely popular.

Logic.

AN INTRODUCTORY TEXT-BOOK OF LOGIC. By Sidney H. Mellone. (Blackwood. 5s.)

DR. MELLONE deals with what is often regarded as an uninteresting subject in a pleasing and instructive manner, and he will probably secure many readers. His treatment of logic is characterised by the abundance of the examples he has drawn from various branches of science, and this should go a long way to interest students of science in his book, a result which is to be hoped for since they are perhaps a little too apt to think their logical faculty is sufficiently developed by the series of mental exercises their own work necessitates. Dr. Mellone does not pretend to have exhausted the essentials of logic in his book; he intends it rather as an introduction to the numerous, more complete treatises, which are already available.

Geography.

A GEOGRAPHY OF EGYPT AND THE ANGLO-EGYPTIAN SUDAN. By H. W. Mardon. (Blackie. 2s.)

THE BRITISH EMPIRE. By L. W. Lyde. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 4d.)

THESE books both reflect the improvement which has taken place in recent years in the teaching of geography in schools. Instead of the arid lists of names to be learnt by heart, the pupil is provided with interesting descriptions of countries and peoples. In these descriptions are to be found facts about the natural forms of the countries as well as of their climates and natural productions; while the industries of the people and what they have done in the way of communication, government, and education are all given due prominence. It is particularly noteworthy that successful efforts are being made by the writers of school geography books to exercise the reasoning powers of the pupil in addition to supplying attractive information.

Mr. Mardon's book is especially to be commended. His position in the Tewfikieh Training College at Cairo has provided him with an opportunity, of which he has made good use, to obtain a first-hand acquaintance with the country he describes, and with the assistance of numerous figures and a dozen coloured maps he has produced a text-book which should secure a good circulation. Mr. Lyde's book, too, is profusely illustrated, but some of the pictures scarcely justify their inclusion, since they do very little to form ideas of the places described, and are often unnecessarily large. The text is concise and simple, and will hold the reader's attention.

"The World's Work" leaps into success at a single bound."—BLACK AND WHITE.

THE EDUCATIONAL TIMES says: "The first two numbers of THE WORLD'S WORK give very high promise of usefulness. The subjects treated are of vital importance, the outlook is comprehensive, and the illustrations are numerous and good. We wish it the fullest success."

The World's Work,

AN ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE OF NATIONAL EFFICIENCY & SOCIAL PROGRESS.

Edited by HENRY NORMAN, M.P.

1s. net, Monthly.

15s. Yearly, Post Free.

The remarkable reception which THE WORLD'S WORK has met with from the public and the press, proves that it fills, and promises to fill brilliantly, an obvious gap in the periodical literature of this country. Its object is to present each month a picture of the activities of the world, particularly of the British World—in public life, in foreign affairs, in commerce, industry, science, invention, literature, art, and social life. It is instructive; it is entertaining; it is written by experts; it is lavishly illustrated.

THE WORLD'S WORK is the magazine of the educationalist and the efficient man; of the employer who desires to avail himself of all the latest methods, and the intelligent workman who wishes to rise in the world. In the December and January numbers there were articles (to mention only a few) on "How British Trade is Handicapped," by Sir Christopher Furness, M.P.; "Should We Abandon the Mediterranean," by Sir William Laird Clowes; "The Day's Work in a London Board School"; "Life Assurance and Civilisation"; "Music and Mechanism"; "Municipal Ownership"; "Men and Matters in America"; "Toy Making in France"; "Garden Cities in Theory and Practice"; "The Game and the Business of Football"; "Winter Sports"; "A School for Domestic Servants," &c., &c.

A series of articles on "Our Education: What it Is and What it Ought to Be" was begun in No. 1, Dr. Macnamara, M.P., writing on "Primary Education," and continued in No. 2 by Mr. Sidney Webb on "Higher Education." In the February number, the third article, by Professor W. J. Ashley, of Birmingham University, explains the new methods of an efficient Commercial Education.

THE WORLD'S WORK full-page portraits have already made a name for themselves. For the January number the PRIME MINISTER, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, M.P., Mr. John Redmond, M.P., the Rev. Canon Hensley Henson, and Mr. J. M. Barrie gave Specialittings for their portraits. The first number contained similarly exclusive full-page portraits of the Right Hon. James Bryce, M.P., Rev. Dr. Clifford, Lord Hugh Cecil, M.P., Mr. Lloyd-George, M.P., and Mr. R. L. Morant, C.B., the new Secretary of the Board of Education.

A Special Portrait of PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT will appear in the February number (ready January 25th), which will also contain articles on "Lord Curzon's Work in India," by Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P.; "British Cables and Public Administration," by Sir Edward Sassoon, Bart., M.P.; "The Romance of the Fur Trade"; "Science in British Hospitals"; "Manchester: its Commerce and Culture"; special contributions from America and Germany; and many other articles on topics of the day, and 82 illustrations.

Mr. Norman's editorial comments on the March of Events each month are widely quoted in the Press.

Particulars of a scheme whereby readers may secure the best books are given in each number.

THE STUDENT'S SHAKESPEARE.

The Tragedy of Macbeth. Edited for the use of Students by A. W. VERITY, M.A., sometime Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge. With Introduction, Notes, Glossary, Appendix, and Index. Pp. xlviii + 288. Pcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

In the present Edition, originally published as a Volume of "The Pitt Press Shakespeare for Schools," the wants of Candidates preparing for such Examinations as that for the Higher Certificate of the Oxford and Cambridge Joint Board, the Higher and Senior Local Examinations, and the Degree Examinations in different Universities, have been primarily considered.

PITT PRESS SHAKESPEARE FOR SCHOOLS.

Macbeth. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Glossary, by A. W. VERITY, M.A. New Edition. Pp. xxxvi + 208. 1s. 6d.

The Edition of this Play, published originally in "The Pitt Press Shakespeare for Schools" Series, having been considered too long and elaborate for school use, the present Edition has been prepared, which, it is believed, contains all that is practically wanted for the purpose. The earlier Edition, which was designed primarily to meet the needs of candidates preparing for the Higher Examinations, is now issued as a "Student's Edition."

ST. MATTHEW IN THE REVISED VERSION FOR SCHOOLS.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew. Revised Version. Edited, with Notes, for the Use of Schools, by the Rev. A. CARR, M.A., Vicar of Addington, Surrey, formerly Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. With Three Maps. Price 1s. 6d. net.

ST. MARK IN GREEK FOR BEGINNERS.

The Gospel according to St. Mark. The Greek Text. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, for the Use of Schools, by Sir A. F. HORT, Bart., M.A., Assistant-Master of Harrow School. With Two Maps. Price 2s. 6d. net.

* This Edition is intended for the use of boys who are just beginning to read the Greek Testament.

Studies in the History of Educational Opinion from the Renaissance. By S. S. LAURIE, A.M., LL.D., Professor of the Institutes and History of Education, University of Edinburgh. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Lectures on the History of the Nineteenth Century. Delivered at the Cambridge University Extension Summer Meeting, August, 1902. Edited by F. A. KIRKPATRICK, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Manchester Guardian.—"These lectures form an admirable introduction to the history of the Nineteenth Century. There is more useful information packed within the covers of this modest volume than in any book we have recently come across, and it should be mastered by everyone who undertakes to write or speak about or wishes to understand the condition of the present politics of the world."

The Students' Handbook to the University and Colleges of Cambridge. First issue. Corrected to June 30, 1902. Crown 8vo. 46s. pp. 3s. net.

Guardian.—"This is an extremely businesslike little book, well printed and comely in appearance, and a marvel of cheapness. For the modest sum of three shillings the intending or actual student and his friends can purchase all the information compressible into 400 odd pages, about present means and methods of education practised on the banks of the Cam."

The Antigone of Sophocles. With a Commentary, abridged from the large edition of Sir R. C. JESS, Litt.D., Regius Professor of Greek and Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, by E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A. Crown 8vo. 4s.

Educational Times.—"An edition of the first class of workmanship, and beautifully printed and got up."

The Beginnings of an Author.

If the truth of the maxim that the boy is the father of the man can be proved anywhere, it should surely be capable of demonstration in the department of letters, when the boy happens to have left written memorials which may be compared with those of the man. Such memorials remain for ever for the most leisurely and minute examination, and if evidence of paternity is to be found, supporters of the maxim may be relied upon to find it. The question is one of peculiar interest to critics, who are constantly being whipped with scorpions for not having prophesied before the event—as, for instance, in the case of Stevenson. On the whole, it must be asserted that the maxim is true—sometimes, but not by any means always. The critic too obtuse to perceive that the girl who wrote at fourteen—would ultimately “do something,” had deserved scorpions. But is there a single solitary trace of the future man in “Poems by Two Brothers,” or in that early volume of Shelley’s issued a few years ago? There is not. Could anyone be blamed for not foreseeing that the author of “Desperate Remedies” would write a book as good as “The Return of the Native” within seven years? Perhaps, for “Desperate Remedies” has atmosphere with its melodrama. Would Sainte-Beuve himself have guessed that Balzac, writing “Wann-Chlore” in 1825, would write “The Wild Ass’s Skin” in 1831? No. And so instances for and against the demonstration of the maxim might be adduced indefinitely. The evidence would seem to be divisible into four classes of case. First, that in which there is absolutely no proof whatever of coming greatness. Second, that in which the proof is doubtful, is in fact rather less than proof—a vague presumption. Third, that in which the proof is indubitable, but not definitive. Fourth, that in which the proof is indubitable, definitive, and complete. This fourth class is no doubt the smallest. Instances of it do not throng into the mind. One striking example of it has, however, recently been added to the museum by the publication of the “Early Prose Writings” of James Russell Lowell (Lane), the first American literary artist who lived by his pen.

She calls her ear

This slender volume, with its prefatory note by the venerable Edward Everett Hale, and its Introduction by Mr. Walter Littlefield, stands in no need of the somewhat elaborate double apology which is offered for it. There is a great deal of difference between republishing the first printed writings of a man of genius and republishing the mature but negligible trifles which were written by a man of genius in hours when his genius was reposing after fatigue. But the facts in Dr. Hale’s brief reminiscences, if not entirely new to the public, are diverting enough to read of again, and it is good to hear him state positively once more that Lowell’s Harvard friends knew as well in 1838 that Lowell was to be a distinguished poet, as they have since known that he became a distinguished poet. As for Mr. Littlefield’s appreciation of “Lowell in 1842,” it is a sound and just piece of work in the main, and the biographical detail in which it abounds will be the more welcome in that Mr. Scudder’s “official” Life of Lowell has not left any deep impression on the great heart of the British and American publics. Mr. Littlefield, by the way, makes short work of our maxim. “The early writings of a man of genius,” he says, “are usually unimportant.” Not often unimportant, but usually unimportant. He does not say in so many words that Lowell’s contributions to “The Boston Miscellany” and other superior short-lived periodicals are important. He is content judiciously to call them interesting. We think some of them, the essay on John Webster, for instance, might almost be deemed important.

In laying stress on Lowell’s youthful literariness, Mr. Littlefield shows perhaps less than his usual acumen. “He passed much of his time in tranquil book-walled alcoves. Often the college bell failed to arouse him; through the open window in summer would come the shouts of his mates at play, but Lowell, deep in the old poets—French and English, and later his dearly-beloved Calderon—would rarely heed these things except when awakened to the consciousness that his monthly reports from the Dean would give his reverend father distress.” Such studiousness is not a sign of genius. It is merely a sign that life is imitating fiction—say, a novel by the late Charlotte Yonge. Geniuses as a rule do not “do these things.” And when Lowell got rusticated for his depth in the old poets, life was really overdoing it.

Eight of the ten items in the present book appeared in “The Boston Miscellany,” which was owned and edited by Lowell’s friend, Nathan Hale, junior. The “Miscellany” deserves to rank with the famous “nursery-of-genius” magazines of Europe, for its contributors included Nathaniel Hawthorne, E. A. Poe, N. P. Willis, Mrs. Browning, Edward Everett, W. W. Story, James T. Fields, and Lowell. It was to the fifth number of this remarkable monthly that Lowell contributed what Mr. Littlefield describes as his first and last attempt at fiction—a “short story” entitled “The First Client.” In Longfellow’s diary for 29 November 1852 occurs this passage: “Met Lowell in the street and brought him home to smoke a pipe. He had been to the bookseller’s to buy a blank book to begin a novel, on the writing of which his mind is bent. . . . Lowell will write a capital novel.” And a fortnight later: “Lowell came in. He has begun his novel.” That novel came to nothing, and indeed we should like to know upon what grounds Longfellow, if he had seen “The First Client”—as he probably had—opined that Lowell would “write a capital novel.” If ever an early piece of fiction proved conclusively that its author could write everything well except fiction, “The First Client” is that piece. The point is not that it is an unsatisfactory short story, but that it is not a short story at all. It is a sketch, and should be called a sketch, a very bright and clever sketch of the traditional conventional young lawyer waiting for clients. Fourteen pages are pure sketch; on the fifteenth page a man enters whom the young lawyer takes for a client, but who in half a page proves to be the sign-painter with his bill! And that is all. The English of the sketch is quite admirable, and quite characteristic of a maturer Lowell. The maturer Lowell’s inveterate habit of allusiveness is already at full strength. In a dozen lines we have references to Pythagoras, Wordsworth, and “the Emperor Nicholas’s French-horn band.” It must be remembered that an allusion to Wordsworth at that date was scarcely so hackneyed as it would be to-day.

The five essays on Elizabethan dramatists, which make up the second part of the book, seem to us to be remarkable to be an absolutely convincing testimony of the truth of our maxim. "In his riper years," says Mr. Littlefield, "Lowell utterly ignored 'The Boston Miscellany' articles. . . . His literary executor, Charles Eliot Norton, his semi-official biographer, Horace E. Scudder, and his authorised publishers . . . have religiously respected his wishes on this point." All we can say is that Prof. Norton and the rest, though pious, were too discreet, and that Mr. Littlefield is abundantly justified in his resuscitation. Take this exordium :—

We shall now say a few words about John Webster, a writer who will not afford us so many beautiful extracts as Chapman, but who stands far above him in most of the qualities of a dramatic poet. Chapman aimed at being classical, and from the columns which he had chiselled out for his never-finished Grecian temple, we can take one and set it up alone without feeling the want of the rest of the building; or we can, at least, break off acanthus-leaves of the most delicate workmanship, and which are beautiful in themselves. But we can give no idea of the irregularly-regular vast Gothic pile which Webster heaps together, with all its quaintness, mystery, and ever-aspiring grandeur, by any single portion small enough to come within the narrow limits of our cabinet.

The adolescent faithfulness is charming in its naive immaturity; and at the same time there is nothing in the passage, except its manner, to differentiate it from Lowell's best critical passages, or even—shall we say?—from all but the best critical passages of Hazlitt. It has imagination; it has the visual quality; it renders.

The rest of the essay is on the same plane of freshness, verve, and distinction. Here is another illuminative piece of Webster: "He might be called the Coleridge of the old dramatists, with a good deal of Dante in him, too. We never go by a smithy in a misty night and see the bloody glare which bursts from all its chinks and windows without thinking of him." And the conclusion of the essay is delightful in its modest sincerity and effectiveness: "We must end. We shall resume the subject in some future number, and will try to do more justice to it. We had hoped to have written something better than we have. But, alas! these children of the soul, which seem so fair and lovely at their conception and birth, become but pitiful, weakling changelings, when laid in the cradle of words."

There are a hundred and fifty pages in this book which certainly ought to be published with Lowell's formal "Works." That Lowell ignored them is beside the point. That he wished his executor to ignore them is beside the point. No one has the right to dictate to posterity, and as a matter of fact posterity will not be dictated to.

Two Points of View.

To Count Leo Tolstoi, as to Carlyle, the Greeks are a people quick at copying the nude figure, but essentially lacking in "religious perception." Profoundly antagonistic to the most artistic people the world has yet seen, the great Russian has none the less written a volume on art which challenged the attention of Europe. Whatever else Tolstoi is he is sincere, and for him art is not at all to be elucidated by the phraseology of this or that doctrine of modern aestheticism. Art is a reality; but how does it fit in with other realities? Everybody knows his simile of the puzzle map; most of us have read his analysis of sixty expositions of writers on aesthetics, no single one of which, according to him, fitted in at all. And for Tolstoi, groping after the larger synthesis of the soul, an analysis of art which should fit in with the actuality of human companionship, and the actuality of a profound instinct towards right, is absolutely necessary. Curiously enough, the results arrived at in this volume are in close harmony with those books "written in his former style," of which "Anna Karenina" is perhaps the most significant. In each case the goal is to be reached by humility and simplicity. But what the ordinary man can accomplish only by sharing the peasant's close contact with the earth, the artist accomplishes by reason of his "moral infection." In either case the common brotherhood of man is insisted upon, and the universality of art, as a means to its promotion, follows as a natural consequence.

To the English generally, that is to a people profoundly distrustful of art as a means to salvation, this view is only partially acceptable. They prefer to stand or fall by the objectivity of the moral sense, but the note of Terence is for the most part alien from their nature. With the Russian, on the other hand, the impulse towards self-sacrifice seems to be often almost a physical necessity, and to him there is nothing incongruous in the surrender of the personal and the exclusive.

Such an enthusiast will accept in a moment of such surrender the union of "men with God, and with one another." He will accept the statement that "art, all art, has this characteristic, that it unites people." He will admit that "only two kinds of feeling do unite all men: first feelings flowing from the perception of our sonship to God and of the brotherhood of man; and next, the simple feelings of common life." And so Sophocles and Beethoven give place to the writer of a village tale, and the singer of a moujik's song. The spirit of sacrifice has been carried from life to art. What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?

For such an one the moral sense alone determines man's development, and his degeneration begins with its weakening and reaches its climax in its loss. Art has its raison d'être in the infusion of moral purpose into one's fellow beings. To the artist the magic touch that is so difficult comes easily; to him it is permitted not only to feel the right, but to make others share it. For him it is to illumine the nobler and simpler impulses of the soul, the impulses towards reverence and kindness. To him also it is granted to lead man to God through beauty, but through beauty interpreted in a larger sense than that limited to the symmetry of the body. Such an artist will stamp upon the furrowed brow of to-day some far-off reflection of the halo of the crucifix, and will throw into the simple story of common life something of the universal kinship of sorrow. Such an artist may desire that his work shall live after him, but he will be conscious always of the littleness of the personal comment. He will feel that that moment is best in which he best expresses the suggestion of immortality, the moment in which he comes nearest to making his fellow creatures appeal to the sense of rightness within them. That is his motive, that is his inspiration—to suggest the divine goodness through the symbol of his art.

"La bontà! La bontà!" comes scornfully the Pagan challenge: "Credi tu dunque che il lume debba venire dalla bontà e non da quell'istinto profondo che volge e precipita il mio spirito verso le più superbe apparizioni della vita?" The energy of art has its origin in the denial of death. It does not seek the remote triumph of piercing the barrier of mysticism and entering upon a newer and nobler spiritual existence. Its claim is ever the hic et nunc of the actual and the real. Whenever and wherever art served the mysteries of religion, so this apologist will urge, she faded and drooped. Faded and drooped whether she produced the dark, brooding idols of Egypt or the starved limbs of mediæval saints. Only when she has been true to the instinct of survival has she created what is nearest to immortality. The exaltation and the austerity of religion have alike distressed her: for her there is no radiance save that of colour, no severity save that of form. They have called her the hand-maid of religion, but once only since the dawn of time has she ministered to religion, and then not as hand-maid, but as supreme priestess.

Again, to those who would deny to art beauty as a necessary concomitant, the answer will be equally unequivocal.

One does not wish to preserve that which is already conquered by time. One does not wish to render immortal that which contains within it already the commencement of death. Why should we leave after us the wrinkled forehead, the dulled glance, the arid, weary lines of thought, all the pain of memory which binds us to the past, all the impotence of reflection with which the future mocks us? No, no! Preserve the supreme moments of endurance, the moments of Phryne unveiling her beauty before Athens and of the Discobolus casting across the chasm of time the radiance of his strong glad youth. And because beauty is the token of the unconscious and harmonious endurance of life, it is for the artist to infuse into his art before all other things that which makes not for righteousness, but for beauty. It is for him to present the symbols of effortless life, not to solace beings stricken by an ancient sorrow or cowed by an approaching doom.

And so the doctrine of human sympathy is thrust contemptuously aside. For, it will be urged that man, who, presumably, alone of animals is conscious of the law of survival, has by reason of that consciousness developed the wish to differentiate. He who is most implacable of all is by his nature antagonistic to that spirit of fraternity which has been with all animals a means to a larger end. Applied to art, this theory will lead to the supposition of the artist as an intense egotist, an egotist yearning to breathe into things finite, something of infinite endurance. It will be claimed that in the tomb of an Egyptian king and in a statue by Praxiteles the same strange persistence is manifest, the desire to express the glory of the individual life and to carry that glory beyond the barriers of death.

In this sense Art becomes national when it expresses the egotism of the race, universal when it interprets the goal of man's will. But the artist himself must have before all other men the arrogant certitude of being, and the courageous wish to project something of that being into the future. That is what life meant for him, that is his comment: let the gods play with him as they will, this much he has placed outside of the narrow circle of the years. It is, in fact, the old question as to the self or not-self as incentives for action; self-sacrifice, or self-development? Again and again the smooth paragraphs of dialectic take up the for and against of each, weighing casually the balance between him whose soul is evolved by the triumph of his brain and him whose soul becomes conscious through the sacrifice of his heart.

Well, the petty verbal declamations of approval or dissent must alike fall faint and feeble upon the ears of this dying lion of the North. But it is one of the larger ironies of life that Gorki, who is already heralded as his unchallenged successor, has in his veins the very essence of this newer, fiercer Nietzscheism. It is the eternal antithesis between two half-seen phases of the great Truth which is veiled to all. On the one side, the strenuous Titan shuts out from consciousness the mystery of being in the face of which his little entity is as a weed carried out into the night. On the other, the seer, supremely conscious of the relativity of all human energy, forgets in the presence of the great silence the hot, passionate promptings of the human heart. "Ah!" in the words of Merejkowski, that other successor of the great Russian, "if thou canst make one the truth of the Titan and the truth of the Galilean, thou wilt be greater than any that have been born of women."

Impressions.

XV.—Confidence:

I WOUND up my watch, noticed that the hour was near midnight, and glanced significantly at the bed that the guard had prepared. But my companion who had joined the train at Dijon still talked. This stranger had come through from some outlying part of France; he sat on the edge of the couch; his fur rug was tucked around his knees, his voice came from the depths of his fur coat. He talked easily, as those do who have been profoundly moved, and who remember.

"I can hardly believe it only happened this afternoon," he said. "I was sitting in my bedroom writing, vaguely thinking that if it got much darker I should have to light up. I put on my glasses, then the lightning caught the metal, blazed round my eyes, and I was blind—stone blind. I sat quite still trying to realise it, looking ahead through the years, and wondering if I should ever get used to not wanting to live. It was the grimest hour of my life. Then suddenly I began to see. The glimmer grew brighter, and slowly my sight returned. I used to think I knew what happiness meant, but I didn't. To think that you are blind: then to begin to see! That's happiness! Nobody else in the world can have known happiness as I knew it this afternoon. Why doesn't it last? How do people make it last?"

Unable to answer his question, I climbed into my bunk and placed my head upon the pillow, but he would not let the subject lie. On he rambled:—

"I once knew a man whose happiness lasted all day, and every day. He was a Roman Catholic priest who had a tiny flock, mostly Irish visitors, up in a mountain health-resort. He dressed in broadcloth and wore snow boots; he was always busy and smiling, and he played the organ, I remember. He would come cheerfully into the hotel late at night, when we were all yawning, shake the snow off him, and go off to sit with one of the servants who was ill; then out again through the snow to his lodging. He was always smiling. I suppose he saw very clearly. Perhaps he never thought about being happy. I don't know. When he had nothing else to do he searched for Alpine flowers, and made quite a fine collection of them. Once he asked me to call and see him. His study was a narrow room like a corridor, with windows all down the weather side. There were five glass frames on the wall containing his collection of Alpine flowers. In this corridor-room there was a press, too, and cocoa-nut matting on the floor. I wondered how he could sit there without a fire. Outside there was nothing but snow, white fields of it running down ever so far. 'It's a bitter outlook,' I said. 'But you should see it in the spring,' he answered—'one mass of narcissus.' Why did he look so happy when he spoke?"

My companion removed his glasses, and examined them. "Thought I was blind: then began to see. It's upset me, I suppose, or why should I mix up my happiness with that little priest's happiness! Fields of narcissus! They're not as white as snow!"

He tumbled into bed, then raised himself on his elbow to draw the shade over the lamp. The glass was half-darkened when he paused, "They're not the same kind of happiness. Mine comes to an end like this light, when I cover it up with a black shade. So! But his never stops. I believe he smiles when he's asleep."

Drama.

A Nursery Classic.

"The Water Babies" has long ago become a classic of the nursery, and now, with "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking-Glass," holds that place in the imagination of a second generation which a more simple-minded and traditional childhood gave to the folk-tales of Mother Goose. And yet neither Lewis Carroll nor Charles Kingsley was successful in keeping a single eye on the immediate task of writing for children. The Cambridge historian, like the Oxford mathematician, had his Olympian interests and a pen that glanced readily to these; so that if the one turned aside down countless by-paths of literary parody or logical paradox, the other was equally ready to neglect the business in hand for a vigorous tilt at some favourite bugbear, such as the arrogance of science, falsely so-called, or the defects of the examination system. Alike in this doubleness of purpose, which, singularly enough, does not seem to have affected the popularity of their books one whit, the two writers diverge widely enough in their general mental tendencies. They are related to each other, much as board and denominational schools are supposed to be. The freer play of intellect is undoubtedly to be found in Lewis Carroll; in Charles Kingsley the more unhesitating control of the ethical temper. For all its fun and fancy, you will not readily find a more didactic book than "The Water Babies." The moral, indeed, is almost obtruded; certainly there is not the slightest attempt to drape or conceal it. It need hardly be said that this causes no stumbling whatever to the nursery mind. It is fashionable at the moment to talk of childhood as an essentially "unmoral" state, of the child as a practical and unconscious, but thorough-going follower of Nietzsche. Nothing could be much less true than this literary notion, a reflection upon "the golden age" of an ideal really belonging to a much more sophisticated period of life which is, no doubt, impatient of the moral. Actually the child dwells in the most complete familiarity with the categorical imperative; nor could anything be likely to perplex and bewilder him more than a reading of existence from which the "mustn't" and the "ought" were left out. It is not he who is going to shy at Mrs. Bedonebyasyoudid and Mrs. Doasyouwouldbedoneby, or at the strenuous moral law which, to our thinking, suits so incongruously with the translucent regions below the wave.

The "Alice" books were dramatised several years ago with some success and much amusement to the author; and it was only natural that a similar experiment should be tried, sooner or later, with "The Water Babies." Lewis Carroll's heroine was played, if I remember right, by Miss Isa Bowman, and it is a namesake of hers, Miss Nellie Bowman, who puts so much spirit and talent into the somewhat exacting part of Tom the chimney-sweep. It is obviously not I, but a much younger and more competent authority who ought to be criticising the play. I can only make a guess as to how it would probably appear to the true judges. I am sure that they would in no way be affected by the fact that the book does not at all adapt itself to dramatic form. Our notions of a drama are founded upon a number of formulas about unities and complications and resolutions and the presentation of character through action and the like, which mean nothing whatever to the child. What he wants is incident and plenty of it; and whether it comes in an ordered plot or in a succession of episodes, is to him indifferent. Nor is he difficult on the score of illusion. His perceptions are quick, but inexact; and the apparatus of wires and trapdoors and limelight and shutters, which to us soon become intolerably tedious and artificial, may work upon his imagination like veritable grammar. On the other hand, he is a purist about the story. He knows what ought to be in the play, as well as an Athenian audience knew the legends of the houses of Atreus and of Pelops; and he is no more likely to sanction a departure from tradition, than were they to accept Euripides' new readings of the familiar myths. So far as the performance at the Garrick goes, I do not think that he will have much ground for discontent. Naturally a selection has to be made from the marvellous beings whom Kingsley introduced with no sparing hand. But there are Tom and his master Grimes, and Grimes' good old mother. And there are Ellie and the Squire, and the water-babies themselves, and the fairy in her many and puzzling disguises. And there are the lobster and the otter, who fight in the lobster-pot. And there is Tom's dog, spotted and most life-like. And there is Mother Carey, with her white hair and her "two great grand blue eyes, as blue as the sea itself," in her icy throne at the back of Shiny Wall. And finally there are the Blunderbuss and his six Truncheons, who guard the repentant Grimes amongst the roofs and chimneys of The Other-End-of-Nowhere. All of these are old acquaintances for whom a rapturous recognition is ensured. Some reasonable exception might, perhaps, be taken to the introduction of two or three quite new characters, such as the pug and the poodle who come in to dance a round with Tom's terrier, and the Frozen Sailor who chants an explorer's ditty out of a peep-hole in Shiny Wall. In this last innovation I fear that I detect once more the ubiquitous influence of the Navy League.

A final criticism the playgoers of the nursery will probably not make. One misses in the play the honest ring of Kingsley's wholesome and manly English. "The Water Babies" is almost all narrative, and there is but little dialogue available for dramatic purposes. The delightful songs, "When all the World is Young," "Clear and Cool," and "I Once had a Dear Little Doll, Dears," are made use of. But these are eked out with other lyrics for which the adapter, Mr. Rutland Barrington, is responsible, and which did not appear to me delightful at all. They were topical and up-to-date, with references to motor cars and such, and had a distinct music-hall ring about them. Nor do I feel quite sure that the good old school-dame would wholly have approved of some of the much-befrilled dancing which solaced the playground recreation of her scholars. But I do not wish to be hypercritical. The performance as a whole was full of go and ingenuity, and the child who is fortunate enough to be taken to it will have occasion to mark the day with the reddest of letters in the calendar of his holidays.

Art.

In the Large Manner.

So varied, so unequal in merit is the winter exhibition of Old Masters at Burlington House, that the visitor may be advised to take the collection in instalments. An examination of two rooms, and a peep into a third, sufficed me for one day. On my first visit I found it difficult to leave the first room. The second was equally attractive. There are forty-one landscapes in these two rooms, but I spent all the time at my disposal before seven of them—two Wilsons, two Cotmans, two Turners and a Constable. The surprises were Richard Wilson and John Sell Cotman, and the surprise began early with the picture marked No. 1, "Lake Scene," by Richard Wilson. There is light in it—lighted water, that has been shining there a hundred years and more. Time has not dulled the glow of this lake so still beneath the hills. What a sure touch had Richard Wilson, who "failed to hit the popular taste" of the eighteenth century, and who fell into "straitened circumstances." How tender is the line of those distant hills; and look at the tree on the right against the sky. That tree was painted when the paint of the sky was dry. Wilson knew that every touch of leaf or bark in sloppy paint must remain, that no erasure was possible, and yet how certain he was of himself. A sure eye and a firm hand had this old master. Personally I could do without the tree, and the ruin on the left. It is the lake and the hills that give such quiet happiness to the eye. But we must take Wilson as he was, a composer of pictures, one of the greatest of that band of British landscape artists, who saw nature grandly as well as beautifully, and who painted in the large manner. Wilson and Cotman had gusto, and like the Elizabethan dramatists, they give the idea of having grappled whole-heartedly with life, wrestling to the end even if they were thrown. In painting we have explored many byeways since their day, learnt a little, talked more, but we have lost the spacious outlook, and the large manner has gone out of fashion like the three volume novel.

The large manner is very reposeful to eyes dazzled by the shreds and patches of multitudinous modern talents. Not only is John Sell Cotman's "Homeward Bound" decorative, and suffused with the magic of the sea; it has also that air of finality that the large manner does not always convey. This great three-masted ship that comes sailing out of the sunset right towards the spectator is alive. Huge though she be, she does not dwarf the vast blood-red sky behind, or the sailing boat that greets her. The three—ship, boat, sky—are one. The eye takes them all in at a glance, or rather this triumphant composition seizes you and compels your admiration in the moment of looking. The Cotman who could paint such a picture as this is an unfamiliar personality, as is the Wilson of "The Lake." These two works offered so much for reflection that, for a time, I thought I would postpone an examination of the other pictures till another day, when suddenly "The Opening of Waterloo Bridge," by Constable, forced itself upon my notice. Cotman's large simplicity had not left me in an amenable mood for Constable's brilliant studies of the minute by which he hoped to suggest nature's eternal ripple of movement, and to set half a county dancing through a picture. But the gaiety of this Thames picture was not to be resisted. The Prince Regent is embarking at Whitehall Stairs; he is accompanied by a flotilla of gaily decorated barges; the canvas is crowded with figures, and beyond curves the river, with Waterloo Bridge in the distance. "Waterloo Bridge" is not in the large manner, but it is very amusing.

I looked at my watch. An hour and a quarter had passed since I entered the gallery, and the portal of the second room was still to cross. Of the pictures in the first room I had only really examined three. Should I proceed, or should I retire with the memory of those three in my mind?—the outshining light of Wilson's lake, the onward rush of Cotman's ship, and Constable's gaiety. Irresolutely I stood when, through the doorway of the second room, I caught a glimpse of something all a-shimmer with colour, and delicacy, and iridescent mists; something that was neither a picture nor real life, a flash of beauty, caught by the dreamer just before the flame blinked itself out in the light of day. This was Turner's "Approach to Venice," as unlike nature as it is unlike any other picture in the world, but what a shimmer of beautiful colour! Unfaded, too! Opposite is another gossamer Turner, "Modern Italy," equally fairy-like, a thing to be seen with the eye, no more to be described with the pen than sunlight dappling the ground in a spring orchard. Close by was another Wilson, and another Cotman, but Wilson's view of "Woburn Abbey," a wet blue scheme of paint, fat and rich in texture, accomplished with easy precision, has not the attraction of the Lake picture, fine though it is. Cotman, in his "Heath Scene," speaks again in the grand manner. The heath rises solemnly to the windmills, by a road contrasting with the cool grass and air on the little heights. There is something final about this picture, as about Cotman's "Homeward Bound," something that I feared I should not find in an adjoining room where hang 18 pictures by four recently-deceased members of the Royal Academy—Henry Moore, John Brett, Vicat Cole, and M. Ridley Corbet.

Comparisons are as odious in the painting as in the pedagogic world, and I do not propose to contrast Brett, Vicat Cole, Corbet and Moore, with Turner, Constable, Cotman, and Wilson. But it was impossible to stand in the doorway of that third room and not be struck by the facility of the talent of Brett, Vicat Cole, and Corbet. Pretty, attractive, nice are the epithets that rise easily to the lips before their pictures. But Wilson's "Lake" or Cotman's "Homeward Bound" unload no adjectives. They flush a feeling into the spectator that cannot be labelled with a faded word. This is the way of masterpieces.

"What about Henry Moore?"

I started at the question, so closely was it allied to my thought of the moment. In the speaker I recognised an acquaintance—a bad painter, but an excellent critic, one of those who can interpret and explain, but who are quite unable to create. "This is sad," he said, waving to the works by Brett, Vicat Cole, and Corbet; "but how about Henry Moore?"

It is unnecessary to be literary with a painter, so I merely said, "His 'Newhaven Packet' is all right, and there isn't much wrong with his 'Nearing the Needles.' Of course I don't mean to compare them with Cotman's 'Homeward Bound.'"

"'Homeward Bound' is a fine picture, but it isn't by Cotman."

"Not by Cotman!" I said. "Nonsense! I was beginning to apotheosize him. The catalogue says it's his."

He smiled gently. "I never go by the catalogue. Have you seen the Tintoretos?"

"No!" I snapped.

The Dietetic Value of Alcohol.

If there is one thing more than another that has been dinned into our ears by the advocates of total abstinence, it is that alcohol is not a food: and while the self-evident fact that its abuse is an evil has been asserted with much unnecessary vehemence, it has been impressed upon us that its moderate use could never, under any circumstances, make for our good. As it could never afford the slightest nutriment, and any stimulative effect that resulted from its ingestion was certain to be followed by a greater amount of depression, it followed, said these latter-day Encratites, that the only thing to be done was to prohibit its use, even as a medicine. As the logical faculty of the Anglo-Saxon is still very little developed, and most of us are in the habit of accepting any proposition which is shouted at us with sufficient violence, hospitals for the treatment of disease without alcohol have sprung up on both sides of the Atlantic; and—if the newspapers are to be trusted—the last terrible railway accident in America was made memorable by the spectacle of a truculent apostle of abstinence smashing the bottles of brandy brought by the doctors for the relief of the wounded.

Luckily, perhaps, for the rest of the world, those Latin races who have, according to Dr. Archdall Reid, purchased a partial immunity from alcohol by centuries of intoxication, have never taken the new gospel very seriously, and have even ventured to show its weakness by experiment. Dr.

Duclaux, Director of the Institut Pasteur, has demonstrated that guinea-pigs can be kept alive, in the absence of other food, by strong hypodermic injections of alcohol, to which it has been objected by the advocates of abstinence that guinea-pigs are not men, and that their inconvenient survival under the experiment must be accounted for by a double dose of original sin in the guinea-pig's constitution. Then, Dr. Chauveau, substituting for the vile body of Dr. Duclaux's experiment that of man himself, devised a sort of cage in which an observer could ensconce himself, surrounded by thermometers, dynamometers, spirometers, and all the latest apparatus for testing heat, strength, and energy, and could thus establish experimentally the effect of different foods upon his own system. The expense of construction, which is said to have been enormous, for some time prevented this experiment from being carried into practice; but at length the usual American millionaire was found to endow the scheme, and several such machines were erected in the laboratory of an American University. In these three students, trained in observation, two of whom had been total abstainers from their youth, were shut up for a considerable period, and were fed on a varied diet of meat, farinaceous substances, vegetables, sugar, and water, until something like a normal standard of nutrition, as evidenced by temperature, energy of grip, and the like, was attained. Then certain parts of the meat and sugar ration were withdrawn, and its presumed equivalent in alcohol was substituted. The result, which the reader will find detailed in the Annales de l'Institut Pasteur, was to completely upset the confident assumptions of the total abstinence theory. No loss whatever of weight, of heat, of strength, followed the substitution of alcohol for other forms of food. The experiments were varied, checked, and controlled in every way possible. The subjects, one of whom was a Canadian, one an American, and one a Swede, were made to spend part of their imprisonment in repose, part in violent gymnastics; the substitution of alcohol for other foods was made sometimes gradually and sometimes abruptly; but the effect produced remained always the same. It seems impossible to avoid the conclusion, drawn reluctantly enough by the experimenters, that alcohol is really a food.

This is, of course, not to say that alcohol is the best or even an advantageous food for man, still less that it is one that can be taken inordinately with impunity. Apart from the fact that alcohol, being a manufactured and not a natural product, must always be costly out of all proportion to its nutritive value, its directly stimulating effect on the heart must render its use dangerous to the general health of that organ unless kept within sharply-defined limits. But if, leaving these medical details, which are perhaps rather out of place in these columns, we look further afield, we find that alcohol has a dietetic value quite apart from its nutritive properties. That wine maketh glad the heart of man is as true now as when it was first given to the world in the Vulgate, and for this reason, if for none other, it has proved an inestimable blessing to the human race. As Dr. Dumas, a specialist in such matters, has shown in his recent work on "La Tristesse et la Joie," cheerfulness, however obtained, is in itself one of the finest tonics to the bodily system yet discovered. Under its influence the respiration, the circulation, and the bodily strength alike increase, while the reverse consequences follow the inroads of "loathed melancholy." That the moderate use of alcohol will induce this cheerfulness is part of the common experience of humanity, and hence it is not surprising that in all ages its common imbibition has been exalted into a social function, or even into a religious observance.

On this last side, too, it becomes a benefit, not only to the individual, but to the race. One of the most important factors in the evolution of civilised man has been the periodical gathering together of individuals for the purpose of festivity. At first it is probable that this took place for the sake of commerce, and that the ancient market was really the first link between the scattered families who lived in primæval times in their separate caves. But even thus, the practice of taking their food in common must soon have become a matter of convenience, as is seen in our modern institution of farmer's ordinaries, and thus the foundation of intercourse for purely social purposes seems to have been laid. When alcohol was first discovered, it seems to have quickly become an attendant on these meetings for the sake of barter, a memory which still survives in many places in the habit of drinking upon a bargain, and thus took its share in the civilisation of the human race. That the exhilaration, temporary though it may be, produced by its use, has on the whole made for the welfare of the race, seems to be established by the fact that the European and Mongoloid races among whom it has been longest known and most widely used are now at the head of civilisation, while those who have most stoutly resisted its introduction, such as the fanatical Semites of Asia and Africa, are pretty nearly at its tail.

Thus we see that one of the assertions most vociferously made for partisan purposes by well-meaning but unreasoning faddists, has been proved on scientific grounds to be false. That many kindred follies will in time be exposed, none can doubt who watches the general tendency of research. In these days, when the best thought-out scientific theories are spoken of by their propounders as only "working hypotheses," it does not, indeed, become us to be dogmatic; and the fact that any assertion of a sweeping character is loudly and noisily made is enough to put those who really strive to know upon their guard against its reception. So may we hope that in time we may shake off the bad habits of thought which we have received along with much that is admirable from our barbarian ancestors, and may come to perceive the truth and beauty of the old Greek rule of life, "Nothing in excess." Correspondence.

Lear's Fool.

SIR,—“And of course, there is the poor faithful fool of Lear, whose hanging comes as such a wanton and remorseless touch, at the close of the bitterest of tragedies.” So writes Mr. Chambers in a recent dramatic criticism in your pages. But is this so? The Fool stays not till the even of the play, he “goes to bed at noon” to use his words before making a final exit. He is almost forgotten as the great tragedy develops. Surely Lear is not hearkening back to him, but is thinking of the dead daughter in his arms, when he says:—

And my poor fool is hanged, no no, no life.

Follow out the speech and it is proved.

Why should a dog, a horse, a rat have life,
And thou no breath at all?

* * * * *
Do you see this? Look on her, look, her lips, Look there, Look there.

“Fool” as used by Shakespeare in this and other plays, has more of pity than of scorn in its meaning; it may be an almost tender pity.—Yours, &c., JOHN CARMONT.

Scenic Realism.

SIR,—The question of the whereabouts of the stage wall referred to by Mr. Chambers is not perhaps of much practical importance, but, if not trespassing too much on your space, may I suggest that “H. B. M.’s” explanation is hardly satisfactory? Surely to insist that we, the audience, are in a room where certain things are happening, and not somewhere outside the room, raises rather formidable difficulties. The question immediately arises, what business have we in a room where something with which we have nothing to do is going on—and how do the people whom we are watching there regard us, the intruders? This, “H. M. B.” may say, is absurd, since it is part of the convention of the playhouse that certain things are taken for granted, and that our presence in the room is an incorporeal presence, a presence unseen. That, however, is to my mind asking too much of us in the way of make-believe. It is better, I think, to ask as little of us as possible—to set up a theory that leaves as little as possible to be explained—and we do this, we leave much less to be explained, if we say that what is going on before us in the theatre is external to ourselves, that we are privileged to see it, not by being admitted to the room, but by being brought to the outer wall and given the chance to peep. In that case the wall would not be seen by us, as we should be in the position of those looking into a room through a window.

Lest, however, “H. B. M.” should contend that his view is borne out by the practice of certain actors and actresses who are for ever smiling amiably at the audience and in other pleasing ways establishing a friendly connection, may I add that this practice is to my mind quite inexcusable and could not be indulged by any but those who have a fatal misconception of the meaning of their art.—Yours, &c.,
G. J. P.

Picturesque Old Houses.

SIR,—In your review of Mr. Fea’s “Picturesque Old Houses,” your reviewer has fallen into the same error as Mr. Fea in associating the house of Houghton Conquest with Sir Philip Sidney. Mr. Fea even conjectures that in it Sir Philip wrote his “Arcadia,” whilst staying there with his sister. As a matter of fact, there is no evidence that Sir Philip was ever at Houghton in his life, for his sister did not possess the estate until nearly thirty years after his death, and the house of which Mr. Fea speaks was not built until the reign of James I.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP SIDNEY.

Wanted a Word.

SIR,—What is the correlative antithesis of sequel used in the sense of showing the relationship, in one word, of the first part of a literary work to another? “We Two” is the sequel to “Donovan.” What is “Donovan” to “We Two”? Prelude, prodrome, proem, or introduction might be used. I, however, cannot bring to mind any precedent, and so invite opinion. Failing the suitability of any existing word, will someone coin one?—Yours, &c., “CATALOGUER.”

Two Poets.

SIR,—“The Bookworm” seems a little hazy in his bibliographical notes on Mr. John Davidson. The volume which Mr. Fisher Unwin brought out in 1890 under the title of “Scaramouch in Naxos, and Other Plays,” included “An Unhistorical Pastoral,” “A Romantic Farce,” and “Scaramouch,” but neither “Bruce” nor “Smith.” This volume was, moreover, previously published for private circulation. Your reviewer is in error as to the sex of the author of “Sonnets of a Platonist.” Jesse Berridge is, as indeed his name implies, a poet, not a poetess, to use a somewhat outmoded word.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM G. HUTCHINSON.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 173 (New Series).

Last week we offered a Prize of One Guinea for the best four-line original motto in verse to be inscribed on a house once occupied by a deceased, or now occupied by a living author. We have received forty-six replies. Many competitors have not named the author: we meant, of course, that each motto should have a special and not a general application. We award the prize to Mr. Ward Muir, Hotel Victoria, Davos Platz, Switzerland, for the following:—

STEVENSON.

Here I fought: here was my body slain:
Here I wove spells which winged their kindly flight Soothing for others, as for me, earth's pain:
—Go thou and likewise fight.

Other replies follow:—

SHAKESPEARE.

Serve first thy God, for there is none above:
Serve then thy King, else shall thy nation fall:
Serve then thy friend, if thou a friend would'st prove:
Serve last thyself, for self's but least of all.
[N. W., Liverpool.]

CHARLES KINGSLEY.

He not alone his Pegasus could ride,
But galloped gaily down the country side:
A brilliant parson, singer of that blast
From the north east which struck him down “At last!”
[F. B. D., Torquay.]

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

The darkness and the strife without
Should make all wanderers in doubt
Knock at this door and pray to win
The sweetness and the light within.
[J. H., Hempsted.]

CHARLES DARWIN.

Here dwelt the man whose god was Nature's law,
Who solved the riddle of Creation's scroll,
Who worshipped Truth with reverence and awe,
And only doubted God and his own soul.
[M. I. E., Lampeter.]

W. W. JACOBS.

The tide of fortune flows from many a source;
Keep ye the shore, as well as river, scanned;
Lest it may, all unheeded, run its course,
Not on the stream alone, but through the strand.
[F. Fitz-G., Haverhill.]

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

If thou at morn uplift thy heart
To choose and live the higher part,
Sweet Peace shall flood at starry night
Thy soul with sweetness and with light.
[S. C., Hove.]

COWPER.

With what slow-footed hours, quaint, simple, sad,
Time lingered here, and smiled but was not glad!
Time may forget, but whatso'er its fate,
To gentle heart, these walls are consecrate.
[K. K., Dublin.]

DICKENS.

Here dwelt a master-mind whose wondrous pen
Impressed its words upon the hearts of men:
He wrote of grief and joy—he lived to prove
All else's dross save only human love.
[T. P., Manchester.]

ROBERT BURNS.

Gie me to mak' for “Scotland's sake” a ballant or a sang;
A lass to pit her arms aroon' my neck when a' gangs wrang;
The lift aboon, an' at my feet the gowan-speckled grun';
An' whies, no' often, juist at times, a gless an' rowth o' fun.
[T. McE., Belfast.]

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Stranger, remove thy hat, take off thy shoes.
This was the dwelling place of Tom Carlyle;
His teaching glorifies a fit of blues,
And shews how closely linked are brain and bile.
[T. McE., Belfast.]

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.

To one another say: "Twas here
In quietude she dwelt apart,
Coining her messages to cheer
The sad and the bereaved heart."
[S. M., Addiscombe.]

LANDOR.

Beneath this roof, within this porch
One lived and lit Athenæ's torch:
Another now, for his brief turn,
Uplifts that torch, and bids it burn.
[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

SHAKESPEARE.

These silent walls his gentle presence knew.
Who read the heart and all its passions drew:
Here seek not his memorial to trace—
Know that he clasps the world in his embrace.
[A. E. W., Greenock.]

He that late did sojourn here
Little reck'd of worldly gear:
Fill his ink-pot to the brim,
And you well contented him.
[E. B., Ipswich.]

An author lived here—and is dead—
Another now writes in his stead;
And fifty more their pens may twiddle,
But only life can solve life's riddle.
[G. C., South Norwood.]

Competition No. 174 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best set of verses, not to exceed sixteen lines, on an old School Book. The title of the book to be given.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The "Life of Robert Buchanan," by his sister-in-law, Miss Harriet Jay, will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin this month. Miss Jay inscribes it: "To the memory of Robert Buchanan, who adopted me in my childhood, and who, throughout his life, was to me the kindest of fathers, the best of friends." The volume includes correspondence with Mr. Herbert Spencer and other well-known men.

Mr. Arthur Sheppard, private secretary to Dr. Randall Davidson, the newly appointed Archbishop of Canterbury, has written a book, entitled "How to Become a Private Secretary: Qualifications, Training, Work." It will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The book enumerates in a clear and concise manner the necessary qualifications, and describes in detail the varied character of the work and the kind of preparation desirable for it.

The publications of "The Free Age Press," comprising the cheapest authoritative editions of Tolstoy's books and booklets, will in future be published by Thomas Laurie, 15, Paternoster Row, London. These are the only editions produced in direct communication with Tolstoy—of whom the editor is a personal friend. The profits on this series are wholly expended in spreading a knowledge of Tolstoy's principles in other European countries—the doctrine of peace on earth and goodwill to men.

A new volume of verse by Mr. Bernard Malcolm Ramsey, entitled "London Lays and Other Poems," is about to be published Mr. Elliot Stock. Though the pieces in the book are chiefly on the various aspects of London life, a few relate to country scenes in England and Scotland.

"Education Law," by Mr. T. A. Organ, B.A., is announced by Messrs. Butterworth & Co. It is founded on "Organ's Law (with Acts) relating to Schools and Teachers," which was published in 1900, and which had a very extensive sale. Mr. Organ is well known in the educational world, and is a recognised authority on the subject. In this work will be found the full text of all the statutes bearing on the subject.

London: JOHN LONG, 13 & 14, Norris Street, HAYMARKET.

FIVE EXCELLENT VOLUMES.

FOURTH IMPRESSION.

THE FOUR FEATHERS.

By A. E. W. MASON.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SPHERE says:—"The booksellers are amazed at the extraordinary demand for Mr. Mason's novel."

Guardian.—"The Four Feathers" is a novel of no ordinary type: it stands out clearly from amongst the hosts that overwhelm us. . . . For a book such as this the reader can only be truly thankful, hoping that the author may long continue thus to give us of his best."

SECOND IMPRESSION.

THE INTRUSIONS OF PEGGY.

By ANTHONY HOPE.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Westminster Gazette.—"Mr. Anthony Hope has given us many types of womanhood, but scarcely any of his creations strike us as so freshly studied or so charmingly lifelike. Peggy is altogether one of the most delightful characters that have appeared in recent fiction."

SIXTH IMPRESSION.

THE VULTURES.

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Truth.—"I think you will like Mr. MERRIMAN'S 'The Vultures' better than his 'Roden's Corner,' and quite as well even as that very fine novel 'The Sowers.' Nothing could be more skilful than the interweaving of history and fiction in the novel."

THIRD IMPRESSION.

LOVE OF SISTERS.

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Westminster Gazette.—"Decidedly a more charming Irish story there could not be than 'Love of Sisters'; and we say this with full knowledge of all the sweet and gracious Tynanian sisterhood that have thus far visited our undeserving world."

Athenaeum.—"The whole book breathes a sweet, quaint atmosphere, where humour and pathos are closely mingled."

SECOND IMPRESSION.

IN KINGS' BYWAYS.

By STANLEY WEYMAN.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Times.—"In Kings' Byways" will be enjoyed by everyone to whom the 'Gentleman of France' appealed; and in point of art the anecdotes greatly excel the novel."

Guardian.—"A delightful addition to the romance of history. . . . The charm and distinction of the author's style have never been more agreeable."

The Literary Week.

THE new books published during the past week do not make a very imposing show. Mr. Dooley has again spoken, and among the novels we note "The Circle" by a new writer. For the first time in its history "The North American Review" has admitted fiction to its pages. Mr. Henry James is the chosen novelist, and the title of the story, of which the first three chapters are printed, is "The Ambassadors." Among the books of the week we note the following:—

OBSERVATIONS. By Mr. Dooley.

It is no exaggeration to say that Mr. Dunne, the creator of Mr. Dooley, is the most popular humourist of the day. Those who read him must read him carefully: his spelling compels the roving eye to concentration. The present volume contains thirty-odd papers, treating such subjects as "White House Discipline," "King Edward's Coronation," "Rights and Privileges of Women." "An' do I object to th' pursuit iv lithrachoor?" asks Mr. Dooley. "Oh, faith, no. As a pursuit 't is fine, but it may be bad f'r anny wan that catches it."

AGNOSTICISM. By Robert Flint.

Being the Croall Lectures for 1887-88. The author excuses himself for the late appearance of the book on the ground that he had other work in hand which had prior claims. Of the matter contained in the volume he says: "The lectures delivered in St. Andrew's Church, Edinburgh, cannot now be regarded as more than the nucleus of the present volume; but there is certainly nothing now published in that volume except what is not only consistent with, but supplementary to, what was said in the lectures."

CHINESE PORCELAIN. By W. G. Gulland.

The second volume of Mr. Gulland's interesting work. The illustrations are numerous, and in the present volume are arranged in chronological order; in the earlier volume they were grouped into classes. The author says: "Although photography best preserves the touch of the Chinese artist, which is apt to be lost or distorted in hand-made copies, still it is not always as successful as can be desired." The difficulty in most cases arises from the high vitrescence of surface. The dates of the examples given range between 1506 and 1875.

M. MAETERLINCK contributes to the January "Pall Mall Magazine" an article on the Battle of the Spurs, that great struggle on the plain of Groeninghebeek, which saw "the whole of the chivalry of Philip the Fair, fighting under the orders of Robert of Artois . . . annihilated." M. Maeterlinck describes the battle with vigour and picturesqueness; the scene moves and glitters; but M. Maeterlinck can never be wholly detached, and in the concluding words we get back to his old note: "It was the first great defeat of mediæval chivalry, and one of the first victories of the mysterious justice which quickens that strange harmony of spiritual and moral forces which is called Mankind."

THE Royal Academy elections on Wednesday night aroused more than usual interest. There were three vacancies among Associates, and one among Academicians. The R.A. chair was filled by the election of Sir E. A. Waterlow, who was run close by Mr. Macbeth. The main interest, however, lay in the voting for the Associateship. The leading candidates were Messrs. J. H. F. Bacon, Arnesby Brown, W. L. Colton, Edward Stott, and Frank Brangwyn. The first to be selected was Mr. Bacon, who defeated Mr. Stott in the final ballot by twenty-seven votes to twenty-four. Then came Mr. Colton, who beat Mr. Stott by thirty-two to nineteen. In the third case Mr. Stott again reached the final stage, but was again beaten, Mr. Arnesby Brown receiving twenty-eight votes to Mr. Stott's twenty-three. The election was therefore somewhat disappointing. We had hoped to see Mr. Stott elected.

THE difficulty of a subject is often its main attraction, it would seem, to some people. To write a play on the subject of "Dante and Beatrice" would appear to be the most difficult of tasks, and no doubt it is, but Miss Emily Underdown has cheerfully attempted it. On a less exalted theme we can believe that she might have achieved some success, but here we see only unsuccessful effort. To introduce upon the stage an emblematic figure of Love when Dante and Beatrice are together is to outrage even the weakest imagination.

THERE reaches us from New York a beautifully printed thin volume which bears upon its title page: "Some letters, by Robert Louis Stevenson, with an autroduction by Horace Townsend." Mr. Townsend tells us that these letters were addressed to Mr. Trevor Haddon, at that time (twenty-three years ago) an unknown but aspiring art student. Mr. Haddon wrote to Stevenson as an admirer, and from that introduction followed the letters here first printed. They are delightful and characteristic letters, hardly touching Stevenson's highest in the way of correspondence, perhaps, but full of wisdom, kindness, and good counsel. We extract the following from a letter dated from Hyères, where Stevenson, it will be remembered, was so happy and contented:—

In your own art, bow your head over technique. Think of technique when you rise and when you go to bed. Forget purposes in the meanwhile; get to love technical processes, to glory in technical successes; get to see the world entirely through technical spectacles, to see it entirely in terms of what you can do. Then when you have anything to say, the language will be apt and copious.

And again:—

Cling to your youth. It is an artistic stock-in-trade. Don't give in that you are aging, and you won't age. I have exactly the same faults and qualities still; only a little duller, greedier, and better tempered; a little less tolerant of pain and more tolerant of tedium. The last is a great thing for life but—query?—a bad endowment for art?

The last letter was written in 1884. Stevenson had been seriously ill, and had "fallen into a kind of blindness." "This more inclines me," he says, "for something to do, to answer your letter before I have read it, a safe plan familiar to diplomats." Then he falls into his old habit of sermonising, but how excellent and strong it all is:—

You seem to me to be a pretty lucky young man; keep your eyes open to your mercies. That part of piety is eternal; and the man who forgets to be grateful has fallen asleep in life. Please to recognise that you are unworthy of all that befalls you; . . . but indeed we are not worthy of our futures; love takes us in a counterfeit, success comes to us at play, health stays with us while we abuse her; and even when we gird at our fellow man, we should remember that it is of their good will alone, that we still live and still have claims to honour . . . I have been getting some of the buffets of late; but I have amply earned them—you need not pity me. Pity sick children and the individual poor man; not the mass. Don't pity anybody else, and never pity fools. The optimistic Stevenson; but there is a sense in these wanderings.

All this is real Stevenson.

THE monument to R. L. S., which it was hoped would be ready by midsummer of last year, is not yet complete. M. Saint Gaudens, who was chosen to execute the work, has been suffering from ill-health; but he has now re-modelled the bas-relief which forms the body of the Memorial, and it is being cast in Paris. It is expected that the monument will be ready for erection in Saint Giles' High Kirk, Edinburgh, in five or six months.

AFTER six years of wandering and litigation the Académie Goncourt has become a legalized institution. The history of the affair is well known. The brothers Goncourt had the amiable idea of founding a literary society which should be a kind of rival of the Académie Française, but instead of forty immortals there were to be only ten. Eight of these were nominated by Edmond de Goncourt, amongst them being Alphonse Daudet, Octave Mirbeau and the brothers Rosny. When Edmond de Goncourt died in 1896, leaving money to his pet scheme, his relatives challenged the ten immortals to prove their right to it. After six years the law has spoken in favour of the ten, and the other day the first meeting of the Académie Goncourt was held. There is to be a prize for a poor author of rich potentialities, and already, no doubt, many a struggling writer feels the money in his purse. It only remains for some ingenious person to form an Academy of one.

CONCERNING the Académie Goncourt, Mr. Edmund Gosse wrote the other day in the "Daily Chronicle." Of its members he said:—

With the exception of M. Léon Daudet, these gentlemen are not very young. Few of them, I think, will see fifty again, although none have yet seen sixty. Without resembling one another closely in detail, they have a certain likeness in their common leaning to the fantastic side of realism, in their enthusiastic study of the art of writing, in their comparative indifference to the public.

Mr. Gosse continued:—

The parallel between living English and French fiction is too uncertain to enable us to conceive an Académie Goncourt in this country. But one may entertain one's self by fancying what would have happened if it had been instituted and endowed amongst us. Imagine the seven original academicians convoked in 1900. I see them in my mind's eye: Mr. Conrad, Mr. George Gissing, Mr. Robert Hichens, Mr. George Moore, "Mark Rutherford," Mr. Wells, and Mr. Zangwill. Mr. Wells is chosen president, and then they proceed to elect three more members to make their number complete. After a really delightful conference, and the omission of some amazing paradoxes, the scrutiny would be made, with, shall we say, this result: Mr. Bernard Capes, Mr. Arthur Morrison, Mr. Benjamin Swift? Would that not be a very amusing little "académie des talons-rouges Anglais"?

The members of the Académie Goncourt, however, have distinct material advantages: they dine together once a month and each receives an annual income of £250.

WITH the current issue of the "Review of Reviews," the "romance that is never to end" begins. In the introductory paragraphs we read:—

The principle upon which this story is constructed is very simple. We take the chief events of the month, and use them as the central incident of a series of short stories, each of which, while complete in itself, is linked on to all its predecessors and those which come after it by its bearing upon the fortunes of the Gordon family, whose widely scattered members are at the heart of most human affairs in all parts of the world.

And here is the first sentence of the story:—

It was New Year's Eve in Rockstone Hall, the seat of Lord Gordon, on the confines of Windsor Forest.

THE number of the weeklies is to be increased by the "Weekly Critical Review," the first number of which is due this week. So far as we can gather the journal is to be a kind of minor "Cosmopolis," since amongst the contributors we notice names French, English, and American. Each issue is to contain three leading articles by well-known writers, and music is to receive particular attention. The review has its home in Paris; the English agents are Messrs. Simpkin Marshall.

THE "Edinburgh Review" publishes a careful appraisal of the work of Mr. Henry James. The list of Mr. James's books, which heads the article, is rather surprising; it contains the titles of thirty-four volumes. The first,

"Watch and Ward," was published in 1871. Towards the conclusion of the article the writer says:—

If he has dropped a line but rarely into the deep waters of life, his soundings have so added to our knowledge of its shallows, that no student of existence can afford to ignore his charts. He has lived, as it were, in the chains with the "lead" in his hands, intent on definite knowledge of the channels and shoals of the human heart, where so many another pilot has been content to steer by the mere appearance of the surface water.

In the "North American Review" we also have an article concerning Mr. Henry James's later work. The writer is Mr. W. D. Howells, and his essay comes as a kind of introduction to the first instalment of Mr. James's new story, "The Ambassadors." Of "The Awkward Age" and "The Wings of the Dove," Mr. Howells says: "These are really incomparable books, not so much because there is nothing in contemporary fiction to equal them as because there is nothing the least like them. They are of a kind that none but their author can do, and since he is alone master of their art, I am very well content to leave him to do that kind of book quite as he chooses." "The Ambassadors" appears to be of "that kind" also. On the second page we read:—

After the young woman in the glass cage had held up to him, across her counter, the pale pink leaflet bearing his friend's name, which she pronounced, he turned away to find himself in the hall facing a lady who met his eyes as with an intention suddenly determined, and whose features—not freshly young, not markedly fine, but expressive and agreeable—came back to him as from a recent vision. For a moment they stood confronted; then the moment placed her: he had noticed her, the day before, at his previous inn, where—again in the hall—she had been briefly engaged with some people of his own ship's company.

Certainly only Mr. Henry James could have written that.

THE other day Mr. Andrew Lang had in the "Morning Post" an article in his lightest and merriest mood. It all grew out of Mr. Watts-Dunton's sonnets in a recent issue of the "Athenæum," which told how Percy Aylwin stood in front of a chalet at midnight. "I was much pleased," says Mr. Lang, "by the idea of a novel 'to be continued in our next—in sonnets.'" And at that moment both of Mr. Lang's hands "began to tremble and jerk, each clutched a pencil and took a piece of paper, and as I am a living and honourable man—set off writing without my conscious interference." Mr. Lang, as he puts it, has recently "obliged the town with a romance," and each hand dealt with one of the two heroes.

Will nobody boom me?

Oh, Robertson Nicoll!

My prospects are gloomy,

Will nobody boom me?

With scorn they review me,

With pen-points they prickle.

Will nobody boom me?

Oh, Robertson Nicoll!

After which Mr. Lang's fancy carried him to the offices of the "Athenæum," and elsewhere, even to "An English-woman's Love Letters" and "The Confessions of a Wife."

C. K. S. has drawn from Major Drury, author of "Bearers of the Burden" and "The Passing of the Flag-ship," some interesting particulars of his experiences. Says Major Drury:—

Whatever grievances, real or imaginary, I may have had during my twenty-two years service as "soldier and sailor too," lack of variety has certainly not been one of them, for I have served repeatedly in each of the garrisons of Chatham, Walmer, Portsmouth, and Plymouth, have been "on detachment" (and listened for thunder!) at Marchwood Magazines in the New Forest, built huts and thatched them with the Royal Engineers at Upnor, studied astronomy and other bewilderingments with the Royal Navy at Greenwich, and compiled secret intelligence tomes (profusely illustrated) at Whitehall.

Major Drury's adventures afloat, which he describes as "no more than those of the average marine," have ranged from a collision in the North Atlantic to landing a picket at Singapore during a Chinese riot. Major Drury was in command of the marines landed from the "Camperdown" and "Astræa" on the occasion of the massacre of Christians and attack on the British camp at Kandia in 1898. The camp was safely reached, and the marines had to exchange their sea-sodden garments for the trews and glengarries of a Highland regiment.

M. DE BLOWITZ, the late Paris correspondent of the "Times," who died a few days ago, was a remarkable personality. He was, in a way, the founder of a new journalism, the journalism which relies more upon general knowledge of men and things than upon note-books. His acquaintance of international affairs was remarkable, so that the American paper which called him the "European Correspondent" of the "Times" paid him a genuine, if unintentional, compliment. M. de Blowitz's style was familiar to all newspaper readers; it was a good many things which style should not be, and yet he expressed his meaning with precision. His method was to dictate his articles to a shorthand writer, who then translated the copy into English. We are told that his work was almost literally translatable into English; yet a good deal of credit is certainly due to the anonymous translator.

Why should a journal which has lived happily and in comparative security in the Isle of Wight suddenly have ambitions towards a wider circulation as a "London monthly review"? The question is hardly answered by "Vectis," which, this month, floats its wider appeal at the modest price of threepence. Yet we wish Dr. Dabbs success in his enlarged venture; it is at least simple and unassuming.

THE "Young Man" prints this month the opinions of various writers concerning the decay of the novel. The opinions, naturally, differ, and none are particularly illuminating. We like best what Mr. Jerome and Mr. E. F. Benson have to say. Says Mr. Jerome:—

The form of the novel will change with the changing ages. But delight in the pictured story—in the imagined life—will remain with us till man has ceased to dream.

And Mr. Benson writes:—

Personally, I don't believe novels are any worse now—i.e. the best of them—than they ever have been. Because an enormous number of indifferent novels are written, it does not follow that the art of novel-writing is perishing, but only that an increased number of folk are attempting to practice it. If I go on, I shall express an opinion, so I will stop.

If other opinions had been expressed with equal simplicity we should have thought them better worth reading. When Miss Barlow says "there are at present no great novelists" we begin to doubt her critical faculty.

THE new catalogue of the London Library is to be issued to subscribers in February. The library contains something like 220,000 volumes, and the catalogue contains a matter of 2,170,000 words. The actual printing was commenced about a year ago, and 8,000 words a day have been submitted in proof. The difficulties of such a task are obvious, but so great a library needs all that can be done in the way of cataloguing.

THE first production of the Stage Society for this season will take place at the Imperial Theatre on Sunday at eight o'clock. There will also be a performance on Monday at three o'clock. The play selected is Ibsen's "When We Dead Awaken." The cast is as follows:—

Professor Arnold Rubek (a Sculptor), G. S. Titheradge.
Mrs. Maia Rubek (his Wife), Miss Mabel Hackney.
The Inspector at the Baths, A. Morrice Seaton.
Ulfheim (a Landed Proprietor), Laurence Irving.
A Stranger Lady, Miss Henrietta Watson.
A Sister of Mercy, Miss Edith Craig.

MR. CUTCLIFFE HYNÉ has achieved the distinction of being the subject of the "World's" seven-hundred-and-eighty-third "Celebrities at Home" article. From it we learn that Mr. Hyné's early tendencies were towards athleticism rather than literature; "he was so good an oar as to be in the University (Cambridge) trial eights, while he materially assisted in working his college boat to a place higher up the river than it had ever attained before." Mr. Hyné is a great traveller and knows Africa extensively. Concerning Captain Kettle we read:—

In was on his journey home, sailing from New Orleans on a tramp steamer, that he met the redoubtable "Captain Kettle," though not of that name. Passengers not being permitted on that kind of craft, Mr. Hyné had to sign articles before the Consul as doctor or mate, and so as one of the crew Mr. Hyné ran the risk of being shot by the fiery little skipper like any other of his shipmates. But Mr. Hyné's Captain Kettle of his famous "Adventures," he admits, is somewhat of a composite creation, embodying the brave spirit, the foul-mouthed imprecations, and the Methodism of the captain with the accordion-playing of the engineer and the poetical effusiveness of the fourth mate.

We like Captain Kettle, but we can never quite forgive Mr. Hyné for depriving him of a leg.

Bibliographical.

Now that Fanny Burney has been adjudged worthy of inclusion in a series of "English Men of Letters," there is every likelihood that reprints of her books will become "lively" in the market. Messrs. Dent have already set the ball rolling with a new edition of "Evelina," which they issued in two volumes just ten years ago, along with "Cecilia" in three volumes—both illustrated, and both under the editorship of Mr. Brimley Johnson. There had been two cheap reprints of "Evelina" by Cassells in 1888, and one cheap reprint of that story (by Ward and Lock) in 1881. In 1881–82 Messrs. Bell sent out an edition of both stories, edited by A. R. Ellis. Of "Evelina" there was an illustrated and a cheap edition in 1898. In Miss Burney's "Camilla" and "The Wanderer," the booksellers, one notes, do not now speculate, though the lady received originally £3,000 for the one, and £1,500 for the other. But the truth is, they are poor things. Miss Burney's sister-novelist, Miss Kavanagh, went so far as to call "The Wanderer" "dull." For Miss Burney's drama, "Edwin and Elgitha," there is naturally no demand. On the other hand, her Diary and Letters have had fair attention paid to them. The "Early Diary" was edited by A. R. Ellis in two volumes in 1889. The "Diary and Letters," edited by W. C. Ward, appeared in three volumes in 1890–2 (Vizetelly), and, edited by her niece Charlotte Barrett, in 4 volumes, in 1891 (Bell). The best popular account of Miss Burney is that published by Messrs. Seeley in 1889, and again in 1895, under the title of "Fanny Burney and Her Friends." It was Macaulay, of course, who started what may be called Miss Burney's modern vogue.

The title of the latest translation from Nietzsche is "Dawn of the Day" (Morgenrothe). The first "Englishing" of this writer appears to have been undertaken in 1896, when Messrs. Henry published a volume translated by T. Common, and another translated by A. Tille. The latter was "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a work which reappeared in 1899 and again in 1901. In 1899 came "A Genealogy of Morals: Poems" and another version of "The Case Against Wagner." For the purposes of the ordinary reader, who does not want to go too deeply into the subject, the volume published in 1901, entitled "Nietzsche as Critic, Philosopher, Poet, and Prophet," may be pronounced sufficient.

Mr. Albert Chevalier, the singer and entertainer, who was photographed the other day "in his library," seems ambitious of literary fame. Not long ago he published his autobiography, under the title of "Before I Forget," and now he has given us a little book of "Limelight Lays." Some of his dramatic pieces are no doubt in print: they range from fantasy to burlesque. The theatrical scribe is nowadays quite a "common object" on the literary shore. Mr. R. G. Legge, the author of the new play at the Shaftesbury Theatre, "For Sword or Song," has thought sufficiently well of it to publish it in book form.

I find Mr. Goldwin Smith writing in the "Daily News" to this effect: "Personal libel under the term of fiction is of all kinds of libel the most cowardly and disgraceful. It is absolutely free from the restraint of truth, and the person libelled has no means of vindicating his character. If he resents the calumny, he is said to be putting the cap on his own head." I wonder whether Mr. Smith, when penning these lines, had in his mind a certain sketch of an Oxford Professor in a certain novel by a late Prime Minister?

The "Edinburgh Review" says of Mr. Henry James: "One has somehow regarded him as the reverse of a prolific writer . . . yet there have been published for the English reader close upon a hundred novels and tales." Of full-blown novels, I think it would be found, Mr. James has not given us even a score since "The American" came out in 1877. So far, I have counted only some sixteen, though there may be more. Where Mr. James has been really fertile has been in short tales. Of volumes made up of such he has produced, over here, some fourteen or so, from "The Madonna of the Future" in 1879 to "The Soft Side" in 1900. It was by his short stories, and notably by "Daisy Miller" and "An International Episode" (in the "Cornhill"), that he first caught the ear of our public. It is even now open to anyone to argue that Mr. James will always be best remembered by his swallow-flights of prose. One regrets that he has apparently deserted the stage since the production of "Guy Domville." I believe he turned his "Daisy Miller" into a comedy which has been printed. Why has it not been played in England?

The late Dr. Gatty's contributions to literature, putting aside sermons separate and collected, appear to have been fairly varied. His earliest volume, it would seem, was "Fancies of a Rhymist" (1833). He is credited with two topographical-historical works—"Hallamshire" (new and enlarged edition, 1869) and "Sheffield, Past and Present" (1873). He wrote a book on "The Bell, its Origin, History, and Uses" (1847). The publications on literary subjects include "Literature and the Literary Character" (1858), "The Poetical Character" as illustrated in the works of Tennyson (1860), and "A Key to 'In Memoriam'" (1881). His clerical labours and experiences were the basis of two other books—"The Vicar and His Duties" (1853), and "A Life at One Living" (Ecclesfield) (1884).

The Young Milton?

NOVA SOLYMA; OR, JERUSALEM REGAINED: An anonymous Romance written in the time of Charles I., now first drawn from obscurity, and attributed to the illustrious John Milton. With Introduction, Translation, Literary Essays and a Bibliography. By the Rev. Walter Begley. (Murray.)

AFTER two hundred and fifty years of obscurity it is claimed that the message of Milton's youth has reached us, and, indeed, so insistent is the chain of cumulative evidence that the general reader will be convinced that he is listening to the interpreter of Milton and to no other. Moreover, when he has been reduced to this state of complaisant acquiescence he will see in the hero of "Nova Solyma" the portrait of Milton himself. For here the urbane persistence of the translator leaves him but little choice. Page after page vibrates with the exaltation of Joseph, and in a long series of footnotes Mr. Begley claims for Milton alone the right to such homage. The reader, caught as it were between two flames burning before one altar, will be content to waive criticism as incompatible with worship.

It is a complex personality through whose lips Milton is thought to have uttered the wonderful secrets of his youth. It is a personality infused at once with the awe of holiness and with the craving for beauty. Joseph is dominated by the stern dictates of the Hebrews, but he is none the less haunted by the far-off whisper of Hellas. Shaken by the passion for sanctity, he peers into the inner depths of his own soul, but he also looks outward, wooed by the mysterious earth-call of nature. Surely we find in this picture that subtle blending of the two spirits—the Hebraic and the Hellenic—which is so conspicuous in "Samson Agonistes."

But it is only here and there, in "purple passages," that one catches the tameless energy of Milton's genius. Ordinarily one feels the weight of a laborious rectitude, the terrible didacticism of Adam without the storm and the genius of Satan. Joseph is illuminating, but not sympathetic—he is impressive, but not magnetic. It is, in short, the third something of the story-teller that one looks for in vain in these pages. And in a romance no amount of abstract reasoning can take the place of this indefinable facility which the labours of Sisyphus can never acquire. Compare the wily Odysseus with the pious Æneas. Both are governed by the lot apportioned to them by the gods. Both break ruthlessly the ties of passion at the call of the hidden fate. Both are fearless and resolute, bound by no fetters other than the threads of their destinies. But what a difference between them, a difference which not even the imperishable charm of Virgil could obliterate!

The book opens with the return of the hero to his fatherland. Two young Englishmen accompany him, and to them Joseph and his father expound the teachings of this Utopia. Then follows a series of discourses on topics of primary interest, such as religion, love, and education. In the treatment of the first we catch a glimpse of Miltonic Arianism. In the second, we are reminded of the "Lady of Christ's." In the third, the anonymous author exhibits the practical knowledge of education which is known to have belonged to the great English poet.

Again, Mr. Begley quotes Prof. Dowden as attributing the absence of a great Puritan literature to the shortness of the Puritan dominance, and it is true that "we can only surmise on the question whether righteousness would have flowered in beauty and severity have worn the garments of joy." He then proceeds to cite the more hostile authority of M. Taine in order further to convince us that Milton was the only Puritan who was able to pass beyond the fetters of English sectarianism. He further cites the curious parallel between Apollos and Milton's own private tutor, Thomas Young.

But it is on the question of language that Mr. Begley is most convincing. He says in his introduction:—

Milton is acknowledged to be the best Latinist of his time in England, and as a versifier following the best classical models of Rome, he was in the first ranks. But he was no pedant. . . . He was careless about his prosody. . . . He was fond of coining words, not always most correctly built up. He has a short vowel twenty-seven times before ap and æ. He has hexameter lines now and then without a caesura (strong). He has one or two fine examples of those rare lines where the sound goes musically with the sense, e.g.:—

Cornea pulvereum dum verberat ungula campum.
Elegia, IV., 119.

Now all these marked peculiarities without one exception can be shown to be the common property of the author of "Nova Solyma" as well.

That sounds like strong evidence, but in the coined word Belgia, used both by the author of this romance and by Milton, the translator advances a most startling proof of the latter's authorship. The book is obviously the work of a poet and a musician and a scholastic, and Milton, without being in the least a pedant, was certainly all three. Moreover, there were between 1600 and 1650 only three romances in England, and Mr. Begley considers that one of these, Mundus Aliter et Idem, may be from an Italian pen. On the whole, then, the translator concludes that no other person than Milton could have written the Utopia known as "Nova Solyma."

Mr. Begley's erudition and his adroitness in handling this literary brief will have an interest for scholars. Some of his eulogies, however, sound excessive, and it is difficult to accept the suggestion that an Englishman at twenty wrote better Latin Hexameters than Virgil. Be this as it may, and setting aside the historic glamour attached to this book, the general reader will naturally look for those unmistakable marks of genius that made the English Puritan one of the world's poets. He will look for the Milton of "Lycidas," he will hope for a faint suggestion of "Paradise Lost." He will seek a hint of that artistic perfection of form which found expression in "Samson Agonistes." He will hope for a glance at that vivifying power to which Wordsworth appealed in the hour of England's need. All these things the general reader will search for in these pages, and in no one instance will he be wholly disappointed.

In the poetry scattered through these volumes you will find classical myths woven into the web of Christianity just as in "Lycidas." In the chapter entitled "Joseph's Ecstatic Vision" it is difficult to avoid seeing a faint foreshadowing of him whose destiny it was "the secrets of the abyss to spy." After alluding to Mr. Begley's comparison of Milton with Virgil, it is hardly necessary to dwell upon the technical finish of the lyrics in "Nova Solyma." But it is in the philosophic morality of the young Joseph before everything else that you will find the beginning of Milton's wisdom. Yes, but the story! In a romance, even from the pen of Milton, may we not look for the elemental thrills, the glamour of love and the eternal mystery of hate? The story, as a story, is a failure in the sense that its author did not aim at producing a work of art as we understand it. Allowing for the differences of time and language, ignoring the tedium of many longueurs, passing over the tiresome conventionalities of bandits and disguised heroines, the romance leaves us indifferent, for in it the simple passions of humanity are treated as abstractions. The story is too reasonable, too emphatically upon the side of the angels to satisfy those who wish merely for an interpretation of life. But, after all, why should we expect a "story" from the creator of one of the world's epics?

Good History.

A HISTORY OF SIENA. By Langton Douglas. (Murray. 25s.)

"MAIS voici Naples. Êtes-vous comme moi ? à l'approche d'une grande et belle ville, je suis prise de palpitations, d'inquiétudes. Je voudrais prendre la ville pour moi." These words of Marie Bashkirtseff express that subtle emotion which the very names of some cities, particularly of Italian cities, recall to many sensitive beings. To such people a city is not an area of brick and stone, a conglomeration of public buildings and private dwellings. It is not an entity merely because it contains so many thousands of inhabitants, or because its haunting associations are plastered over with the aggressive usefulness of modern comfort. For such people it possesses the magnetism of a human being, ennobling or dangerous, but never banal, never to be defined by the prices of its hotels or the relative vigour of its commerce. In short, for these people a city has a soul which is not registered in its directory or exploited in its guide-book. And, though the modern tourist has done his work conscientiously and well, there are still some cities whose souls he has not vulgarised.

Mr. Douglas shows us Siena from this stand-point, and in every page of this attractive volume the author's personal feeling for the Tuscan city is visible. It is his pride to hold a brief for Siena. It is the irony of history that compels him to hold it against Florence. At first one feels acutely the incongruity of one who loves Italy so well indulging in mordant dialectic against the city of Dante. But Mr. Douglas sees Siena as the victim of endless Florentine misrepresentation. For the Sieneſe, indeed, almost from the beginning right on to the fall of their Republic, Florence was the hereditary foe.

This author maintains that the nature of the conflict between these two communes has always been misunderstood. Florence was not a democracy and Siena was not an aristocracy. Neither the union of the former with the Pope nor the union of the latter with the Emperor was "much more than a mariage de convenance." The real, inherent policy of both was commercial. In fact the author rather repels us in the chapter entitled "A Nation of Shopkeepers," so emphatically does he dwell upon the money-making instincts of the Sieneſe. Assuredly it is not in this that we are to search for the soul of Siena. But little by little the personality of the commune grows upon us as the author reveals the curious contrasts of her nature. One quality alone seems to be theirs always and without alloy—the joy of life. Tested by their long conflicts with the feudal nobles, harassed by the merciless warfare of Florence, lacerated by the Foreign Companies, and finally beaten to their knees by the Spaniards, the Sieneſe emerge apparently as reckless and as insouciant as ever.

The defeat of Manfred at Benevento brought despair to the Ghibellines, but it was not until the battle of Colle in 1269 that the Sieneſe lost all hope for the doomed cause. There followed the ill-omened alliance with Florence and the immediate recuperation of Sieneſe commerce. After this we hear of constant internal factions, and the Duke of Calabria is called in to establish order. In 1335, through the agency of Charles IV., the impotent oligarchy of the Nove is expelled from the city. It is followed by an oligarchy of tradesmen of whom the author observes: "The Twelve were the worst of the rulers that ever held sway over this ill-governed State." These are driven from power by The Reformers "after thirteen years misrule." The next phase of discipline to which the Sieneſe are subjected is a series of ruthless incursions by the Foreign Companies who preyed over the whole of Italy. St. Catherine attempts to bring the solace of her calm to the distracted city of her birth, but is only partially successful. And so, on and on, from one conflict to another the Sieneſe burn out the swift flame of their destiny, until at last, under the heroic Montluc, they surrender to Cosimo in 1555. With the occupation by the Spaniards the history of Siena closes; two years afterwards the Republic ceased to exist.

It was a desolate city [writes Mr. Douglas] that the Spaniards took possession of. In two years its population had been reduced from 40,000 to 8,000 souls. But famine and bereavement could not change the nature of the Sieneſe. Their chronic light-heartedness and mobility, their irradicable hospitableness survived all shocks. They could not help giving a welcome to the brave Marignano. Even for him was the city's greeting inscribed over one of her gates—Cor magis tibi Sena pandit. The women hung out their brocades from their windows, and smiled down upon the Spanish cavaliers as they rode by, even as they had welcomed Charles himself twenty years before.

An extraordinary picture, but not yet has the riddle of this wayward people been expounded to us.

The second part of this book is devoted to Sieneſe art, and it is in the Duomo that we are shown the very soul of Siena:—

Sensuous and mystical, shrewd and yet prone to pleasant folly, with a child-like faith in tradition and legendary story, yet unconventional and liberty-loving, passionate alike in love and in hatred, this strange people has here expressed itself in stone.

In his chapter on sculpture Mr. Douglas strongly opposes M. Raymond's theory that none of the reliefs on the façade of the cathedral of Orvieto were the work of Sieneſe sculptors. He traces the artistic development of Nicola and Giovanni Pisano after their transplantation to Tuscan soil. Of Jacopo Della Quercia he writes: "Weaker men, from Sodoma to Burne-Jones, have borrowed his motifs and emasculated them, thus offering Quercia the sometimes doubtful compliment of imitation." He claims that, with the exception of Marrina, this "artists' artist" was "the last sculptor of the highest rank that Siena gave birth to."

The chapter on Sieneſe painting is, naturally, by far the most important in the book. "The Sieneſe," he says, "is the first-born of the great Italian schools of painting." It was the art in which "Siena expressed herself more completely than in any other medium." For Duccio he claims that "in his own sphere, in tempora painting," he had "no superior amongst his contemporaries." He champions him against the misrepresentations of Vasari, who asserted that "the Sieneſe master's greatest followers were disciples of Giotto." Amongst many of the admirable studies contained in this chapter we would call particular attention to those of the brothers Pietro and Ambrogio Lorenzetti and to the profound analysis of Sodoma. Of the antithesis to Sodoma, the respectable Beccafumi, he observes that his "work suffered because of the faults of his virtues." The chapter closes with the statement of three reasons for the comparative deficiency of artistic vitality in the Sieneſe. Briefly these reasons are: (1) exhaustion from war; (2) loss of wealth; (3) the absence in Siena of any "independent epoch-making genius like Massaccio." The book concludes with two chapters dealing, respectively, with the minor arts and the literature of Siena. There are nearly eighty illustrations in the volume, including photogravures.

Except for the fact that the banality, "there is not a dull page in the book," would be offensive as applied to a work essentially serious in its erudition, in its aim, and in its achievement, we should certainly apply it to the "History of Siena."

Intellectual Poetry.

A HERMIT OF CARMEL AND OTHER POEMS. By George Santayana. (Brimley Johnson.)

HITHERTO Mr. Santayana has only been known to us by some æsthetic disquisitions, and by some rather striking sonnets quoted in Mr. William Archer's "Poets of the Younger Generation." He is, we understand, of Spanish birth, from the wind-swept moor,

Where Guadarrama lifts his purple crest, and actually a lecturer in philosophy in Harvard College. Poetry of distinction is at this moment so rare a thing in American literature that we open his volume with some interest. The sonnet is, certainly, his strong point. Its elegiac manner suits his temperament, and he has thoroughly mastered its difficult architecture. Here are two examples from the half-dozen or so in the book:—

BEFORE A STATUE OF ACHILLES.

Who brought thee forth, immortal vision, who
In Phthia or in Tempe brought thee forth?
Out of the sunlight and the sapful earth
What god the simples of thy spirit drew?
A goddess rose from the green waves, and threw
Her arms about a king to give thee birth;
A centaur, patron of thy boyish mirth,
Over the meadows in thy footsteps flew.
Now Thessaly forgets thee, and the deep
Thy keeled bark furrowed answers not thy prayer;
But far away new generations keep Thy laurels fresh, where branching Isis hems
The lawns of Oxford round about, or where Enchanted Eton sits by pleasant Thames.

THE RUSTIC AT THE PLAY.

Our youth is like a rustic at the play
That cries aloud in simple-hearted fear,
Curses the villain, shudders at the fray,
And weeps before the maiden's wreathed bier.
Yet once familiar with the changeful show,
He starts no longer at a brandished knife,
But, his heart chastened at the sight of woe,
Ponders the mirrored sorrows of his life.
So tutored too, I watch the moving art
Of all this magic and impassioned pain
That tells the story of the human heart
In a false instance, such as poets feign;
I smile, and keep within the parchment furled
That prompts the passions of this strutting world.

There can be no doubt of the dignity and the felicity of this writing, of its technical accomplishment, of the largeness and ease of its movement. And the same qualities are to be found in the two fragments of a blank verse drama, in the lyric and elegiac pieces, and in the occasional and lighter rhymes which make up the volume. And yet it leaves us cold; probably because it is altogether cold itself. Mr. Santayana may feel deeply, for all we can tell, but if so, his emotions are frozen before they come out at his pen-point. The general impression left is that of a rather impeccable artist and a solitary and austere thinker, with but little of that rich and lyric humanity which is the life-blood of song. The following lines strike perhaps his most personal note:—

MIDNIGHT.

The dank earth reeks with three days' rain,
The phantom trees are dark and still,
Above the darkness and the hill
The tardy moon shines out again.
O heavy lethargy of pain!
O shadows of forgotten ill!
My parrot lips, when I was young,
To prove and to disprove were bold.
The mighty world has tied my tongue,
And in dull custom growing old
I leave the burning truth untold
And the heart's anguish all unsung.

Youth dies in man's benumbed soul,
Maid bows to woman's broken life,
A thousand leagues of silence roll
Between the husband and the wife.
The spirit faints with inward strife
And lonely gazing at the pole.
But how shall reptiles pine for wings,
Or a parched desert know its dearth?
Immortal is the soul that sings
The sorrow of her mortal birth.
O cruel beauty of the earth!
O love's unutterable stings!

And even here it is less direct and immediate emotion that we get, than emotion highly intellectualised and directed to the abstract.

Daemonic Religion.

THE RELIGION OF PLUTARCH. By John Oakesmith. (Longmans. 5s.)

THIS book is a careful study of a great man's religion, and it must be confessed at once that the interest of the essay is not so much in the ideas herein disclosed as in the fact that these ideas are those with which Plutarch propped his mind. To most of us Plutarch is a lively chatterer of men and their deeds. Had he lived to-day he would have edited the Dictionary of National Biography. Men interested him, and his own bias was never too strong to twist him from contemplating the eccentric curves of others. If it were not that Sir Leslie Stephen himself lives to-day to disprove the hypothesis we should have concluded that the essential of a biographer is that he shall himself be non-religious. Therefore we are grateful to Dr. Oakesmith for throwing into relief those parts of Plutarch's "moralia" which relate specifically to the subject of the essay. No other English scholar has attempted this task, for admittedly Prof. Mahaffy's account is insufficient; indeed, this volume may be regarded as a counterblast to the Professor's blast ("Plutarch is a narrow and bigoted Hellene"). If we mistake not this essay will send other scholars to work on this theme, and we may expect before long to see attempts made to undermine Dr. Oakesmith's position. In this reprint the author has, wisely we think, translated most of the Greek and Latin passages, and accordingly in its present form the book appeals to the general reader as well as to the scholar. We hope that if another edition is called for an index will be added.

Dr. Oakesmith repeatedly insists that Plutarch was neither a very consistent nor original thinker—a statement which the reader will be able to prove without straying beyond the covers of this volume. At the very outset he will continually be asking himself the question, "What would Plutarch do without Daemons?" What Hell was to the theology of the middle ages, and what the Devil is to the narrow Calvinism of our own day, that Daemons were to Plutarch. After enunciating that reason must help us to understand the mysteries of religion or that philosophy must be our mystagogue to theology, we find him calling in the aid of the Daemons to extricate him from every knotty point of his speculation. Postulating a good and merciful God, he bids the Daemons acknowledge their fatherly care of all that is evil in the world in the hope that he (Plutarch) may go on rejoicing in this best of all possible worlds. So the Daemons are the "scapegoats for everything obscene, cruel, selfish." How modern it all seems. We must not infer in a world so populous with Daemons that God himself is quite immune from Daemonic taint, for does not God delay punishment that he may the more effectively bite it in later (p. 110)? Sometimes, however, God punishes "violence, profanity, obscenity," before the actual outbreak of the sin, that is, to put it another way, when the innocent suffer they are being punished for their potential crimes. Now if a deity delays to punish crime in some and yet punishes potential crime in others, it is clear that we are dealing not with a power but with a nullity. Again, the sins of the father are visited on the children, and yet the fathers are punished in the after-world for ever. It is difficult to distinguish Daemon from Deity. Dr. Oakesmith sums up Plutarch's teaching on the punishment of evil in these amazing words:—

It is clear in every part of this interesting dialogue that the god whom Plutarch believes in is a personal deity, a deity full of tender care for mankind, supreme indeed by virtue of his omnipotence and justice, but supreme also by virtue (p. 119).

The early chapters of the volume deal with the morality of the pagan world, and the author seeks to corroborate the statement that the pagan ages were not more immoral than the Christian; in this chapter there is also a brief sketch of Roman religion. We have only space to refer to one or two points. On p. 31 we read that "excess of reason in Plato has produced a similar result to that produced by excess of emotion in modern religion." Assuming that excess of reason is possible, can we draw a parallel between Platonism and the emotional religion of to-day? Is it not the fact rather that excess of emotion simply destroys the power to reason, whereas excess of reasoning has made the Hellenes a spring of intellectual life for all time? Excess of emotion brings religion down to the lowest intellect. Plato's religion was beyond the reach of the ordinary man. But did Plato err by reasoning overmuch? On the contrary, we think that Plato erred, when he did err, by refusing to keep always to the path of experience.

In conclusion, looked at from any point of view, this book is a learned, thoughtful presentation of theological speculations which in differing forms have pleased humanists in all ages.

"Of the Flamboyant School."

WIT AND WISDOM FROM EDGAR SALTUS. By G. F. Monkhood and George Gamble. (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

MR. EDGAR SALTUS, novelist and essayist, has, we believe, a serious reputation in America. It is, at any rate, so far serious that two writers have thought it worth their while to confer on the English public a series of extracts from his writings, designed to exhibit the treasures of style and substance which are found in his work. Of course, this book conveys no idea of his merits or demerits as a novelist; and but an inferential idea of his qualities as essayist. But it is worth while to examine what are the powers which can secure an American reputation as a brilliant master of style. For it is specially in this character that Mr. Saltus is commended to us by the writer—or writers—of the introduction.

The foremost feature (it seems) of Mr. Saltus' style is that he is death on clichés. Remember that; for Mr. Saltus dissembles his hatred with singular ability. He has a wonderful vocabulary, the colour and glitter of a diamond, aims largely at dazzling, is full of point, originality of similes, and occasional unusualness of diction. So far the Introduction. Well, reader, the fact is you know Mr. Saltus. He is one of the flamboyant school: his representative in England is Mr. Capes. The difference is, that Mr. Saltus is crude, terribly crude. He is like this:—

In a second the bull was on him; but in that second a tongue of steel leaped from the muleta, glittered like a silver flake in the air, and straight over the lowered horns it swept and then cleaved down through the parting flesh and touched the spring of life.

That is the way of it. "A tongue of steel leaped from the muleta." How came this exterminator of clichés to talk about "a tongue of steel"—a very bad cliché, if we know anything of the breed? "Touched the spring of life"—another cliché, banal and pretentious enough to satisfy any penny-a-liner. "Glittered like a silver flake in the air." A "flake," we take it, is the worst word in the world by which to describe a long, narrow, pointed object like a sword-blade. The whole passage is a typical example of tawdry pretentiousness in the expression of a plain thing. "A delicious young girl with the Orient in her eyes, and lips that said, Drink me." There you are again! "The Orient in her eyes" is a cliché of purest ray serene. But the last phrase is all Mr. Saltus' own:—

The vicar still calls it damnation to sip
The ripe ruddy dew of a woman's dear lip;

but only Mr. Saltus has dreamed of drinking the lips themselves.

She was a pale, freckled girl, with hair the shade of Bavarian beer. She was not beautiful, but then she was good—a sort of angel bound in calf.

That is wisdom, we suppose—it cannot be wit. But "Bavarian beer," unlike the girl, is beautiful—very beautiful. Another lady is "the sort of woman that ought to be gagged and kept in bed with a doll." Which, unless it were labelled wit or wisdom, we might have taken for mere rudeness. But the cream of Mr. Saltus is perhaps what follows:—

Her hair was Cimmerian, the black of basalt that knows no shade more dark. . . . Her eyes were not oval, but round, and they were amber as those of leopards, the yellow of living gold. . . . When she laughed one could see her tongue; it was like an inner cut of water-melon, and sometimes, when she was silent, the point of it caressed her under-lip.

The most hardened novel-reader might gasp before this lady with Cimmerian hair, eyes at once amber and yellow gold (though gold is not amber nor amber golden), and a habit of licking her lip with a tongue like a slice of water-melon—the last carnivorous trait, possibly the result of possessing leopard-like eyes. Can it be that this is style in America? In England we should send its author to do war-correspondence—perchance for the "Daily News."

EMERSON'S WORKS. 4 vols. (Routledge. 20s.)

THIS handsome complete edition of Emerson is printed from the stereo plates of the well-known "Riverside" edition, but the twelve volumes of that issue are here compressed into four. All the prose and verse published during Emerson's life-time is included, together with the two volumes of Essays, Lectures, and Speeches prepared by his literary executor, Mr. J. Elliot Cabot.

It would be interesting to discover, if such discovery were possible, what influence Emerson has upon this generation. It is hardly, we think, so great as in the past, but that for no reason inherent in the work. He delivered his message at a time and to a people just broadening into the great commercial conditions which seem to govern to-day. His appeal to the non-material and the inner spirit of the material gave a touch of actuality to the force of his message. The actuality in fact remains to-day, but it seems more remote; conditions have altered; much of what he saw coming and deplored has established itself as part of our world; therefore his ideas, or some of them at least, have an air of desuetude. But to turn over these pages is to be impressed once more with the clean outlook, the noble endeavour, of their writer. Emerson's transcendentalism, sometimes too far removed from life, often goes to the heart of it. Always when he talks of Nature he is inspiring:—

One look at the face of heaven and earth lays all petulance at rest, and soothes us to wiser convictions. To the intelligent, nature converts itself into a vast promise, and will not be rashly explained. Her secret is untold. Many and many an Œdipus arrives; he has the whole mystery teeming in his brain. Alas! the same sorcery has spoiled his skill; no syllable can he shape on his lips. Her mighty orbit vaults like the fresh rainbow into the deep, but no archangel's wing was yet strong enough to follow it and report of the return of the curve.

Narrow in certain directions Emerson undoubtedly was, chilling in others. Yet he always had a disarming candour, and confessed his own limitations when he recognised them. Aloofness was his weakness, as when he says, "... though I prize my friends, I cannot afford to talk with them and study their visions, lest I lose my own. It would indeed give me a certain household joy to quit this lofty seeking, this spiritual astronomy or search of stars, and come down to warm sympathies with you; but then I know well I shall mourn always the vanishing of my mighty gods." It was that lack of the support and knowledge of "warm sympathies" which perhaps narrowed his influence.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A ROYAL PARISH. By Patricia Lindsay. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

Mrs. LINDSAY is a daughter of Dr. Robertson, of Hopewell, Aberdeenshire, who for thirty-three years enjoyed the privilege of intercourse with Queen Victoria and her family at the times when they sought the privilege of privacy at Balmoral. Her little book is a kind of note to the published leaves of the Queen's Journal. It contains glimpses of various members of the family, and particularly of the Prince Consort and the Dowager-Empress of Germany.

Here and there, amidst matter of secondary interest, it throws a light upon the more frivolous side of a great sovereign. The office of court jester, it would seem, has survived the name:—

The late Dowager Duchess of Athole, to whom the Queen was much attached, was an excellent raconteuse. I have often heard my father speak of the Queen's intense amusement on one occasion when he was present and the Duchess told the story of the comical advertisement regarding the Dunkeld and Blairgowrie coach, which was once posted in the village of Dunkeld. The coach was named "The Duchess of Athole," and the inn from which it started was "The Duke's Arms." The notice ran as follows: "The Duchess of Athole leaves The Duke's Arms every lawful morning at six o'clock."

There is interest of another kind in the details of the Queen's intercourse with the peasantry, to whom she was no more than the great lady of the neighbourhood. "Come awa ben and sit doon, Queen Victoria," was the hospitable bidding of one woman, to which the Queen of England and Empress of India could respond without sense of degradation. "Is this you, my Sovereign?" was the splendidly simple salutation of another neighbour.

And here is a letter in which that kindly gentlewoman, the Queen of half the globe, condole with Mrs. Lindsay upon the death of Dr. Robertson, her father:—

Dear Mrs. Lindsay,—Tho' I telegraphed to you yesterday, I wish to write to express to you and your brother and sister my true sympathy with you in the irreparable loss of your beloved father, whose last days you have all helped to cheer. I wish also to express my deep regret at the loss of one who was so bound up with former happy days at Balmoral, and with all connected with this my beloved Highland home. . . .

Fiction.

BUSH STUDIES. By Barbara Baynton. (Duckworth. 1s. 6d.)

A BOOK that contradicts a preconception is always interesting, and when, as in the case of "Bush Studies" it is full of the fine art which interprets as well as presents, it must be allowed to stand out honourably from what are too justly called "the ranks" of fiction. Speaking generally, we may say that while Australia's climatic rigours have been freely drawn on to give an impressive local colour, and the picturesque blackguardism of Captain Starlight's type has never lacked a historian, the murk and squalor contingent on a state of soul-deadening isolation have scarcely been peered into by artists of Australian repute.

Here, however, we have an artist who instinctively chooses to draw an Australia which is not of Rolf Boldrewood or Louis Becke or Mrs. Campbell Praed. It is grey and drouthy and blasphemous. It is lonely and it offers cavernous leisure for the doing of foul things. Instead of the bunyip we have the blow-fly; instead of the bush-ranger we have a swag-carrying Tarquin. Instead of the pretty Miss, insuperably charming in her breezy gaiety and white blouse, we have the lady of faulty ancestry who was told "that any red black-gin was as good as a half chow"; and, in short, we have the foul side—the "East End"—of Australia instead of our preconception (in rose colour) of all sides.

And "foul is fair," to misapply Shakespeare, because the writer before us has a powerful brain which controls her invention in almost every instance. The exception is the first story where the grim features are accumulated rather too ostentatiously. There is something so tragic in the bare fact of making a journey of reconciliation in vain; it is so lamentable to miss a last living look of kindness from a mother that the anger of a swollen stream appears a superfluous contribution to the tale called "A Dreamer." What strikes modern minds as the essence of tragedy is rather the feeling of fortuity in calamity than the sense of premeditated blows.

It is quite clear that Mrs. Baynton is fortified and amused by an ironic perception, both daring and original. The secret is out when we find that the murdered wife in the last story might have been saved if a superstitious Irishman had not mistaken her flying form for the Virgin Mary. An ironic perception implies the sense of humour which flourishes bravely in "Bush Church" and "Billy Skywonkie." In the former we see how a wag collected a congregation for a minister by pretending that the man of God was a government spy. The reaction was of the bush bushy, and in all the chatter and gabble and bad manners of the relieved audience we enjoy a perfectly adjusted view of a community in which the midwife is called a "rabbit ketcher" and "a fair sized damper" is "taken from a pillow slip" during a sermon. Billy Skywonkie is a "rouseabout," out of whose mouth we get—"by cripes"!—an excellent piece of art criticism.

She spoke once only, "What a lot of frogs seem to be in that lake!"

He laughed. "That's ther Nine Mile Dam!" . . . "Lake!" he sniggered . . . "Thet's wot thet there bloke, the painter doodle, called it . . . An' 'e drors ther Dam an' ther trees . . . an' 'e puts in ther 'orses right clost against ther water were the frogs is. 'E puts them in too, and damned if 'e don't dror ther 'orses drinkin' ther water with ther frogs, an' ther frogs spit on it! Likely yarn ther 'orses ud drink ther water with ther blanky frogs' spit on it!"

The writer, we may add, has something of Ouida's almost agonising power of individualising animals. She has drawn two unforgettable dogs whose kennels Gulliver might have visited with the reverence he gave to his horses.

BUNNY AND THE TYRELLS. By B. A. Clarke. (Ward, Lock.)

STORIES about real boys are rare, so rare that when we come across them we must needs praise them gladly. And there can be no doubt that these stories by Mr. Clarke are good; the actual boy lives in them, not that manufactured boy who is something between an heroic baby and a sentimental prig. Not that Mr. Clarke leaves out heroism and sentiment, but neither is morbid. We have detected hardly a false note in this little sheaf of studies; here and there are improbabilities and coincidences which the author is quite strong enough to do without, but beyond such trifling matters the work is true.

The "Rabbit" may at first strike the reader as being a little overdone, but Mr. Clarke keeps him down to reality with so much skill that we soon accept him. The three Tyrell brothers are excellent, particularly the youngest, he who begins by quarrelling with the "Rabbit" over the justice of certain applause at an amateur cricket-match in Parliament Hill Fields, and ends by loving him.

"Well plied, sir-ir," screamed the ragamuffins, dwelling lovingly upon the title. (It was only upon the cricket-field that they permitted themselves to use it.)

"Oh! well scraped!" trebled Claude.

Hero worship is ever resentful of criticism, and the result of Claude's efforts to create a higher standard of taste was to bring the cads about him in an angry circle. He thought it time to stand up.

"You think a fat lot of yourself!" said a child of Claude's own age, who was removed from his companions, socially, by the gulf that divides patches from rags.

"Dot him, Rabbit!" cried the expectant ring.

But Rabbit did not "dot" him at that moment. Why he didn't readers of the story will discover pleasantly for themselves.

In matters of sentiment Mr. Clarke strikes us as particularly happy. "The Passing of Pharaoh" tells of the death of a dog, a subject that has been mishandled so often that we approached it with misgivings. But Mr. Clarke suggests the sorrow of the household, and particularly the sorrow of the youngsters, with real and quite human pathos. There are both tears and laughter in the tale.

Altogether we welcome Mr. Clarke to the thin rank of authors who can write naturally about boys. A great point in his favour is that he never makes them smart. The smart boy in fiction is almost worse than the smart boy in real life, and both are unendurable.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

LORD LEONARD THE LUCKLESS.

By W. E. NORRIS.

The story of a failure, told with all Mr. Norris's minute knowledge of the ways and habits of the class in which Lord Leonard moves. The narrative is rather depressing, but the note of ill-fortune is never forced, and the sad and civil hero wins our sympathy, if he does not arouse our admiration. Lord Leonard was born to be a sailor, but fate, by means of an accident to an express train, made him a wealthy peer. A well told, unemotional story. (Methuen.)

THE CIRCLE.

By KATHERINE C. THURSTON.

The motto is: "In youth, we dream that life is a straight line; later, we know it to be a circle—in which the present presses on the future, the future on the past." The heroine is Anna, daughter of Old Solny who kept a curio shop. In Chapter XIV. she receives an amazing letter—with an offer. Before she goes she asks a question of her father: "Which is easier to mend—a broken heart or a cut throat?" A strong story. (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE SHUTTERS OF SILENCE.

By G. B. BURGIN.

The motto is from "Kim"—"We be all Souls, seeking the way," the scene of the story is Canada, and the Prologue describes the Trappist Monastery at Mahota, where the Abbot, "cumbered with many cares, sat alone, his head resting between his hands as he listened to the howling of the bitter Canadian blast." This is Mr. Burgin's nineteenth novel. (John Long. 6s.)

BY THE RAMPARTS OF JEZREEL.

By ARNOLD DAVENPORT.

The frontispiece is a picture called "The Syrians rolled up a ram to the gate," and the pages, which are printed from American plates, are crowded with names that the Old Testament has made familiar. "And in the prophet's ear shrilled a thin voice, the word of the dead Elijah: 'Behold, I will bring evil upon thee, saith the Lord, and will utterly sweep thee away, and will cut off from Ahab every soul in Israel.'" (Longmans. 6s.)

BY A FINNISH LAKE.

By PAUL WAINEMAN.

A novel of Finnish life and character in a Finnish parsonage. It is mainly a love story that is developed amidst the romantic scenery of Finland. "Year by year the solitude of her life shrivelled her up—the intense solitude of ten endless Finnish winters in the depths of the country, the always aching solitude of a barren woman. Only in the springtime did the strange apathy that had stealthily crept over her senses relax." That was Selma Woiren, the pastor's wife: such were her feelings at the beginning of this story. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE LITTLE WHITE NUN.

By MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

A story of intrigue, of an heroic Englishman, and a convent. "Here she comes," said Lady Anson, with a faint tremor of excitement in her voice. "Now what do you think? Did I say a word too much about her beauty?" The beauty in question was Lady Mary Desmond, and the Honourable George Tristram immediately fell in love with her. But before the last chapter, some thrilling things happen, concluding with a rescue from the convent dungeon. (White. 6s.)

THE MAN IN THE STREET.

By LUCAS CLEEVE.

"The Man in the Street" is Robert Latreille's confidential secretary, and Latreille is well-born and by way of being a politician. The girl selected by his family as a suitable wife does not appeal to him; he finds his fate in a beautiful actress. But she is subject to hypnotic influence, hence tragedy and the awakening of "The Man in the Street" to action. A melancholy story. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE MAN WHO LOST HIS PAST.

By F. RICHARDSON.

Humorous, with pictures, and dedicated "to my Aunt Imogen Briggs of New York City." Here is a specimen of Mr. Richardson's humour: "There is an upholsterer in the Edgware Road, who has proposed marriage to all the murderesses who have been executed within the last seventeen years. He is quite a good upholsterer, and he never mentions his unsuccessful love affairs except to the objects of his affections." (Chatto and Windus.)

THE WILFUL WAY.

By HERBERT COMPTON.

By the author of "The Inimitable Mrs. Massingham." The sub-title reads: "Being the Reconstruction of Fallowfield, deceased." When the story opens Bourke Fallowfield is "stony-broke, excepting for fifty pounds in his pocket," and he is "going the way of many transgressors before him—vaguely, to Klondyke, or as near it as cash and circumstances would take him." The man in the lower berth of the liner dies in the night, and by a mistake is supposed to be Fallowfield. So Fallowfield accepts the situation and dies vicariously. An ingenious book of the impossible order. (Chatto. 6s.)

The Grip of the Past.

No student of certain of our modern tendencies, and particularly no student of modern literature, can fail to take into account what is generally known as the Celtic Revival. The movement has been discussed in many quarters: here by people who took the term for an almost meaningless shibboleth, there by those who brought to the question only sentiment and vague enthusiasm. It may safely be asserted that the truth lies with neither of these classes. That the movement has current vitality there can be no doubt, but will it permanently effect any definite change, will it touch the life of a people or merely express itself in individual art? If only the latter, it is a movement interesting indeed, but not of wide moment to a nation, and we refer particularly to Ireland, which is essentially a non-reading nation.

The whole matter is raised by Mr. Stephen Gwynn's recently published "To-day and To-morrow in Ireland." Mr. Gwynn is an Irishman who has found his work in London. "Till I left college," he writes, "Ireland was my home; in the truest sense my home has always been there; and though I have earned my living for the most part in England, a year has never passed by me of which I did not spend a month at least in my own country." There we have two things characteristic of the active Irishman—absence from the land of his heart's desire and the constant backward longing for the places of his youth. And in this we touch the very heart of the matter; that backward longing makes Ireland very much what she is to-day; she dreams of a past charged with visions, colour, battles, and the shows of life; and like the dreamer who half awakes, she turns to her sleep again. This we believe to be true of the nation; individuals there are, of whom Mr. Gwynn is one, who strive in the intervals of more strenuous occupation to revive activities in letters and in material affairs. Of the difficulty in arousing interest in material affairs the history of the last five-and-twenty years speaks, and for those who really want to get near the bed-rock facts we commend Dr. O'Gara's remarkable "The Green Republic" rather than Mr. Gwynn's volume. Concerning the land question, we have seldom read anything so illuminating as Dr. O'Gara's pages; the author leads logically and with cumulative cogency to his honest and broad conclusions. But here we have not to deal with matters of politics or the land; our concern is with temperament and literature.

The Celtic influence in literature has, of course, been great, but, like all partisans, Mr. Gwynn is inclined to overrate it. Indeed, until quite recent years, it has been a small influence. Here is a statement the second sentence of which gives us pause: "Mr. Meredith, by common consent head of those who write in English to-day, is Celt and Welshman, but he is the Celt become cosmopolitan. A Celt may recognise the Celt in him; the Englishman may feel, and probably does feel, in his work an element that is bewildering and alien." But surely all great writers have been cosmopolitan in their appeal. And observe Mr. Gwynn's remarkable assumption that only the Celt can appreciate the Celt; it indicates a narrowness of view, and, we may add, of knowledge, which is astonishing. It may, indeed, safely be asserted that Mr. Meredith's public is essentially an English public; the Celtic imagination in general does not lend itself to such conciseness, such preponderating thought, such heat of actual passion, as make Mr. Meredith's work supreme. The sensitiveness to the "beauty of vagueness, of large, dim, and waving shapes" may be his, but all his philosophy and art tend to concreteness and the facing of facts. From these things may be drawn a loveliness and music of far greater actual value than from "dim and waving shapes." For the Gaelic Revival in Literature we have nothing but goodwill; it seems necessary, however, now and then to remind the enthusiast that exaggeration does not help a cause. We can hardly believe that the effective influence of the Gaelic League and the Irish Theatre is so great as might appear. Certain people are interested, certain intelligences find occupation, but how far does the influence spread? We fancy that interest is stronger in England than in Ireland, at any rate, and that the lovers of Mr. Yeats's verse, for instance, are largely English. As for the revival of the Gaelic tongue in Ireland, we can only say that we watch the experiment with interest. And if it is revived, we very much doubt whether it will greatly help literature. For that literature must largely be created, and the Celts are not a reading people.

Anyone who knows anything about Ireland knows that the Irish Celts are not a reading people. Traditional songs and stories they have, which make the glamour of their twilights articulate and stir those half-conscious memories which are implicit in generation after generation. But the story which circles about the fire, the song that plucks at the heart, does not necessarily imply love for or even a rudimentary appreciation of literature; it signifies the continuity of tradition, the reaching after the unknown, the love of a past which seems to shed light upon a perhaps inglorious present. The love of song and story is common to all races, and the more primitive they are the stronger is that love. It is one of the wonders of our time that a people so near to the greatest activities of the world should have remained so primitive; it is a wonder and at the same time a joy. For behind all the economic failure of Ireland, behind all the sadness of a race backward in physical prosperity, we feel in some sense that that race is a nurse of the things of the spirit, a home for almost forgotten waifs of music, a keeper of the mysteries which can never wholly die and never wholly be understood. No nation, of course, can be made literary, and least of all, we think, could Ireland; for literature must of necessity be self-conscious. Even now we know of places where the "good people" have somewhat fallen from their high estate; the breath of a utilitarian world has reached valleys where not long ago the fairies were accepted as part of the scheme of things. Whether this be well or ill is a matter which we cannot discuss; but it is certain that progress and the printed word are not good for fairies and intuitive symbols. Mr. Gwynn believes in material progress, and he believes in the value of a "background of dim half-comprehended shapes." How shall these two be reconciled? Progress, certainly, we must work for; we cannot nowadays afford to cultivate a preserve of dreams, unless they be such dreams as become revitalized in action.

We wrote recently in these columns of the tragedy of the Celt, and true tragedy there is; but it is a tragedy with divine mitigations. Love of the past is not wholly a Celtic virtue, as some writers would have us suppose; it is as strong in the Anglo-Saxon blood as in the Celtic. But the Anglo-Saxon builds upon the past, and in his activity can project his mind into a future which shall respect his building and assimilate the best of his little labours. The Celt finds his home in the past; it is his sanctuary from the sordidness of the present, a place of secure and serene retreat. And in that lies the mitigation of the personal tragedy, though regarded in terms of nationality it perhaps hardly counts. To be the champion of lost causes is to the individual as fine an impracticable ideal as may be, and in a sense the past is the very battleground and symbol of lost causes. Therefore to live in the past is to confess oneself weak for the present. The present must always have some battle-cry, even though it sound but faintly through formless tumult and ignoble dust; there must always be the forward view, even though the men whose vision can search it out are but a poor twelve in an upper room.

That forward view is foreign to the average Celtic temperament. If it sees the future at all it sees it as a re-created past; it is a temperament which declines upon the old order, feeding upon time vanished as upon living pastures. It is the way of dreams, of delight, of sadness, of unavailing unrest. It is one way of literature as well, but hardly a way to rouse the spirit, to give the call to action, to wrest from circumstance the reluctant jewel of crowned endeavour. Says Mr. Yeats in his "Cloths of Dreams":—

Had I the heaven's embroidered cloths,
Enwrought with golden and silver light—
The blue and the dim and the dark cloths
Of night and light and the half light—
I would spread the cloths under your feet.
But I, being poor, have only my dreams;
I have spread my dreams under your feet;
Tread softly, because you tread on my dreams.

It is good to have dreams to offer, but what of the future? No literary revival will awaken a race. Only from the inside, from the impulse of the people, can that be accomplished. The grip of the past may be as sinister as the grip of a dead hand; to brood upon glory departed may be to forfeit the possible glory of time to come. Yet out of this brooding there has sprung, and may spring, real literature, for literature is as wide as all human experience.

Books Too Little Known.

Mr. C. M. Doughty's "Arabia Deserta."

It would seem to be a point of honour with certain literary masterpieces to hide themselves soon after birth from the eyes of the unconscious world. Standing in silent eloquence out of the garish light of day, like butts of some great vintage, these masterpieces seem too rich in their own self-communings to need any ephemeral patronage. The world shouts its own daily doings down the jarring streets, the while the masterpiece securely lies in the dim vaults of its disciplined publisher, waiting the day of Judgment, that great Remainder day when the indifferent public shall rise up and buy the volumes at a fourth of their published price, and carrying home the purchase, sit down before it in bewilderment. Then, as the years roll on, the public, growing less obtuse, learns at last to drink and like the splendid wine.

This train of thought is suggested by a volume (Vol. II.) of Doughty's "Arabia Deserta" (Camb. University Press 1888). The book is a masterpiece, but whether more than three hundred copies have been put in circulation in fifteen years the publisher's ledger,—it knows, it knows. No doubt a dozen or two of Eastern travellers, and a score or so of Arabic scholars, have Doughty on their shelves, and for aught I know it may be a classic in Germany, that Germany which sends us its learned men to help us to the meaning of an early Irish literature; but of the public that cares for a book primarily as a piece of fascinating literature, what of that public? If such a public exists (and wise men are known to deny its existence) has it ever heard of the book at all, and will it ever hear of it, while the bulk of the edition (at three guineas) lies on the shelves of the Cambridge Press? We know indeed that Mr. Wilfred Blunt has dedicated his translation of "The Stealing of the Mare" to "Charles Doughty, Esq., in recognition of his knowledge, the most complete among Englishmen, of Arabian things," and we are told by a friend of William Morris that Morris used to keep "Arabia Deserta" by his bedside to refresh himself with it, nightly, after the dusty travail of the day; also that it was Burne-Jones's boast that he was one of the first who discovered Doughty; but of the various good men and true, librarians and literate I have questioned, only one had read the book.

I plunged straight into the middle of it (a capital plan when you wish to taste an author's quality, and catch him off his defences), and chancing on the pages that describe the author's departure from Kheybar I could not lay the volume down till the last page was turned. How Doughty got into Arabia, how he sojourned for months in the tents of friendly Beduins, his minute description of their manner of life, his journey with the great Caravan, his adventurous coming to Hayil and many things besides the reader will find in Vol. I.; but we specially invite the reader to take up Vol. II. first and begin it at about page 212. By following this plan he will find an extraordinarily fine narrative unwinding itself before him. For three hundred pages Doughty's adventures will hold him spellbound, and I affirm that if the good Cambridge Press Syndics would reprint these three hundred pages simply as a story of romantic adventure, they would bring to the knowledge of thousands of Englishmen a masterpiece of English literature, a masterpiece which, for the great vigour, and for the cunning fascination of its style, is among the classics of our language.

Here is an Englishman of that old-fashioned, stubborn, yeoman stamp which re-appears through all the changing generations, a national type strong in evidence in our literature from the days of Chaucer to the days of Ben Jonson, from Ben Jonson to Defoe, from Defoe to Cobbett, from Cobbett to William Morris. Superficially the type changes; but of all professions—scholars, poets, merchants or seamen, dons, clerics, or men of business—the men of this old-fashioned sturdy stamp are unalterable in character; they may disguise themselves to-day as modern bankers or wall-paper manufacturers, but, thank God, they are of a type that for real humanity of spirit, for sturdy honesty of purpose, for an old-fashioned independence of all men's opinion, have raised the name of Englishmen in whatever land they have trod. Knotty in grain, but sweet in the fibre, obstinate and prejudiced, often ungracious in manner, but of kindly and gentle heart, these men standing among their countrymen resemble English oak amid the many growths of inferior wood.

And so with Doughty, this Englishman of the old stamp, stubborn as an old country miller, learned with the learning of a ripe scholar, who has sucked in from the breast of his mother University something of that affectation of speech which borders on preciousness, alone he journeys for many long months in the deserts of Arabia, going each day not very sure of his life, yet obstinately proclaiming to all men, to sheikhs and shepherds, to fanatical tribesmen in every encampment, that he is a Nasrany, a Christian. With a pistol hidden in his bosom, and a few gold pieces in his purse, with a sack of clothes and books and drugs thrown on the hired camel of his rafiks, or wandering guides, he goes onward, a quiet man of peace, a scholar of scholars, applying all his stores of learning to interpret all the signs and tokens of the Beduins' life, gaining thereby now a draught of camel's milk in the sickness of exhaustion, and now drawing on himself an Emir's irony by his rough bluntness of speech. He goes, this good man, this Norseman, alone into the heart of hostile Arabia, insularly self-conscious yet lost in the sensation of his adventurings, keenly alive to every sight and sound, very shrewd in his calculations, often outwitted and sometimes despitely treated, a great reader of men's characters, always trusting in God, yet keeping a keen watch on the Arabians' moods; and as he journeys on, this scholar, geologist, botanist, archæologist, philologist, and anti-Mohammadan, we see Arabia as only a genius can reveal it to us; we see, hear, and touch its people as our own most intimate friends. And all these Arabs' characters, [daily cares, occupations, pleasures, worries, their inner and outer selves, are closer to us than are the English villagers living at our own doors. It is a great human picture Doughty has drawn for us in "Arabia Deserta," and not the least testimony to the great art of the writer is that we see him in the Arabians' minds. But wherever the wandering Englishman goes (Vol. II.) he cannot stay long. He must move on. From town to village, from village out into the wilderness, from nomad's tent to nomad's tent he is carried, fetched, dropped, left by the wayside by his uneasy râfiks. The fingers of the most fanatical itch to cut the Nasrany's throat, but with the chief sheikhs and the rich elders of the towns it is an instinct of living graciousness and humanity to shelter him, show him true hospitality, and drive away the mob of base-born fellows clamouring at the stranger's heels. So Doughty makes strong friends wherever he journeys, finds kindly shelter with liberal-hearted hosts who love to sit and question him about the wonders of the Western world, and hear him speak his learned mind on Eastern ways; until at last, a little tired of the Nasrany's power of sitting still, tired of the constant clamour in the town, and of their own growing unpopularity because they shelter him, they open suddenly some postern gate, pack the Nasrany and his saddlebags upon some worthless beast, and send him forth into the desert with some brutish serving-man to act as faithless guide. So Doughty goes, protected by the stars, by his own shrewd weakness, by chance and by his sturdy obstinacy; he goes quite safe, yet ever in jeopardy, trusting in Arab human nature, and in his own command of Arab lore, yet humanly alarmed and ready to cry out when his fanatical companions eye his bulging saddlebags, and feel the edges of their knives.

The style in which Doughty brings before us a mirage of the strange wildness of the upland stony deserts of Arabia, a land of rocky lava drifts girt in by savage crater peaks, and interspersed here and there with green valley oases, where villages and walled towns have been built because there only is there water—the style by which Doughty communicates to us the strange feeling of his traveller's days and nights, his hourly speculations and agitations, his inner strength, his muttered doubts, his own craft and purpose, is the style of a consummate master of English. There is affectation and preciousness in the language, as I have already said. Many, however, are the travellers and few are the styles. Palgrave's style is flat and colourless and tame beside Doughty's; Burton's style is ordinary, more overloaded, vigorous, commonplace. True, there is Mogreb-el-Aksee, of which the style is both brilliant and tender; but Doughty has succeeded better than any English traveller I know in fashioning a style and forging and tempering it so as to bring the reader into intimate contact with the character of the land he describes, while contrasting with it artistically the traveller's racial spirit. Doughty forges and smelts words as only a learned man can; he goes back to the Old Testament for a plain, smiting simplicity of speech; he lifts straight from the Arabic the names of the creatures, the plants that Arabia has fashioned in her womb, the names for the weapons, the daily objects, the slang and the oaths that are in the mouth of the Arab. And into this rich medley of idioms he mixes the old English words, the Norse words he loves as only a cunning craftsman in language can. He is an artist therein, for, as I have said, the main vision his book leaves on the mind is a vision of a stubborn latter-day Norseman (mixed with the blood of an Old English cleric) adventuring forth amid the quick-witted, fierce, fanatical, kindly and fickle Arabians. Doughty's style is that of a man with a great instinct for the shades of language, his vocabulary is very rich and racy. If there is a spice or more of affectation in his speech we welcome it as a characteristic ingredient in the idiomatic character of the whole.

Here I must stop, and bid the reader rise up and investigate the book for himself. The last three hundred pages of "Arabia Deserta" I repeat is the finest narrative of travel, and one of the most racy pieces of English prose, that our century can show. Just as Defoe and Cobbett, those men of the old-fashioned English breed, are living in English literature, so also will Doughty live. How long, I wonder, will his masterpiece lie, practically unknown, on the shelves of the Cambridge University Press?

Impressions.

XVI.—The Unemployed.

We stood, the overworked man and I, watching the procession of the unemployed crawling towards Hyde Park. Thin, pinched, undersized, with the furtive look which hunger brings, they marched four abreast, and the traffic stopped to let the failures pass. Their meagre figures looked piteously small beside the robust policemen who escorted them; over their heads floated dingy red banners with "Unemployed" scrawled upon them; along the footpath ran the collectors, rattling the money boxes, and thrusting them into the faces of the lookers-on. With many stoppages the procession passed along the frozen street, bringing with it another banner on which was inscribed the words, "Work for All, Overwork for None." My companion smiled bitterly. "There's work for them all in the country," he said, "if they would only be content to go back to the land. Curse these cities! Well!" he looked at his watch, "I must go back to my fifteen hours working day." The sad procession passed on slowly, and when it stopped the men stamped on the ground, blew on their fingers, and huddled their thin garments closer about them. "Still freezin'," remarked one; "I must keep my 'ounds in the kennel for another day. The Duchess 'ill be disappointed." The policeman to whom he addressed the remark said nothing.

Suddenly the sun shone out. It flashed on the telegraph wires, transformed the windows of a house into a dazzle of light, and I saw, in quick vision, another regiment of the unemployed, but these were neither hungry, nor cold, nor unhappy. The frost had brought them joy. They were skating on a lake, tall fir trees bending beneath their white burden on the margin of the lake, and on them, on the tops of the mountain, on all that wide land, the winter sun glowed. There was no wind. "Still freezing," cried one, laughed joyously, and glided away with his companions across the ringing ice, the flush of health on their faces, the joy of living in their eyes.

Then the sun disappeared, and I was back in London streets face to face with the other unemployed. Mournfully I watched them pass, and later in the day met them again. It was twilight, but the fog had made an end of daylight early in the afternoon. Over everything hung that murky gloom, over the procession of the unemployed, over the faces of the employed who left their work to watch. The day's tramp was ending; they were going eastwards—home—but the fog was so dense that I could only see those who slouched close by. Somewhere far in front the head of the procession felt its way through the dim streets, somewhere far behind the tail followed obediently, and out of the thick night came the rattle of the coins in the collecting boxes. A woman near me pushed the box contemptuously away. "Want work, do they?" she cried; "I've been a week trying to get a man to mend a window-sash."

Then, as I walked with them, a naphtha lamp flamed out from a costermonger's barrow, and again I saw in quick vision that other regiment of the unemployed. With them, too, it was freezing, but there was no fog in that clear air, and the moon rode high in the night-blue sky. A rocket shot upwards, and at that signal their procession started. Japanese lanterns, green boughs of trees, flags and streamers waved above them, bonfires blazed beside their path as down the mountain side they raced on the crisp snow laughing, shouting. Lighted torches were in their hands, the flush of health was on their faces, the joy of living in their eyes.

The barrow with the naphtha lamp passed on. I watched the last straggler of the London unemployed disappear into the fog.

Drama.

The Taste of Queen Bess.

A LEGEND, which cannot be traced before the early years of the eighteenth century, has it that Shakespeare wrote "The Merry Wives of Windsor" at the express bidding of Queen Elizabeth, who was determined to behold Falstaff in love. "She was so eager to see it acted," writes John Dennis, who in 1702 "improved" the play into "The Comical Gallant; or The Amours of Sir John Falstaff," that she commanded it to be finished in fourteen days; and was afterwards, as tradition tells us, very well pleased with the representation. In spite of its late date, there is no reason to doubt the substantial truth of the story. Disappointed with the failure of "Henry V.," probably presented before her at Shrovetide, 1599, to redeem the promise of the epilogue to the Second Part of "Henry IV." and "continue the story, with Sir John in it," Elizabeth may well have imposed on the peccant author the task of repairing his omission in time for the Garter feast on the following St. George's Day, April 23. That it was intended for production at a Garter feast, I am pretty sure, although the literary historians, so far as I know, have failed to seize upon the point. Obviously it was played at Windsor, and the singing-children of St. George's Chapel, who are said more than once to have rivalled their better known fellows of the Chapel Royal in the acting of plays, supplied the ouphes and meadow-fairies of the last scene. The feast of St. George was invariably kept at Windsor, while at Christmas and Shrovetide, the more usual seasons for plays, the court was generally at Greenwich, or some other palace in the neighbourhood of London. There is an elaborate compliment in the same fairy scene to the Garter itself, and its motto; and in an earlier passage an allusion to that "Cousin Garmombles," the Duke of Wurtemberg and Count of Mompelgard, whose persistent endeavours during 1598 and 1599 to obtain the knighthood which had been promised him, must have formed a standing joke amongst the members of the Order.

Elizabeth's whimsy has exposed her to the ridicule of the critics. "That Queen Bess should have desired to see Falstaff making love," writes Hartley Coleridge, "proves her to have been, as she was, a gross-minded old baggage." And they go on, with a remarkable unanimity, to demonstrate that Shakespeare only made a show of yielding to the royal demand, and that Falstaff, the misused gull of "The Merry Wives," is in reality quite another personality from the Falstaff of infinite jest and triumphant mendacity, who "coruscates the facts of life away" in "Henry IV." Hear Prof. Dowden, the best, to my mind, of all the "aesthetic" critics of Shakespeare:—

Shakespeare yielded to the necessity. His "Merchant of Venice" might pass well enough with the miscellaneous gathering of upper, middle, and lower classes which crowded to a public theatre. Now he had to cater specially for gentle-folk and a queen. And knowing how to please every class of spectators, he knew how to hit off the taste of the "barbarian." "The Merry Wives of Windsor" is a play written expressly for the barbarian aristocrats with their hatred of ideas, their insensibility to beauty, their hard efficient manners, and their demand for impropriety. . . . But Falstaff he was not prepared to recall from heaven or from hell. He dressed up a fat rogue, brought forward for the occasion from the back premises of the poet's imagination, in Falstaff's clothes; he allowed persons and places and times to jumble themselves up as he pleased; he made it impossible for the most laborious nineteenth century critic to patch on "The Merry Wives" to "Henry IV." But the Queen and her Court laughed as the buck-basket was emptied into the ditch, no more suspecting that its gross lading was not the incomparable jester of Eastcheap than Ford suspected the woman with a great beard to be other than the veritable Dame Pratt.

I can imagine no more delightful employment for an "aesthetic" critic than this, of discussing the psychological identity of two of the figments of Shakespeare's brain. I am myself of opinion that such speculations presuppose a much nicer literary conscience in Shakespeare than he would have laid claim to; and I can imagine the gust of laughter, "broad as ten thousand beeves at pasture," with which he would have greeted the suggestion of another talented Irishman, Prof. Boas of Belfast, that the Falstaff of "The Merry Wives" is his "literary crime." To me, after making allowance for the fact that the humour of any comic character is likely to wear a little thin, especially at a fortnight's notice, by the third time of asking, the two creations seem sufficiently similar. I make no doubt that they did, not only to Queen Bess and her ladies, but also to the groundlings of the pit. It is true that, in the wit-encounters of Eastcheap, Falstaff always came out on top, with the laugh on his side; and that at Windsor the laugh goes woefully against him. But the difference in the circumstances must be taken into account. We have seen Falstaff triumph over a careless prince, who, after all, only bided his time, and the riff-raff of the Boar's Head tavern; never before have we seen him at odds with the impenetrable chastity and practical wit of the English middle classes. What avails a power to "coruscate away the facts of life" as a weapon against Mrs. Page and Mrs. Ford and their buck-basket?

Any stick is, of course, good enough, in these days of the Catholic revival, to beat Queen Elizabeth with. But one can hardly be surprised that she thought "The Merry Wives" a good play. It is a good play; much better for the purposes of the stage than either part of "Henry IV.," wherein, indeed, as a dramatic artist, Shakespeare probably touches his low-water mark. Even the Falstaff scenes, leading as they do to nothing in particular, can hardly galvanise the tedious chronicle into life. "The Merry Wives," on the other hand, has tremendous go in it, especially when Mrs. Page is Miss Ellen Terry, with her infectious high spirits and her delightful scorn for the text. It is a little overweighted by the elaborate modern staging, which delays the rapid action suitable to a farce. But this Shakespeare could hardly have foretold; and the two central scenes fully retain that vivacity which so much of Elizabethan comedy, depending as it does upon fashions of verbal fence, has unfortunately lost. The piece is a farce, not, of course, in the modern sense, but in the sense of fifteenth century France, according to which the farce is an acted fabliau. And of an acted fabliau it is the best English specimen, just as Chaucer's "Miller's Tale" and "Reeve's Tale" are the best English specimens of the narrative fabliau. It has all the well-known characteristics of the genre: the realistic portraiture of contemporary types; the frankness, not to say coarseness, of manners; the slight esteem for the marriage-tie; the love of "scoring-off" someone, and by preference in a matter of venery. The fact that the someone is the man of rather better birth could only give an added spice to so eminently bourgeois a literary form as the fabliau has always been. Nor was the victory of the "wives" over the gentleman a subject in any way adapted to offend the susceptibilities of Elizabeth and the company at the Garter feast. The great nobles who filled the stalls of St. George's Chapel were not likely to trouble themselves about the dignity of a Sir John Falstaff or a Justice Shallow. They could look on with complacency while a mere "knight" or an "armigero," from whose social aspirations they had not improbably suffered, was made ridiculous by persons only a degree further removed from themselves in rank. And for Shakespeare himself, the irrepressible poet, there was that wonderful forest scene at the end, of which the full beauty is brought out at Her Majesty's Theatre, and which makes such a delightful contrast to the bustling realism of the rest of the play.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Ruskin Intervenes.

BEFORE me lie five volumes. The covers are faded, the end papers have changed colour, faint are the pencil notes on the ample margins, but the well-spaced type is as clear as when, forty-three years ago, the volumes were printed. The day for reading these volumes carefully through has gone by: they have passed into that place where abide those books that having been once absorbed are now dipped into, never without illumination, often with astonishment. I know no other writer who gives so vivid an impression of a still active personality as does Ruskin in these volumes of "Modern Painters." He is more alive than many of the living. Perhaps it is because, with all his gifts, he is so human. Other writers hide their weaknesses, and blur their inconsistencies: he wears no armour. "I have arrived" is not his motto: he is always the student, no more ashamed of his slips than he is proud of his triumphs, and (in these days this is almost a distinction) he has a Faith on which he leans, in which he glories, and which, through all vicissitudes, remains.

To the writer with whom time is precious and parcelled out, these volumes of "Modern Painters" have their disadvantages. They delay the work in hand if you use them for reference: you desire to know what Ruskin says about Cuyp, but Corregio catches the eye first, and Cuyp and your duty wait.

At the Old Masters exhibition at Burlington House there is a room full of pictures by Albert Cuyp, described as the "distinctive feature" of the exhibition. I spent an hour among them to discover that my feeling for Cuyp was neither like nor dislike. An able and conscientious maker of landscapes was the verdict. Then I bought some newspapers and read the columns of comments that have been written on Cuyp during the past week. Enthusiasm was not their note. "Among the more tedious of the lesser Dutchmen," said one; "an unloving nature and unlovely manner," said another; "he bears repetition ill indeed, and the sense of manufacture becomes distressing," said a third. Poor Cuyp! Stay. What is this? "Never has winter sunlight been represented as it is in Cuyp's 'Scene on the Ice,'" said a fourth; and a fifth eulogised "a truly marvellous 'Castle of Nemwygen.'" The desire to know what bookmen thought of Cuyp had, by this time, seized me, so I walked down to the British Museum and turned up Cuyp in the nearest encyclopædia. The criticism was as succinct as a market report. "Born 1605. He excelled in the painting of cattle grazing or reposing, moonlights, wintry landscapes, still waters with ships, horse-markets, hunts, camps, and cavalry fights."

From a business point of view the dusty encyclopædia's criticism was admirable, but, surely, there was something more to be said for Cuyp, and that something, if anywhere, should be somewhere in the five volumes of "Modern Painters." I consulted the index. Good! There was an inch and a half of references to Cuyp. I selected one at random, this: "no sense of beauty i.75," then proceeded to search for the passage, but it was long before I found it. This amazing book makes for delay on every page. Pursuing Cuyp, I found myself reading about Angelico, Salvator, Durer and Giorgione. Two passages I could not forbear transcribing. These:—

"In Durer, you have a far purer conscience and higher spiritual power [than in Salvator], yet, with some defect still in intellect, contending with evil, and nobly prevailing over it; yet retaining the marks of the contest, and never so entirely victorious as to conquer sadness."

"In Giorgione, you have the same high spiritual power and practical sense; but now, with entirely perfect intellect, contending with evil; conquering it utterly, carting it away for ever, and rising beyond it into magnificence of rest."

The man who wrote these passages could not be expected to admire Cuyp unreservedly. Ruskin acknowledged that Cuyp "painted the sunshine," but no more. Turner painted the sun colour. But Ruskin's quarrel with Cuyp was of a piece with his quarrel with all the Dutchmen. They were just painters; their pictures had no other significance. This attitude is the essence of Ruskinism, for this the world has either loved or derided him. Nothing happens in Cuyp's pictures, says Ruskin, except some indifferent person's asking the way of somebody else. "For further entertainment perhaps a red cow and a white one; or puppies at play, not playfully; the man's heart not going even with the puppies."

There you have the essence of Ruskinism again. The Dutch painters do not care about the people, he complains, but about the lustres on them. Cuyp cares nothing about the puppies as puppies; he sees only the shine on the flaps of their ears. The fault, he adds finely, does not lie in the thing's being little, or the incident being slight. Then follows this: "Titian could have put issues of life and death into the face of a man asking the way; nay, into the back of him, if he had so chosen. He has put a whole scheme of dogmatic theology into a row of bishop's backs at the Louvre. And for dogs, Velasquez has made some of them nearly as grand as his surly kings."

Ruskin has delayed me so long, that there is small opportunity, even if one were willing, to say much about the Cuyps at Burlington House. It is difficult to be enthusiastic about any of them, even the "Scene on the Ice," or "The Castle of Nemwygen," but Cuyp has a name, and there are those who will go to Burlington House because of the room hung with his pictures. "There are some beautiful Cuyps here," I heard an old gentleman say to an acquaintance, as he gave up his umbrella in the vestibule. His face wore a look of happy expectation.

Among the other pictures in this heterogeneous collection is one that might well form the subject of a separate article—Tintoretto's "The Nine Muses in Olympus." It asks and receives unbounded admiration, but I cannot say that it gives me any personal pleasure. The work of a Titan often fails in this respect, and this picture is Titan's work. These buxom muses sprawl their athletic limbs across the clouds, almost blotting out the sun shining through the clouds in the background. Magic it has not, nor charm, nor suggestion of that gracious welding of spirit and substance that we might expect from the muses in Olympus; but the boldness of the design, the modelling of the limbs, and the consummate ease with which they roll from shade to shine, and shine to shade assures the modest speculator that, although he is quite willing that the King and not himself should be the owner of this picture, he is in the presence of a masterpiece. Cast your eye on Bonifazio Veneziano's "Emblematical Subject" that hangs close by, and you will see at once the difference between great and medium painting. After the Tintoretto it was a drop into dulness to stand before Calcott's studio-stormy-sky, lit by a studio-sun; Linnell's worried "Storm in Harvest" brought no refreshment, but beyond in the corner I found David Cox's small "Thames at Purfleet." Here was the little thing done beautifully for its own sake—the poet's vision, not the crash of the Titan's thunderbolts, in a word—peace.

When I reached home that night it was not to read Ruskin on Tintoretto, but that last chapter of "Modern Painters" called "Peace," with his promise of the Morning Star, and his confession of faith: "Blind from the prison-house, maimed from the battle, or mad from the tombs, their souls shall surely yet sit, astonished, at His feet who giveth peace." That "astonished" starts from its setting.

The Beginnings of Language.

DR. ARTHUR EVANS, in the first of what promises to be a very interesting series of lectures on the Pre-Phœnician Alphabet, asserted last week that primitive man drew before he talked. At first sight, the statement sounds like a product of the scientific imagination merely, because it has generally been supposed that one must think before one draws, and thought has been always looked upon as the child rather than the mother of speech. Thus the well-known lines of Shelley:—

He gave man speech, and speech created thought,
Which is the measure of the universe.

But the services which the learned keeper of the Ashmolean has rendered to anthropology by his discovery in Crete of the relics of a hitherto unsuspected civilization have given him the right to have his words examined carefully, and it is quite possible that here he and not the poet is right. We are in such matters so much under the influence of tradition, that even Haeckel, who can hardly be accused of superfluous respect for it, talks about "the articulate language of words" as being "the real and chief characteristic of man." Yet it is plain to all of us that articulate language is by no means confined to man alone. The parrot, for instance, can articulate as clearly and distinctly, when carefully taught, as any human being; he can also, unlike man, pronounce all languages with equal facility, and he can even, as Darwin thought, use his words with appropriate reference to the matter in hand, or, in other words, to express his thoughts. That a trained parrot, when angry, will scold in English or in any other language with which he is acquainted, is, indeed, common knowledge, and he can even be taught to say "good morning" and "good night" at the appropriate time of day. So, too, it cannot be doubted that dogs understand a great part of the words of their masters, and form, as has been said, "actual general concepts" on hearing them, as when a terrier displays excitement at the whisper of "Rats." But dogs, although in domestication their barks acquire a great capacity for modulation, and thereby become the medium of expression of various emotions, do not possess an articulate language, and it is evident that in this case thought precedes instead of following the gift of speech.

We see, therefore, that the very fount and origin of language is thought, or the power of forming general concepts, and that this is shared by man with the more intelligent of what he calls the "lower" animals. But at what time in the evolution of man did language become articulate? We may or may not believe with Haeckel that there existed before the appearance of man as we know him upon the earth, an ape-like and speechless being whom he calls Pithecanthropus alalus. But that man like his predecessor up to a comparatively recent period of his development was without articulate speech seems deducible from the fact that even now it remains one of the accomplishments which have to be taught to him. The baby when first born is as incapable of articulate speech as any ape, and although quite capable of expressing his emotions by howls, only acquires language by a long and presumably painful course of training. Yet his glottis and other bodily apparatus for the production of speech are as fully formed at his birth as afterwards, and are never, perhaps, better adapted to their purpose than the corresponding organs in the parrot. We may, therefore, conclude that articulate speech was the result not of any natural gift, but of some change in man's environment, and we must associate this with some particular epoch before we can give even an approximate date for its origin. Such a change must have occurred at the termination of the Glacial Period, when the advance of the glaciers drove quaternary man to huddle in caverns; and thus to associate with his fellows under circumstances which made speech much more a necessity for him than it had ever been before. As to the way in which it came to be introduced, we can only again refer to the parrot and to the baby. In both these cases the talker learns to articulate by imitating the sounds made by his teacher, and it was Darwin's opinion that imitation was in like manner the first factor in the evolution of speech. Baboons have been observed, when feeding together, to set sentries who, on the approach of danger, warn the rest of the herd by peculiar cries, and Darwin conjectured that the first step in the formation of language was taken when some unusually intelligent ape-sentry first differentiated his warnings by imitating in his cry of alarm the noise made by the approaching lion or other cause of terror. But this step has never been shown to have been taken by baboons or other existing variety of monkey, and, if it has been, was never followed up, else would they now possess a language. On the other hand, it may very well have occurred to our ancestors who dwelt in caves, where they would be peculiarly exposed to the attacks of wild beasts. We are, therefore, thrown back for the beginnings of language to the middle of the Quaternary Age.

How does this agree with Dr. Arthur Evans' statement that man drew before he talked? Art, as was said in the ACADEMY of 30 August 1902, also had its origin among the cave-dwellers whom we have noticed as the most probable inventors of speech. Yet some of the means of art were certainly in existence earlier. The first thing that was necessary to man before he could draw was a pointed tool with which he could do it, and chipped flints have been found which go back beyond the Quaternary Age and which seem to belong to the Tertiary. It is quite true that M. de Mortillet and others are of opinion that these flints were worked, not by man as we now know him, but by the being—Pithecanthropus or other—whom they call the "Precursor" as being man's immediate predecessor in time. But this need hardly detain us. If the Precursor were capable of chipping flints to a point, there is no reason why he should not draw with them, and if he did, Dr. Arthur Evans' point would be established. For the Precursor, whatever he was, almost certainly did not talk. Although he may have known the use of fire, he seems to have been a solitary being, living almost entirely in trees, and subsisting—perhaps entirely—on a vegetarian diet. He must have ranged freely over a large stretch of country, and as most of the existing seas—the Channel for instance—were then non-existent, he probably saved himself from the fiercer animals by flight rather than by combined resistance. Hence he had never the necessity for speech which pressed upon his successor of the cavern.

On the other hand, it must be said that no drawings or other attempts at art going back to the Tertiary Age have yet been found, although, as all our collections of Tertiary tools, weapons, and other relics, are as yet very limited in extent, there is yet plenty of time for them to be discovered. But drawings, some of them executed with rare skill, of the early Quaternary Age are common enough, and on the whole, it seems most probable that the origin of drawing is coeval, and not prior to the origin of speech. This corresponds with the few inquiries that have been made into the condition of deaf-mutes, who can seldom be taught even the rudiments of drawing until they have learned to express their thoughts in words. We shall do well, therefore, until some remains of Tertiary art are discovered, to believe that drawing, instead of preceding talking, came to man at about the same time. But we must not forget that one grain of actual proof in such a case will upset a ton of theory.

Correspondence.

A Poet of a Hundred Lines.

SIR,—The reviewer of Prof. Murray's "Euripides" expressed a doubt and a hope that some original poetry by him had appeared. Two months ago Prof. Murray contributed some hundred lines of great beauty to the "Glasgow University Magazine." They were entitled "An Introduction to a Narrative Poem." The following is an extract:—

And certes some have won their hope, and caught
The flash and held it; but most fail, and seem
As one that starts to tell his last night's dream
Of marvel and strange joy; and as he tries,
Finds he has half forgotten, and his eyes
Cloud, and he tells perforce, as best he dare,
Something a little like it, here and there
Amid false places and invented things,
Holding some ravelled shreds, some echoings,
Of the lost wonder of his dream of dreams.

In the preface the poet remarked that the work itself would probably never see the light of day.—Yours, &c.,

NIGEL CARLYLE GRAHAM.

Scenic Realism.

SIR,—If such considerations as whether we watch a play through a fourth wall of a room or whether we should regard ourselves as within the room, if these nursery considerations interfere with your correspondent's enjoyment of the drama, then have I a suggestion. Let the managers provide small pieces of board with a hole in the middle labelled "keyhole." These implements might be given out to such of the assembling spectators as wished for them, and who would then no doubt experience complete illusion and might become even more enthusiastic over "The Christian King."—Yours, &c.,

M. B. A.

"Or, by a Potion, end them."

SIR,—The line in "Hamlet": "and, by opposing, end them" cannot by any stretch of interpretation be made to harmonise with the words which follow: "To die, to sleep." A man who should kill himself to escape the troubles of the world could not be said to take arms against and oppose them.

On the other hand, if it be taken in conjunction with the preceding line: "Or to take arms against a sea of troubles," it expresses what Shakespeare knew to be an impossibility. The sea of troubles is composed of the whips and scorns of time, the oppressor's wrong, the pangs of despised love, and other things, against which no arms avail.

Moreover, if by taking arms and opposing them, it were possible to end these troubles, no question could arise as to whether this was nobler than suffering them.

Again, the alternatives of endurance and opposition do not exhaust the modes in which we may meet troubles. There is the third cause—suicide. Hamlet asks himself which of the first two is the nobler. According to the usual rendering he makes no inquiry relative to the third. Yet it is on the third his mind dwells longest.

Is it not possible, then, that instead of "and, by opposing, end them," Shakespeare meant to say:—

—Or, by a potion, end them?

He could not have stated confidently that by opposing them they would be ended. Yet the line expresses confidence that the effect would follow the cause. But, while there is no room for confidence, that opposition would end the troubles, it is absolutely certain that a potion would do it.

Another argument for the "potion" reading is that it leads naturally to the thought of death which follows.—Yours, &c.,

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 174 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best set of verses, not to exceed sixteen lines, on an old School Book. Thirty replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss Violet M. Wainwright, 6, Grand Avenue, Hove, Sussex, for the following:—

TODHUNTER'S ALGEBRA.

When on thy shabby back the name I see,
"Todhunter's Algebra" in letters gold,
My thoughts fly back to bygone hours with thee,
To far-off days ere thou and I grew old.

Thou, little book, alone did'st point the way
To calculate results when C, self-willed,
Would water casks of wine he sold to A,
Or empty out B's cistern newly filled.

But when from Euler's proof I fain would flee,
Equations shun, where $x + y$ are n
Though $y^2 = 40m + 3$,
Another service thou did'st render then.

Cover for notes in school, from hand to hand
From friend to friend did'st pass. Now on the shelf
I lay thee, thy work done. There shalt thou stand,
Whither I soon shall follow thee myself.

Other replies follow:—

CURTIS' GREEK GRAMMAR.

O woeful book of which I speak
That every scholar once was put in!
Whereof each single word was Greek
That was not Latin.
My master was a blue-eyed man,
And I a fine-haired Celtic dreamer:
Quoth he: "Now, do the best you can,
And mount the 'Bema.'"
The Bema was his desk sublime
From which I had to say my grammar—
To-day—O strange revenge of Time—
I am a crammer.
And once—(I was but nine)—he said,
"Come, Alpha Beta, no more crying!"
To-day, the kind old man is dead,
And Greek is dying.

OLLENDORF'S FRENCH TEACHER.

Dear Ollendorff—when I was young
How bitter were the taunts I flung
At your benign and reverend head:
How loth was I to leave my bed
To struggle with the Gallic tongue;
But vainly to my quilt I clung,
And vainly hid the sheets among;
No rest for me till I had read
My Ollendorff!
What splendid moral teaching hung
Upon your phrases aptly-strung:
How each man grab'd his neighbour's bread,
And how that evil fashion spread;
No longer shall you live unsung,
My Ollendorff!

[J. E. B., Ipswich.]

CLARENDON PRESS "TEMPEST."

Herein I found what glorious fastime
When wakening to the poet's spell
And scornful precepts given in class-time
I followed after Ariel.
On note and gloss I looked askance,
A truant waiving commendation,
Lured on through thickets of romance
To fail in my examination.
And have I in due time repented?
Nay, as I read once more the story
I smile and own me well contented,
The pedant failed to dim its glory.
For was it really worth the while
Youth's dawning fancies thus to encumber.
And in the ruck of Prospero's isle
Shoot all this pedagogic lumber.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

An interesting volume will be published early in the New Year by Messrs. George Routledge and Sons. It will bear the title of "The Jesuits in Great Britain: a Historical Inquiry into their Political Influence." The author is Mr. Walter Walsh, author of the "Secret History of the Oxford Movement." For this book Mr.
Walsh has been collecting material for the past fifteen years. It will contain, we are informed, the secret history of several well-known personages in British History, who, while outwardly professing Protestantism, were at the same time members of the Church of Rome, such as Esme Stuart, Duke of Lennox; Anne of Denmark, wife of James I. and Charles II., whom Mr. Walsh claims to have been a Roman Catholic all through his reign.

Mr. Fisher Unwin has nearly ready "Shakespeare's Church, otherwise the Collegiate Church of the Holy Trinity of Stratford-on-Avon." The book is an architectural and ecclesiastical history of the Fabric and its Ornaments, and its author, the Rev. J. Harvey Bloom, is the editor of the "Victoria History of the County of Warwick." He has devoted many years to the work, and has had special facilities for obtaining original information.

Mr. Brimley Johnson will publish immediately in his "Carpet Plays" the little twenty-minutes comedy, entitled
"Amelia," which has just been put on at the Garrick Theatre in front of the popular "Water-Babies." The author of "Amelia" is Mr. Nigel Playfair, the Dr. Caius of Mr. Tree's present revival of "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

THE JESUITS IN GREAT BRITAIN: An Historical Inquiry into their Political Influence. By WALTER WALSH. 8vo, 7s. 6d. [In the Press.]

Mr. Walsh, whose earlier work created a profound sensation a year or two ago, has been collecting material for this book for the last 15 years. It will contain the secret history of many well-known personages in British history, who, while outwardly professing Protestantism, were members of the Church of Rome. The book is written with studied moderation, and full references are given to Roman Catholic authorities.

The Literary Week.

THE week has not been prolific in new books, if we except the supply of novels, which has begun again with some vigour. Mr. George Gissing's new volume, "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," which appeared serially in the "Fortnightly Review," may also be classed under the heading of fiction. In religious and ethical literature we have received such dissimilar volumes as Mr. Charles Voysey's "Religion for all Mankind"; Mr. Clair-Tisdall's "The Noble Eightfold Path," and Mr. Webb's new edition of "The Devotions of St. Anselm." We are also asked to draw attention to the Nietzsche Library, of which the fourth volume has just been published in this country. Among the new books of the week we may note the following:—

ROBERT BUCHANAN. By Harriett Jay.

Inscribed "To the Memory of Robert Buchanan, who adopted me in my childhood, and who, throughout his life, was to me the kindest of fathers, the best of friends. To him I owe all that I have and am; and now that he is gone, it is my proud pleasure to remember that, during his last bitter hours of pain I was able to return to him, even if ever so slightly, a little of the great tenderness and devotion which he had always given to me." The volume deals fully and sympathetically with the life of a remarkable man. So far as possible Miss Jay has allowed Buchanan to speak for himself; "he knew himself better than any man or woman could possibly know him."

SPIRALS IN NATURE AND ART. By Theodore A. Cook.

Mr. Cook has been content to give this delightful volume a text-book title. It is research touched with enthusiasm, based on the author's discovery that the open staircase at Blois in Touraine is the work of Leonardo da Vinci. The book, which is well illustrated, has a long sub-title, of which the first sentence is "A study of spiral formations based on the manuscripts of Leonardo da Vinci." Prof. Ray Lankester contributes a cautious preface.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF GEORGE BARLOW. Vols. I. and II.

This issue of Mr. Barlow's poems is to be completed in ten volumes. The quantity of Mr. Barlow's work is remarkable, even allowing for the facts that the volumes are not bulky and the type large. The poems are divided into sections. Mr. Barlow is fond of the sonnet sequence; there are thirty-six sonnets addressed "To Gertrude in the Spirit World." The second volume contains "A Life's Love."

HISTORY OF THE GERMAN PEOPLE. By Johannes Janssen.

The fifth and sixth volumes of Mr. Janssen's presentation of the German People at the close of the Middle Ages. The sixth volume concludes with the "so-called Religious Peace of Augsburg, 1555." Each volume is provided with full indexes of places and persons.

OUR correspondent's enquiry the other week for a word which should be the correlative antithesis of sequel has brought us two suggestions. One is as follows: "How would precent do? If Donovan were a singing person, he might be a precentor. As he is a book let him be a precent to his sequel." The second is: "If we adopt prelit and for sequel substitute postlib we may then read adlib." So far we do not feel particularly encouraged.

No man has ever lived up to his theories of physical and mental life more consistently than Mr. Herbert Spencer. His system of education included, at the time his book on Education was first published, matter which appeared revolutionary to many of his contemporaries. A child's instincts, he said, were right, even to a taste for sweets and sugar. Cramming he detested and condemned, putting physical fitness before mere mental accomplishment. Of his method of work Mr. Iles in the February number of the "World's Work" gives some interesting particulars. "First Principles," which Mr. Spencer began in 1860, was dictated to an amanuensis. "He was spending the summer by the shore of a Scottish loch. His habit was to dictate for a quarter of an hour, then row for an equal period with the object of so stimulating the circulation of the blood as to carry him through another fifteen minutes' dictation, and so on through the forenoon. Neither then nor afterward has he worked in the afternoon." Yet the greatest care has not saved Mr. Spencer from the effects of overwork. He has never been much of a reader, and used to say that if he read as much as other people he would know as little as they. It is rather curious to note that "he has a hearty admiration for 'Tristram Shandy,' and dislikes the coarseness of Fielding."

MR. W. H. MALLOCK has been endeavouring to add to our knowledge of the Bacon-Shakespeare question by a discussion of certain symbolical title-pages, which have been reproduced for our guidance in the "Pall Mall Magazine." We do not propose to go fully into the question, but we wish to suggest certain points on which Mr. Mallock appears to have gone rather curiously astray. Let us take the title-page to the sixth edition of Sidney's "Arcadia"; the same design was used for an edition of "The Faerie Queen," the title-page of which is the one reproduced by Mr. Mallock. No one, Mr. Mallock admits, can contend that Bacon was the author of the "Arcadia"; "but the design, if it refers to him, can mean only that he was connected with its production in some unspecified way." Mr. Mallock then proceeds to build up a theory which seems to us entirely unwarranted, and in one particular, and that the most important, entirely wrong. The crest on the title-page, which Mr. Mallock takes to be "a hog with a halter round its neck" (Bacon's crest was a hog), is not a hog at all, but a hedgehog "collared and lined," which was a Sidney crest. Surely here is a serious error on Mr. Mallock's part? And certainly Mr. A. W. Pollard's explanation of this title-page, in spite of Mr. Mallock's assertion to the contrary, is much more plausible. It appears clear to us that what Mr. Mallock takes to be a rose-bush is a bush of rosemary, as Mr. Pollard suggests. Can Mr. Mallock point us to any contemporary or indeed any drawing in which roses were represented as they are here? As for the supporters to the crest, one a bear, the other a lion, Mr. Mallock tells us that the bear stands for Leicester, the lion for Elizabeth, and that Bacon believed himself to be the son of these two. Again, Leicester was Sidney's uncle (his mother was Mary Dudley, daughter of the Duke of Northumberland), a fact which accounts for the bear much more naturally than Mr. Mallock's hypothesis. As for the lion: well, a lion is a beast which symbolizes certain aspects of Sidney's career so well that no fine-drawn symbolism is needed to account for it. In his second article Mr. Mallock gets more and more tenuous; it would be as easy to draw a dozen conclusions as reasonable as those he sets forth. And again he makes mistakes. But we cannot enter more fully into the question. Mr. Mallock may be right—we are quite unprejudiced—but his evidence seems to us too thin, even apart from obvious inaccuracies of interpretation, to be worth much. Indeed, we could almost suspect Mr. Mallock of perpetrating a laborious joke.

A CORRESPONDENT of "Macmillan's Magazine," who signs himself "An Unhappy Englishman," is much perturbed by the insidious advances of the "Times" to Americanized English. Archbishop Tait was quoted as having written: "An apparent combine of much-respected names." "An Unhappy Englishman" fled to a friend who had upon his shelves "The Life of Archibald Campbell Tait," turned up the passage, and lo! the Archbishop had not written "combine" but "combination." Why should the "Times," asks this alarmed writer, "change the eminently respectable combination into the disreputable combine?" And since then, adds this "Unhappy Englishman," the "Times" has printed such "ineffable abominations as portraiture and landscapist."

MR. HAROLD ISMAY, in "Longman's Magazine," has also been writing about words, but he writes concerning the joy of them:—

"Jerry Abershaw! Jerry Abershaw! Jerry Abershaw!" cries Robert Louis Stevenson in one of his familiar letters; rolling the syllables under his pen in a kind of ecstasy. "The two most lovely words in English. Jerry Abershaw! D—n it, sir, it is a poem."
Jerry Abershaw! So it is.

Here is the essence of romance, the cloaked night-riding horseman of his childish nightmares come staring to light in five syllables.

The appeal of words, however, like all appeals, is mainly individual. Mr. Ismay, for suggestive place names, goes to Cornwall; but it is all a matter of association, and your North countryman will get as much romance from names which sound barbarous to Southern ears. And sometimes Mr. Ismay makes curious statements. He writes: "It has been written somewhere that chosen words grouped in a proper manner form good prose, the best words grouped in the best possible manner good poetry." That is a definition of poetry which suggests the body and ignores the soul. But Mr. Ismay's enthusiasm has a certain infection, so that when he says, "no familiar language is richer than blessed English in words worth speaking a second time, brave vigorous monosyllables, and sonorous compounds," we naturally agree with him.

PROF. WRIGHT'S "English Dialect Dictionary" is to be completed before the end of 1905. Four of the six volumes are already printed, and the fifth is now in the press. The extensiveness of the work—invaluable though it should be—appears to have made publishers fight shy of it, so that Prof. Wright has himself been obliged to undertake all the financial liability. Many of the original subscribers have been lost by death, and Prof. Wright now appeals for new subscribers. There should be no difficulty in securing these, as the total payments, spread over six years, amount only to twelve guineas. The price of the completed Dictionary to non-subscribers will be eighteen guineas.

THE publisher of "Collier's Weekly," Mr. P. F. Collier, is about to set up a publishing business in London. Mr. Collier proposes to secure work from the best English writers, and he also intends to float an English edition of "Collier's Weekly." Mr. Collier is reported to have said lately that in his opinion "Great Britain produces the ablest writers who use the English tongue," but he thinks that American methods of mechanical presentation are in advance of ours.

THE "Weekly Critical Review," the first number of which has just appeared, proposes to have a weekly illustration competition. The first subject is taken from a volume of short stories, entitled "Melomaniacs," by Mr. James Huneker. Here is the passage:—

He saw bleached, shaven faces in a half circle; they seemed like skulls fastened on black dummies—so immobile their expression, and so deadly staring their eyes. The brilliant and festal appearance of the scene oppressed him and his eye-balls ached. Symphonies of light were massed over the great high walls; glistening and pendulous, they illuminated remote ceilings. There was colour and taunting gaiety in the decoration; the lofty panels contained pictures from the classic poets which seemed profane in so sacred an edifice, and just over the Throne gleamed the golden tubes of a mighty organ. Then Baruch Mendoza's eyes, half blinded by the strange glory of the place to which he had been haled, encountered the joyful and ferocious gaze of the Grand Inquisitor. Again echoed dolefully the tap of the drum in the key of B, and the prisoner shuddered.

The prize is to be awarded to the illustrator whose drawing is "most in sympathy with the above passage," and the amount to be won is twenty-five francs. The sum hardly seems commensurate with the subject. But there are always, we suppose, people who yearn to illustrate such meaningless phrases as "symphonies of light."

WE read in the "New York Times Saturday Review":—

Jack London, the author of "Children of the Frost," is an ardent student of sociology. He travels a great deal. In November last he was observing life in the East End of London, being dressed as an American sailor looking for employment, with little or no money in his pockets. At present he is living in a bungalow near San Francisco with an outlook over the Golden Gate.

Perhaps the bungalow near San Francisco is by way of an attempt to escape from such sociology as Mr. London may have discovered in the East End.

THE last issue of the "Ancestor," as we noted at the time, accused Sir Conan Doyle of certain gross heraldic errors in his romance, "The White Company." The current number of the "Ancestor" contains a reply from Sir Conan Doyle, and comments upon that reply by the "Ancestor's" editor. It must be admitted that in this battle of the experts Sir Conan Doyle comes out second best—nay, he is soundly beaten. The question is one of pure fact, and the professional antiquarian scores. Sir Conan Doyle writes:—

To take a few concrete examples where the editor in accusing me of inaccuracy has been inaccurate himself: he says that the cadency mark of crescents for the second son only came in two centuries later than the date of "The White Company." That date is 1367. The editor will find—and it is a real pleasure to give him some information after all he has given to me—that in a window of the Collegiate Church of St. Mary, Warwick, erected in 1361, the arms of the six sons of Thomas Beauchamp, fifteenth Earl of Warwick, appear differenced with a crescent, mullet, &c. It is probable, therefore, that the custom was perfectly well known to the prince's "herald or scrivener."

To which the "Ancestor" replies:—

No such window, we believe, exists at the present day, although the figures of the earl's sons are found in seventeenth century drawings, at which date there remained some in the window of the choir, and some in the great north window. The choir was not built in 1361, having been begun in pursuance of the will of the Earl who died in 1369. . . . But Sir Conan's date matters little. What does matter is that, although the younger sons difference their arms, as did many fourteenth-century knights, with small charges, the "cadency mark of the descent for the second son" is not to be found, the second son differencing with a ring.

It is pretty obvious that the "Ancestor" is right and Sir Conan Doyle wrong. Sir Conan has been misled by the "makers of bad handbooks." The pity is that Sir Conan Doyle should have thought it worth while to defend himself from experts in a matter which only casually touches actual romance.

THE ways of advertising are wonderful and sometimes shameless. The following extraordinary communication has been sent to us by a correspondent whose name appears to have been got from a directory. At any rate, he knows nothing of the writer. We have the title of the book and the name of the publisher:—

MY DEAR —,

—'s book is now on sale. . . . Has he, or his brother, mentioned that he has adopted the "nom de plume" of . . . and that the work is entitled . . . ? (published by . . .)

You might, for Auld Lang Syne's sake, give him a leg-up by inducing friends and the book-agents in your neighbourhood to promote inquiries about his initial effort.

As you already know, — is nothing if not satirical, and in this book his satire has found ample scope. . . . Several of our friends have been caricatured, yet yourself not escaping, for there's no mistaking the "original" of his character of C. R.

However, his sarcasm, tho' keen at times, is never spiteful, and I don't think your annoyance will prove long lasting.

Trusting you're in the best of health, with kind regards from wife and self,

Yrs. sincerely,

It is, of course, possible that the thing is intended for a joke, but, if it be so, so pointless a joke, sent out broadcast, becomes something of a public nuisance.

A WRITER in the "Daily Mail" recently considered the Suburban Library, and found it wanting. In the early morning the general reading-room was occupied by eager perusers of the advertisement columns; at ten o'clock the "sprightly suburban misses" came in. Here is a sample of the conversation which is recorded between borrowers and the assistant at the desk:—

"Oh, I say," said one maiden in that pigtail stage which at Oxford is called a "flapper," "you were just horrid to give me such a mawkish piece of twaddle as 'The Little White Bird,' by Barrie. Do you think I am not yet out of the nursery?"

"Well, you don't look it, miss," said the pimply youth, showing his teeth.

"Oh, don't I?" said the damsel, tossing her head with what the penny novelettes called "extreme hauteur." "Well, I'll trouble you to hand over something more sensible. I like a novel with a bit of spice in it."

At one o'clock the library emptied, and the furtive luncher arrived—everyone knows the furtive free library luncher. After which nothing seemed to happen of much interest until the evening, when the newspaper files were "thronged by City men" who used the library to save the daily halfpenny. We think the "Daily Mail" observer was at fault there. However, the fact remains that one suburban library at least is not doing much good to culture or letters, and that is true of a good many more. The fact is that the enthusiasm for education in the form of reading has overreached itself, and that free libraries provide more mental dissipation than mental stimulus.

WE notice in a contemporary magazine a short story called "The Ebb Tide." It is a pity that writers cannot find titles for themselves. We should have thought that Stevenson's "The Ebb Tide" would have kept smaller men away for at least a generation.

It was inevitable that the "Confessions of a Wife" should be parodied, and the inevitable has happened in "Punch." Here is a passage from "More Confessions":—

Where shall I find a name for that which has befallen me? If I call it joy I shrink away from the word, and if I call it fear, that would be a lie pure and simple.

"You — have — promised — a — MAX — that — you — would — become — his — wife."

Nobody in the world has ever done such a thing before. But the Wilderness Girl doesn't mind this.

Mr. Helose's hair does curl beautifully.

THE "Glasgow Evening News" has been making merry over an imaginary School of Fiction. It is, of course, a London school, and has its habitation at Crouch End, N. Students are trained in observation, realism, applied mechanics, and so forth. Style is learnt from text books, and analysis charts of all the "classic stylists" are provided. The "Glasgow Evening News" may be prophetic. We should not be surprised to see even so great an absurdity as a School of Fiction.

CLAUDIUS CLEAR tells us in the "British Weekly" that he reads on an average two books a day. We wonder what Claudius Clear means by "read."

THE late Mr. Augustus Hare was a most prolific writer; he travelled, talked to everybody, and put all he saw and heard into print. His autobiography runs to six large volumes, volumes which contain many excellent stories, and particularly ghost stories. Mr. Hare had an effective way of dealing with ghosts which was quite his own. His life ended in some melancholy, yet he could write in the last chapter of "The Story of my Life":—

Except that I have seen more varieties of people than some do, I believe there has been nothing unusual in my life. All lives are made up of joys and sorrows, with a little calm, neutral ground connecting them; though from physical reasons perhaps, I think I have enjoyed the pleasures and suffered in the troubles more than most. But from the calm backwater of my present life at Holmhurst, as I overlook the past, the pleasures seem to predominate, and I could cordially answer to anyone who asked me, "Is life worth living?" "Yes, to the very dregs."

Bibliographical.

THE particulars made public in connection with Messrs. Routledge's promised reprints of "Half-Forgotten Books" do not, so far, impress one with a sense of novelty in the choice of the books to be re-issued. To take first Mrs. Radcliffe's "Romance of the Forest" and "Mysteries of Udolph": both of these have been reprinted by Messrs. Routledge themselves within the last twenty years—the "Romance" at 6d. in 1882 and at 2s. in 1887; the "Mysteries" at 2s. in 1882 and again in 1891. Then there is Dickens's "Memoirs of Grimaldi": this was published at 6d. in 1883, both by Messrs. Routledge and by Messrs. Dicks; again, at 1s., in 1888; and yet again at 6d. by Messrs. Routledge in 1893. Haliburton's "Sam Slick" was brought out at 6d. in 1884 both by Messrs. Routledge and by Messrs. Warne. Messrs. Routledge, again, revived Albert Smith's "Pottleton Legacy" at 6d. in 1891. Miss Martineau's "The Hour and the Man" was republished by Messrs. Cassell in 1886 at 2s. and 1s. Morier's "Hajji Baba in Ispahan" is also mentioned in connection with the new series, but can it be described truthfully as a "half-forgotten book"? It was published in 1890 at 6d. by Messrs. Dicks; in 1895, at 7s., by Messrs. Methuen, and at 3s. 6d. by Messrs. Macmillan; in 1895, at 21s., by Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen; in 1897, at 6d., by Messrs. Dicks; and in 1898, at 2s., by Messrs. Macmillan, whose edition has the distinction of an introduction from the pen of the present Viceroy of India.

I note that "The Man who Lost his Past," a new story by Mr. Frank Richardson, starts upon the basis of a railway accident, the shock of which deprives the leading character of his memory. This, one remembers, was also the basis of one of Mr. Pinero's early comic pieces—"In Chancery," in which Mr. Edward Terry represented the bewildered victim of a railway collision. Of course, it is the mere motif only that is common to the play and to the story. The idea is developed by dramatist and novelist on widely differing lines. A somewhat similar, but much more original, notion lay at the root of a play which preceded "In Chancery" by two or three years—Mr. Gilbert's "Foggerty's Fairy," in which Foggerty, by supernatural aid, and in order to escape unpleasant consequences, deliberately annihilates a portion of his past.

But for that period of his life another set of events has to be substituted, and, by the irony of fate, Foggerty is as much hampered by these events as he would have been by the real happenings which he has blotted out. "Foggerty's Fairy" was too ingenious to please the average playgoer, and it is a long while since Mr. Terry was last seen in "In Chancery." Mr. Richardson, therefore, has the field to himself, in the meantime.

Talking of the theatre, the stage is about to do another of its rare services to literature. Next week Mr. Forbes Robertson will produce a play based upon Mr. Kipling's "The Light that Failed," and we may expect that there will then be a brisk demand for the book both at the libraries and at the booksellers. If I remember rightly, it has been before the public for a dozen years, and there was a new edition of it at least as recently as the autumn of 1899. The approaching demolition of the Gaiety Theatre should lead to requests for Mr. John Hollingshead's "Gaiety Chronicles" (1898), which the author may be counselled to bring down to date, and re-issue. A new Gaiety is rising rapidly within a few feet of the old one, but it cannot inherit the memories which will always attach themselves to the older and doomed building.

Mr. B. M. Ramsay, whose "London Lays" are "out," or on the point of being so, is by no means the first Scotsman who has felt the poetic fascination of the Great Metropolis. To go no farther back than 1866, there are the "London Poems" of Robert Buchanan, a volume full of genuine sympathy with the more pathetic sides of London life. It is not easy, nowadays, to find a new title for such a volume as Mr. Ramsay's. We have had, of late years, "London Lyrics," "London Nights," "London Visions," "London Voluntaries," and what not; and, even now, Mr. Ramsay's title is only new in a sense, for did not Mr. Clement Scott present us, just twenty years ago, with the "Lays of a Londoner"? "London Rhymes," by the way, was the name of a privately-printed selection from Frederick Lockyer-Lampson's poems.

Side by side with the announcement of Mr. James Bryce's "Biographical Essays" comes that of Sir M. E. Grant-Duff's "Out of the Past: some Biographical Essays." These, it is understood, will be mainly of the nature of personal reminiscences, though they start with a chapter on "Chesterfield as an Educator." In only three cases will the two authors deal with the same subject; each will have something to say about Cardinal Manning, Dean Stanley, and Lord Acton. Mr. Bryce's book will have the greater literary interest, though among Sir M. E. Grant-Duff's subjects are Walter Bagehot, Matthew Arnold, and Henry Reeve.

Two new literary enterprises for which there is ample excuse are the promised volumes on Bishop Bedell (edited by Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh) and Claverhouse (written by Mr. C. S. Terry). There is already a little biography of Claverhouse by Mr. Mowbray Morris, but there is room for something more elaborate and comprehensive, the available material being very considerable, and Napier's "Memorials" being now out of date. The best Life of Bishop Bedell, that by his elder son, was printed both in 1871 and in 1872, being, in the latter case, edited for the Camden Society by Mr. Wharton Jones. Then there are the Lives by Barnet (1685) and Clogie (edited in 1862). But Mr. Shuckburgh, apparently, is in a position to give us much new and valuable matter.

I gather that the edition of "The Compleat Angler," which is to be added to the "St. Martin's Library," will include the editorial part of the edition which Sir Harris Nicolas produced in 1836, and which was reproduced in 1875.

The Hampshire Poet.

THE POETRY OF GEORGE WITHER. Edited by Frank Sidgwick. (Bullen. 12s. net.)

This edition of George Wither's poems contains all that is of poetical value (though the long poem "Britain's Remembrancer," not included, has historic value for its detailed description of the Plague in London, which preceded the epidemic afterwards described by Defoe), and quite as much as the modern reader will care to peruse. It is edited by Mr. Sidgwick with the excellence and care to which we are accustomed in Mr. Bullen's publications. He has collated all known editions, supplied a very good introduction, both biographical and literary, and careful notes. Nor has he omitted a bibliography of the early poetical works—which alone come within the scope of the edition. For Wither virtually abandoned poetry in after-life; nor are the few exceptions to this statement of any poetic merit. It is another seventeenth century poet rescued from neglect; and we are thankful for it.

Not that the Hampshire poet is a writer over whom to effervesce, despite the enthusiasm of Lamb and Lamb's illustrious friends. They were in the position of pioneers and discoverers: all exhumed merit was treasure trove; and enthusiastic appreciation of that merit was more necessary than a dispassionate appreciation of its amount and relative proportion to the substance exhumed. It was needed to show gold in the ore, not the exact percentage of the gold. The gold is now admitted, not only admitted but fully recognised; and it becomes legitimate to inquire the richness of the ore. Well, no impartial critic can say that Wither is rich ore. The really fine verse in him is well known, and can all be quoted in a few pages of any anthology. They who found on it their expectations of Wither will assuredly suffer deadly disappointment in these two volumes. Nearly all his work follows the pastoral convention, and (speaking of it in the bulk and the average) its great merit is a certain manly sanity. It is quite sincere, quite direct. The phrase of Crashaw is most apt to it:—

A clear, unwrinkled song.

It never for a moment strives to be more or other than it is. The language is that which all men would use, if all men knew sound English, and were purged of inert custom. Withal it is distinguished—just enough, but not eminently—because it is quickened by a facile but sufficient and custom-quelling energy. As the diction, so is the metre. His most personal and characteristic metre is the trochaic couplet of seven syllables and four accents, which he handles with a level mastery that is not the highest. It is unfailingly smooth, sweet, and even—with a fluent smoothness, a fluent sweetness, a fluent evenness, which is somewhat thin. It has variety, but a shallow variety. It reminds one of Orlando's too tinklingly sweet octosyllabics, which Touchstone (a shrewd critic) denounced as the "right butterwoman's rank to market." These too easy and regular heptasyllabics, taking at first, become monotonous in sequence. So it is with the poet's substance. His contemporaries thought little of him: Dryden, Swift, Pope, sneered at him. There was more reason for this depreciation (under-estimate though it was) than the reaction of our criticism allows. Wither is impermissibly copious and dilute, with a careless and easy-going, though not slovenly, diffuseness. If he is not, like Wordsworth, prosy, he is quite as voluble, and does not fall into Wordsworth's priceless amends. Yet while mediocrity follows the heel of mediocrity, that fresh, pellucid frankness of diction raises it above commonplace, and lures you with promise persistent but unfulfilled. You perpetually expect him to quit the ground; and that air of present flight as perpetually deceives you. When (how seldom!) the flight does come, your attention is fatigued and asleep. Arriving even at his finest verse across these levels of easy copiousness, it is odds you but half savour it. To Lamb and his fellows this was perhaps less an obstacle than to us. They were themselves given to diffuse verse; and one remembers with awe that they relished the sonnets of the gentle Mr. Bowles, which are like unto rocking-cradles.

That Wither wrote thus because he was too careless to write otherwise, we have the best of evidence—his own. In "Fair Virtue" he tells his critics:—

If this prologue tedious seem,
Or the rest too long they deem,
Let them know my love they win,
Though they go ere I begin.

For I will for no man's pleasure
Change a syllable or measure,
Neither for their praises add
Ought to mend what they think bad,
Since it never was my fashion
To make work of recreation.

I disdain to make my song
For their pleasures short or long.
If I please I'll end it here;
If I list I'll sing this year.

He knew his faults; and being a pugnacious man, elected to stand by them and make them his favourite virtues. Despite his defiant couplet—

Pedants shall not tie my strains
To our antique poets' veins—

it is pity (we think) he followed those poets so far as to adopt the pastoral convention. He reached his very best, it seems to us, in the direct utterance of emotion, whether dramatic or his own. Such is that exquisite passage on Nature, which anticipates Wordsworth in manner and substance, and is unique in his work. Such is the deservedly famous "Shall I wasting in despair?" Such is "Hence, away, thou Siren, leave me." They are both straight from Wither's nature: one uttering that virile disdain for mere love of the senses which he so often repeats; the other, an expression of his characteristic rugged independence, even in love. Of his power in what we might call the dramatic lyric, there is a good example in "Fair Virtue." A lover is tempted into soliciting his mistress dishonourably, and she thus finely rebukes him:—

"Sweetheart," quote she, "if in thy breast

Those virtues real be,
Which hitherto thou hast professt,
And I believed in thee,
Thyself and me, O seek not to abuse.
Whilst thee I thus refuse
In hotter flames I fry;
Yet let us not
Our true love spot,
Oh, rather let me die.

"Are we the two that have so long
Each others' loves embraced?
And never did affection wrong
Nor think a thought unchaste?
And shall, oh, shall we now our matchless joy
For one poor touch destroy,
And all content forego?
Oh no, my dear;
Sweetheart, forbear;
I will not lose thee so.

"No vulgar bliss I aimed at
When first I heard thee woo;
I'll never prize a man for that
Which every groom can do.
If that be love, the basest men that be
Do love as well as we,
Who, if we bear us well,
Do pass them then
As angels men
In glory do excel."

We have not space for the whole poem; but what we have quoted is quite noble. In this expression of emotion and truth dear to his heart Wither's special gift rises to a height it does not attain in mere pastoralisms, or the conventional celebration of a mistress. The language is of every day; the effect is not that of every day. When the average "poet" (so-called) writes in what is styled a simple and a direct fashion, he is neither simple nor direct. His banality comes of mental slovenliness. He thinks, not in words, but in blocks of words, in whole phrases, habitual phrases which save him the trouble of finding the true word. It is the lees and heeltaps of language. Hence the jaded sensation which such verse produces on us. But Wither is indeed simple and direct; each word is conceived with a fresh intention.

One whole poem, "Fidelia," is dramatic; the letter of a girl to her faithless lover. And if he does not throughout reach the simple truth and strength of feeling in the poem just quoted, it yet has much of the same quality:—

And lastly, for that love's sake thou once bar'st me,
By that right hand thou gav'st, the truth thou swar'st me.
By all the passions, and, if any be,
For her dear sake that makes thee injure me,
I here conjure thee—no, entreat and sue,
That if these lines do overreach thy view,
Thou would'st afford me so much favour for them
As to accept, or at least, not abhor them.

Which if it prove, as yet methinks it may,
Oh, what a burthen shall I cast away!

Come, kill me then, my dear, if thou think fit,
With that which never killed a woman yet;

And for these wrongs my love to thee hath done,
Both I and it unto thy pity run:
In whom if the least guilt thou find to be,
For ever in thy arms imprison me.

There is a Byronic directness of passion in that, and a vigour in the movement of the lines. For Wither's descriptive vein we care less. It is fresh and simple, but lacks magic; it is too much of an inventory. On the whole he is a poet with great longueurs; but when he really closes up the ranks of his verse, it becomes vital and memorable.

An Egoist's Autobiography.

SOCIAL GERMANY IN LUTHER'S TIME: Being the Memoirs of Bartholomew Saströw. Translated by Albert D. Vandam, with an Introduction by Herbert A. L. Fisher. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE respect we feel for the author of these memoirs is quite unmingled with any personal liking. If there was an amiable side to his character he has contrived to veil it. From beginning to end we find no trace of tenderness, of generosity, of charity or of humour. Yet to have read these rugged memoirs is to have gained somewhat. It is to have made the acquaintance of what, in his excellent Introduction, Mr. Fisher calls the pedestrian side of German life in the sixteenth century, and to have won many a personal glimpse of the strenuous actors of a cardinal epoch.

This loud old egoist, Bartholomew Saströw, was born in the year of the publication of Luther's three great Reformation tracts—"Appeal to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation," "Babylonish Captivity," and "Freedom of a Christian Man." His mother had brought Lutheranism with her into the Saströw family, and Bartholomew was reared a Protestant and fully conscious of the superiority implied in that condition. His life was throughout a warfare. The narrative opens with "Abominable Murder of my Grandfather" (two accounts:

Saströw's and another); the third chapter purports to show "the Ingratitude, Foolishness, and Wickedness of the People, and how when once infected with a bad Spirit it returns with Difficulty to Common Sense." As a lad, in the acquirement of the art of law-writing, he suffered at the hands of society the extremes of hunger and poverty. He knew what it was to have his peculium filched and his victuals begrudged him. His family was constantly engaged in litigation, in which it need hardly be said they always had justice on their side. He himself, as he passed through the phases of life which led him at last to the enviable condition of being able to boast daily for 46 years: "I am better off to-day than yesterday," owed his success (so great as to make the devil and his acolytes burst with envy), he tells us, to his talent as a law writer; a fine art of which, till we read his account of it, we had underestimated the dignity:—

Many folk after me [he writes], dazzled by my success, tried in their turn to become law writers, but they very soon succumbed to the monotony of the business, to the incessant labour, to the protracted vigils, to hunger, thirst, cares and dangers. Barely one in a hundred succeeds.

But this shows but one side. His boasting was very commonly in the Lord. He is convinced, with the conviction of a true egoist, that alike the good fortune that waits upon his own affairs and the evil that befalls such as have the assurance to rank themselves among his foes—such cattle as the Horns, the Brusers, and the Lorbeers—represent respectively the reward of the righteous and the punishment of the ungodly. Thus, for instance, for the edification of his children, he writes on the text, "For in the hand of the Lord there is a cup. . . . As for the dregs thereof all the ungodly of the earth shall drink them and suck them out":—

Yes, the Almighty has comforted me, he has permitted me to see the scattering of my enemies. The two principal ones, Hermann Bruser and his fraudulent wife, fell into abject misery; they lived for many years on the bounty of parents and friends. . . . The devil, moreover, twisted Bruser's neck at Stockholm. He was found in his master's wardrobe, his face all distorted. His daughter, dowered in fraudem mei patris, did for all that not escape very close acquaintance with poverty. . . . Bruser's son, it is true, rose to be a secretary in Sweden, but far from prospering he committed all kinds of foolish acts everywhere. . . .

And so on with Bruser's son's sons. Whereas when he was himself at the point of being upset into the Elbe by a heavy waggon in the wheel of which his stirrup was entangled:—

When our distress is at its height, when neither our father nor mother is able to save us, Providence stretches forth his protecting hand. It happened then, by this merciful grace: the rotten strap suddenly gave way, leaving the stirrup entangled in the wheel and freeing my leg. It was a startling confirmation of the Divine word that the righteous shall see good come out of evil; for had the equipment been brand-new, of the most solid leather and even embroidered with gold and pearls, that harness would have sent me into the stream as food for the fishes.

And in joyful confirmation of this moral, only nine days later he sees a Spanish lord with gold chains about his neck, and mounted on a superb beast, drowned in the Saale. "Nine days before this, at Wittenberg, a rotten strap had, with the help of God, saved my life. The gentleman covered with gold and dressed in velvet, on the other hand, miserably perished." Similarly of a chance wayfarer who saved him from the worst consequences of a fall from his horse, and had the magnanimity to decline a finger's breadth of wine at the next inn, he declares: "I shall never cease to believe that my saviour was a holy angel." In an explosion that destroyed a house and seven persons, including a miser's innocent housemaid, but not the miser, is plainly to be discerned a heavenly admonition to that miser to be free with his money. In Rome, whither he journeyed with some peril, out of which he quibbled himself with notable ingenuity, he believed the worst he heard and more than the worst he saw; that was in his character of a pious Christian.

For twelve months, during the sitting of the Diet, he was at Augsburg, and with a clumsy realism he sets before us the things he saw. Here is the Emperor Charles V. eating:—

He began by cutting his bread in pieces small enough for one mouthful, then attacked his dish. He stuck his knife anywhere, and often used his fingers, while he held his plate under his chin with the other hand. He ate so naturally, and at the same time so cleanly, that it was a pleasure to watch him. . . . He did, however, not utter a syllable, albeit that the jesters behind him were amusing. Now and again there was a faint smile at some more than ordinarily clever passage between them. He paid not the slightest attention to the crowd that came to watch the monarch eat.

This is he of whom we are told:—

Before retiring to rest, his Imperial Majesty, to the terror of many, had a gibbet erected in front of the town-hall; by the side of the gibbet, the strapado, and facing it a scaffold at about an ordinary man's height from the ground. This was intended to hold the rack; and the beheading, the strangulating (sic), the quartering, and kindred operations were to be carried out on it.

Bootless severity, as Sastrow's narrative everywhere bears witness. The human remnants that strewed the countryside at a time when war formally had ceased bore witness to the atrocious demoralisation of the Spanish mercenaries. Sastrow spares you none of the details, just as he gives you, in his plain, blunt way, the incidents of all the langings, rackings, mutilations, garottings, and strapado-dislocations at which he enjoyed the privilege of being present. These seemed to this product of his age all very seemly manifestations of human justice, and they give a grimness to his autobiography which is, after all, the flavour that lingers.

“Laughter, holding both His Sides.”

AN ESSAY ON LAUGHTER. By James Sully. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)

LAUGHTER is one of the few things—fancy calling laughter a thing!—which refuse to fit into the frame of an explanation or a theory. Everybody laughs, and presumably knows why, but everybody else laughs, and at what it is difficult to guess. The present writer once had a domestic afflicted with hip-disease. It was her habit to seem convulsed with merriment when telling a friendly inquirer that she felt bad all over. Such a laugh as hers induced the idea that laughter is a mere jet of vitality which may co-exist affluently with disease.

Nevertheless, it behoves the psychologist to grapple with the mystery of laughter at the risk of smothering his own, because the majority of human laughs proceed from a kind of sudden criticism contingent on a surprise. Dr. Sully treats his subject scientifically, as befits a man of science, and chattily as befits an essayist, with the result that laughter remains, thank heaven! a happy mystery. He does not find it hard to refute Hobbes, who referred laughter to a sense of “sudden glory arising from sudden conception of some eminency in ourselves by comparison with the inferiority of others, or with our own formerly.” Still we opine that Hobbes was on the right track. The expression “sudden glory” poetically reveals the sensation of laughter, which is essentially surprise. It is the breach in the sameness of things which lets in the light of humour. As soon as we are accustomed to the breach we cease to laugh at it. Hence the impotence of thrice-told jests.

Naturally this sudden glory is most often experienced by children, about whom Dr. Sully makes many instructive observations, though, judging from p. 171, his labours have not permitted him to study babies personally with much attention. He suggests that a baby's “sucking movements” after a meal may be the origin of “the first smiles.” As a matter of fact the “sucking movements” would seem to be either a symptom of the delusion that feeding continues, or a sensual habit of the lips induced by nature to encourage alimentativeness.

The smile is a quite separate manifestation, and arises, it may fairly be said, from a sense of “sudden glory,” which a baby under three months old is quite capable of receiving. Such a child's smile, when its eyes catch a bright look meant for it, or (to cite a case) it sees a bell-glass sedately playing pendulum over a lighted gas-jet, is impossible to mistake (unless one be triumphantly scientific) for a development from instinctive “sucking movements.” That smile is certainly a sign of satisfaction in seeing moving or eloquent things, and it may be noted here that stationary objects incapable of sparkle do not win a baby's smile.

Laughter is naturally more generally associated with jesting than are smiles, and Dr. Sully makes “the principle of play” fundamental in his theory of laughter:—

The play both of animals and children is largely pretence, that is to say, the production of a semblance of an action of serious life, involving semi-consciousness of its illusory character. . . . In both cases we find the love of pretence playing pranks with the real world, divesting things of their significance and value . . . and transmuting them by fancy into mere appearances for our amusement.

Here it is interesting to observe that Dr. Sully ascribes a kind of intellectuality to the gambols of animals; but it is possible that when they seem to play at war they are really seeking friendly titillations. Tickling is certainly a venerable game, and laughter is perhaps as much a friendly signal to the tickler, as it is an irrepressible outburst from a patient overcharged with sensations. That tickling laughter is a “reaction of escape”—“a vestigial reflex handed down from ages of parasitic pestering”—is a theory which provokes us to that diabolical laugh which begins with “huggle-duggle” and ends with “ha! ha! ha!”

It is certainly a far laugh from such elementary cachinnation to that of the erudite Schopenhauer over the angle formed by the meeting of the tangent and the circle; and even to all the laughs wrung out of us by books. For book-laughs, Dr. Sully seeks discreetly. We will not follow him, except to say that Miss Mary Kingsley's laughter was evidently dear to him, and she, for her part, found “the West African, unadulterated, the most humorous form of human being there is.” This brings us back to the physiological side of laughter, though fortunately not to parasitical reminiscences. Miss Kingsley's statement shows that laughter is essentially non-literary; there is most of it indeed where there is least thought, and the spur of laughter has rowels more painfully compelling than a horseman's.

Laughter may spell disaster, and one must still laugh. An aunt of the writer once refrained from going to a party with her guest, who was unknown to the party-giver. “I know why,” he insisted cheerfully, when she advanced some conventional excuse. “I know why; you dared not introduce Mr. Bullock to Mrs. Bull. No, no,” he added, rapidly waiving argument away, “the thing couldn't be done.” One can see that it could not; but the gods would wonder why. They would see in “bull” and “bullock” only two sounds susceptible of an infinite variety of meanings, and the party-giver and her guests to them would only be animals of a kind more complicated than bullocks and bulls. Human beings may find fun in untidy rooms, cripples, affectations, ignorances; the gods can only see in them distortions and limitations.

And that is why we should cling to laughter, if we dare speak of clinging to that which runs and thrills. It is particularly human, even when it is irony or the perception of incongruities which produces it, and the man who can smother his own hearty laugh is likely to achieve self-extinction.

Poetic Drama.

THE KNIGHT OF THE MAYPOLE: A Comedy in Four Acts.
By John Davidson. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

SETTING aside the question of actual acting quality, Mr. John Davidson is among that most narrowly limited number of living writers who can produce poetic drama. Drama that is veritably poetic yet—in varying degree—dramatic. He is also the sole living writer who upholds with strength the Elizabethan tradition of drama. (For Mr. Stephen Phillips has avowedly aimed at an adaptation of the classic French convention, rather than the Shakespearean.) His work is Elizabethan, yet poetically vital, unlike the mass of shadowy, faintly reminiscent work in this kind. The present play, though now first published, was written (he tells us) in 1900. Unlike his recent work, it is a comedy, and light—almost slight—comedy. It is evidence of no small versatility that it should proceed from the same grim and iron pen which inscribed the "Testament of an Empire Builder," or "Of a Vivosector." Throughout it is light, adroit, almost gay, with but few touches of Mr. Davidson's sterner and truculent self. To a reader in the closet, indeed, it appears, more than Mr. Davidson's usual work, adapted for the present English stage. One can easily imagine it successful and effective with a modern audience, looking only to be amused. It has an unforced sequence of naturally developing incident one has not marked in his previous plays; a sequence which catches and holds the interest of the reader in itself, apart from dialogue and literary treatment. Having taken it up, we found ourselves lured on to the end, agreeably and without pause. This cannot be said of much "literary" drama nowadays.

Being light comedy, it has a larger proportion of prose, while the metrical passages are briefer and less fully poetical than in most of the author's work. Yet for all its open and direct limpidity the power is there, and shows itself effortlessly when occasion demands it. Mr. Davidson's characteristic gift of strength grows steadily with the years and each fresh production. It eases itself progressively of the spasmodic and violent quality which once marred it; grows masterful and masterly, assured, so that one ceases to feel suspense in reading, and acquires that reposeful confidence in the poet's resource without which complete pleasure is impossible. There-with has come a calm command of that intermittent beauty which accompanies strength, and is more captivating in its severe rarity than the most luxuriant allurements of a poet who seeks beauty primarily and for itself. Mr. Davidson is here so dramatically and rightly sparing of mere "beauties" (as apart from beauty) that it is difficult to find anything which will impress, torn from its living relation to the organic context: there are no ornamental patches, no careful spangles to justify the title of a poetic comedy. But this slight passage must evince its mastery even in the disadvantage of detached quotation. The heroine speaks of her father who died the moment he unharnessed himself from work, and sought leisured rest:—

He hoped for twenty years of rest, and died
For lack of tribulation; when the cares
That seemed to press to death were lifted up,
His ready spirit took too high a leap
And lost the way to earth.

That might have come straight from an Elizabethan dramatist. It has the sinewy ease in boldness of image, thought, word, and metre which has lapsed from modern writing. Nor is the prose, even the lowest comic prose, less close-knit, vernacular, and Elizabethan in texture. Nay, in this play Mr. Davidson's strength is evinced almost more by the prose than the verse. His mastery of that Elizabethan prose dialogue which he has always studied has, we think, materially gained since his earlier plays. The character-drawing is not striking; though some of the female characters are pleasingly natural: Grace Myrtle, in particular, is a fresh and bright little sketch. The humour, on the whole, is broad and spontaneous, with a lighter touch than we are wont to look for in Mr. Davidson's humour. The play, in fact, as we have said, goes brightly and almost gaily.

We would not be understood to say that the poet entirely escapes the pitfalls of his Elizabethanism. There are two comic constables, one of whom, ancient and full of Malapropisms, smells Dogberry "against the wind a mile." He is weak Dogberry, too, and his Malapropisms are rather heavy and forced. Then his comrade, in somewhat staggering contrast to his archaic-talking companion, speaks the English of a modern peasant who has been through the Board School. Now and again throughout his prose, indeed, Mr. Davidson's vigilance lapses, and a modern locution slips in. It is the almost inevitable penalty of imitating archaic diction; but Mr. Davidson's lapses are very much fewer than one might reasonably expect. But the mixing of two periods in the language of two companion characters is a more serious matter. The incidents of the play, varied and interesting though they be, sometimes turn upon well-thumbed stage-conventions; such, for instance, as the locking of the heroine in the Merry Monarch's bedroom, by way of bringing about a compromising situation. (We might add, that in the hurry of making matters pleasant all round, at the close of the play, the King totally forgets to clear the lady's honour—which one might have thought a trifle advisable, under the circumstances.) But when all is said that can be said on the adverse side, this remains a remarkably well written and a well contrived little drama.

The Syllogism that Failed.

RESPONSE IN THE LIVING AND NON-LIVING. By Prof. Jagadis Chunder Bose. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

At first we did not understand why Dr. Bose should have chosen, for a well-conceived, necessary and all but fundamental line of scientific research, the imperfect consummation of a book which, we must believe, has been designed for the reader who is less than non-scientific. The work contains no bibliography, and the references are few and imperfect; but still more significant is that vice of diction which consists in the adaptation of terms to a subtle misuse, well fitted, we will not say nicely calculated, to confuse the processes of an untrained mind. Dr. Bose has shown—we must, for the moment, anticipate, and assume, as from the internal evidence we may, that his observations will be confirmed—that the phenomena of electric response, long observed in animal tissues, are also displayed by plants and metals. That vegetable tissues would be found to possess these properties, any biologist might have predicted. Plant and animal life are, we know, the divergent yet parallel (if we may be forgiven the paradox) limbs of the vital V, and we thank Dr. Bose for this further demonstration—though he will not thank us for our thanks. But our first question begins to find an answer hinted in the insidious use of such phrases as these, "the transitional world of plants," and "curiously enough, I have found parallel instances in the response of plants." Curious it is that Dr. Bose should think the parallel curious, or suggest that it supplies the link between a strip of muscle and a strip of tin. Dr. Bose has been led astray by the electro-physiologist, and they have "gone one better" than their scriptural analogues, who fell into the ditch. These have pulled one another into it. This so-called physiologist, who is but a physicist in gossamer disguise, tells us that "the most general and most delicate sign of life is the electrical response." Our author, working upon this supposed definition—which merely ascribes a property—has found the "electrical sign of life" in platinum and tin. The implicit syllogism (for Dr. Bose has avoided any formal statement) is palpably imperfect. Instead of proving that vital phenomena are to be found where we had thought no life to be, Dr. Bose has shown that the phenomena which his guide thought vital, are no more than the indications of a physical molecular disturbance. The "electrical sign of life," as a crucial criterion, must away to the limbo of not wholly valueless, but too presuming things.

We confess to a whole-hearted joy in the discomfiture of the electro-physiologist. His sensory defect is not actual blindness, not an irremediable amaurosis (Carlyle has justified the word), but an extreme and voluntary contraction of the visual field. He and Dr. Bose alike have sinned against the light. They have not, breathlessly and monocularly, watched a phagocyte and a malarial parasite in hour long conflict in a drop of blood upon the warmed stage of a microscope. Virelow, whose being was at first contained within a single cell—conceive it!—is but yester-week dead, and these have already sinned against the living cell whose apotheosis he achieved. In their self-concerted overthrow is its avenging. "They sought a sign in the magnetic needle and forgot me, the living, moving, feeding, breathing, feeling me," it says.

Phases of Truth.

THE CONFLICT OF DUTIES. By Alice Gardner. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

DUTY, the "wondrous thought" of Kant's definition, is from first to last the motive of this volume. Half-educated people talk so persistently now-a-days of self-development that it is a pleasure to listen to a scholar who champions the less articulate theory of life. This scholar, moreover, is a woman, and her message is infinitely soothing after the exploited aphorisms of so many feminine seers.

The scope of the book is necessarily modified inasmuch as, with three exceptions, all these essays have been read "at the Sunday afternoon meetings of a society of students of Newnham College." The tone is, naturally, in harmony with the special requirements of a culture, spiritual and mental, still slightly exotic and certainly detached from the common life of English womanhood. Under these conditions the temptation to be didactic is usually irresistible. It is so easy to hold a brief for this or that personal prejudice and at the same time to claim that one is pronouncing a verdict defining abstract truth. It is just as easy to air one's whims and fancies under the mask of Pagan as it is under the mask of Christian erudition. In short, because a lady of culture calls Plato to witness, it by no means follows that her real sympathies would not have been with Xanthippe rather than with Socrates. But in these essays one finds no suggestion either of the pompous or the trivial.

The subjects discussed are those which have an intimate and practical bearing not only upon our social existence, but also upon la vie intérieure. "Hatred and Charity," "Truthfulness," "Religion and Good Taste," "Wear and Tear," are the significant titles of some of the essays. It is perhaps in the qualities of reserve and self-restraint that this author is most conspicuous. The temper in which these subjects are approached is admirable. The complete absence of the spirit of the doctrinaire, the unostentatious search for truth, suavity towards those who differ—all these things throw into the intellectual life of women that indefinable distinction which Matthew Arnold has interpreted in his essay on "Eugénie de Guérin."

For example, let us glance at the chapter entitled "Sectarianism"; if there is any subject in the world inseparable from rancour it is this, for the tolerant themselves are intolerant on the subject of intolerance. But there is no rhetorical animosity in the following:—

What we really want is to be raised into a higher atmosphere, to lead a larger life, to become familiar with great ideas. While we dwell among the wrangle of the sects we hear their discords. At a distance the jarring cries blend into a pleasing roll of sound. True, we must live among them, must, as duty dictates, ally ourselves with one against another. But it is most refreshing to withdraw ourselves at times to different regions. Sectarianism, like a spoiled child, becomes more troublesome the more it is indulged.

To present certain great truths in their broadest and simplest significance, and at the same time to reveal the fact that each is but a phase of truth—that is the object of these essays. But the author has also unconsciously embodied in her work the reflection of a fastidious temperament which finds expression neither in the rhetoric of emotion nor the subtleties of dialectic, but rather in self-effacement and detachment from side-issues. And it is precisely this which gives charm to the sanity and wisdom of her gospel of life.

Other New Books.

GOLDEN STRING. By Susan Countess of Malmesbury and Violet Brooke-Hunt. (Murray. 5s. net.)

This is not a birthday-book, because there is no space for autographs; and it would hardly be fair to call it an anthology, because that would imply greater critical responsibility than the ladies who have compiled it probably would care to assume. "A day-book for busy men and women" is their own description of it; which being compared with the epithets we reject may suffice to indicate its scope. The phrase chosen for its title is from Blake:—

I give you the end of a Golden String,
Only wind it into a Ball,
It will lead you in at Heaven's gate,
Built in Jerusalem's wall.

A page is assigned to each day of the year; and in the grouping of their excerpts the compilers have evidently had it in view to concentrate the reader's attention daily upon a given point of ethical culture. The list of authors includes all that is standard in English literature together with a heterogeneous host of contemporaries. There are five "quotes" from Mr. H. G. Wells, ten from Mr. William Watson, nine from President Roosevelt, three from Ibsen, four from Mr. Kipling; and Mrs. Meynell's "The Shepherdess" graces the second of February. There is quite as much prose as poetry, and we have not lighted on more than one scrap that was not worth while.

TRUE TALES OF MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE, FOR NON-CLIMBERS YOUNG AND OLD. By Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond (Mrs. Main). (Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

Mrs. LE BLOND disclaims all intention of writing for the expert mountaineer; but it is not only the non-climber, young or old, who will find her volume a fascinating one. She has gathered together within convenient compass a number of the masterpieces of Alpine literature, quoting the original accounts for the most part, instead of re-writing or condensing them. The preface contains acknowledgments to a gallant company of climbers, who, with a generosity bred of the mountains, have allowed her to make free use of their writings. Mr. Gosset tells of the avalanche on the Haut-de-Cry, Mr. Charles Pilkington of the ascent of the Meije, Mr. Whymper of the conquest of the Matterhorn and the mountain's terrible revenge on its conquerors, Mr. Clinton Dent of his many attempts, crowned at last with success, on the Aiguille du Dru. The non-climber will come to Mrs. Le Blond to be instructed, thrilled and humbled; the climber to be reminded of narratives which he has read before, and is willing to read again until he knows them by heart. The perils and catastrophes of the mountains play a conspicuous part in this volume, and in a volume designed for the inexpert it is well that they should. The supreme duty of prudence, of matching ambition to capacity, is emphasized and enforced by a weight of authority. "Men get careless and too confident," writes Mr. Matthews. "This does not matter or the other does not matter. The fact is that everything matters; precautions should be not only ample, but excessive." "The prudent climber will recollect what he owes to his family and his friends. He will also recollect that he owes something to the Alps, and will scorn to bring them into disrepute."

There are some strong expressions in this book on the subject of incompetence in guides. But ample testimony is paid to the truly heroic qualities that go to make the great guide. Here are Mr. Whymper's words on the death of Jean-Antoine Carrel in 1890, "upon his own side of his own mountain, almost within sight of his own home":—

"It cannot be doubted that, enfeebled as he was, he could have saved himself, had he given his attention to self-preservation. He took a nobler course; and accepting his responsibility, devoted his whole soul to the welfare of his comrades, until, utterly exhausted, he fell staggering on the snow. He was already dying. Life was flickering, yet the brave spirit said, 'It is nothing.'"

This narrative recalls the sober words of Baedeker's familiar preface: "It need hardly be added that the relations between the traveller and his guide should always be pleasant and cordial."

ANCHORESSES OF THE WEST. By Francesca M. Steele (Darley Dale). (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

IN some of the parish churches of England the clerk will show you a chamber which he vaguely describes as "the priest's." It abuts, as a rule, upon one of the exterior walls, and by a narrow window commands a view of the altar. In many cases this was the living grave of a man or woman who, in ages of untroubled faith and difficult living, had retired from the world to hide in Christ. Mrs. Steele gives at the end of her interesting volume a table of the recluses, male and female, whose lives of renunciation are little gems in the spiritual crown of the English Church in Catholic times. Little is known of these persons; in many cases even the name is lacking; in some the name is known, but not the place. So it is in the case of the anchoress for whom was written the "Ancrer Riwle" from which we learn most of what is known of the manner of life, and gain a glimpse of the directions in which laxity was liable to creep in. Of one we have literary remains. That is Mother Juliana of Norwich, whose "XVI. Revelations of Divine Love" have been reprinted more than once even in our own day. They are full of a rapturous sense of union with Him of whom she writes: "It is easier to know God than our own soul." "Of all sight that I saw this was most comfort to me," she tells: "that our Good Lord that is so tender and so dreadful is so homely and so courteous." She, too, was afflicted by the terrors that beset the age, and that form still the dark background in the fair picture of the Christian revelation. The office for the Enclosing of Anchorites is included in this volume. It is full of tragic beauty, but it would have been more readily intelligible if some typic distinction had been made between rubrics and prayers. Also it is unfortunate that the word anchorite should be explained as deriving from a word that exists neither in Greek nor in any other language.

WELLINGTON'S LIEUTENANTS. By Alexander Innes Shand. (Smith Elder. 7s. 6d.)

THE story of eight of Wellington's lieutenants, told without preface and without afterword; but giving the general reader a very thorough insight into the Peninsular campaign as seen through the glasses of individual commanders.

This biographical method of reading history is entirely agreeable; and teaches a proper estimate of those military units who made up the reputation of Wellington. Perhaps one's respect for the master mind is slightly weakened when one thoroughly appreciates how much was due to the lieutenants; but, on the other hand, much genius was needed to select these lieutenants and weld their difficult and different natures and methods into one coherent whole.

Of necessity some of the ground is duplicated, and a short preface might well have knit the several narratives together; but, all the same, the work is well done, though perhaps not of any critical merit.

There are many good stories, and the following is told of the first Marquis of Anglesey:—

Before he left for the war—he sat to Lawrence for his portrait—as the hurried sittings were drawing to a close, the painter apologised for the trouble he had given, but added that he was not satisfied with the right leg, and begged for one other hour. Lord Uxbridge (afterwards rewarded by a marquessate) answered that it was impossible, saying, "I must be off tomorrow morning, so the leg must wait till I come back." He came back, but he had left that leg to be buried at Waterloo.

There are many good portraits, and some four hundred pages of matter, and the author has the happy gift of writing sympathetically of those he portrays; he does not spare them, nor whitewash them: if they swore, he gives their oaths, and if they failed or disobeyed orders, the whole truth is told. But each of these lieutenants possessed a strong personality and some gifts of leadership, if not of supreme command. How obviously Wellington controlled and developed to advantage this material is shown in this volume.

VOLCANIC STUDIES IN MANY LANDS. By Tempest Anderson. (Murray. 21s. net.)

THIS large and handsome volume consists of reproductions of photographs by the author, to which are added brief and pointed explanatory notices. Dr. Tempest Anderson is no less a serious artist in photography than a passionate devotee of volcanoes. His studies comprise a large number of Vesuvius in various phases and its minor neighbours, of Etna, of craters and deposits in the Lipari Islands, Auvergne, Ardèche, Teneriffe; in Iceland, Prussia, Ireland, England (Teesdale), the United States, and the West Indies. Scenes from St. Vincent and Martinique close the volume, of which the final plate (CV.) shows Mont Pelée in eruption. Dr. Anderson's skill in the composition of his photographs makes them things of beauty. They will doubtless also serve admirably the more serious scientific purposes for which they are designed.

AMONG THE PEOPLE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA. By Frances E. Herring. (Unwin. 6s. net.)

CONCERNING the red, white, yellow and brown people of British Columbia. Mrs. Herring writes with knowledge, and in an entirely unaffected style which is not without charm. The narrative takes the form of a desultory story; detached incidents jostle one another, and there is a love affair which emerges now and then. Mrs. Herring tells us that what she records "is fact, even to the finding of the diary with the skeleton, although the former could not be given verbatim." The diary referred to is a piece of disconnected raving sufficiently horrible to have been still further abridged.

Mrs. Herring touches upon many customs of these mixed and curious races, and gets her contrasts by the introduction of white settlers. From a Chinese funeral we turn to a Caledonian ball, where we get touches of both Scots and Irish dialects. One of the most interesting things in the book is the account of a great gathering of Indians to see a representation of a Passion Play at Chilliwack. Indeed, the Indian chapters are the best. They give a distinctive and most suggestive picture of what may be accomplished by the Roman Catholic Church.

We have already noticed at some length the earlier volumes of the "Jewish Encyclopædia." The third volume now lies on our table. Two-thirds of it is still devoted to the letter B (Bencemero—Chazanuth). Into this volume, therefore, comes the Bible, to which an excellent series of articles, covering sixty pages, is devoted. This Encyclopædia is of the utmost value not only to students of Judaism, but also to the general student. The biographical notices continue to be all that could be desired.

We have also dealt at length with the earlier volumes of Dr. Murray's "New English Dictionary," the sixth volume of which (Lief—Lock) has just reached us. "This double section contains 1,600 Main words, 597 Combinations explained under these, and 382 Subordinate entries; in all 2,597." The portion of the English vocabulary here covered is rich in Germanic (Old English and Scandinavian) etymology.

Various additions have been made to the 1903 issue of Mudie's "Principal English Books" catalogue, especially in the division of "Classified Fiction," and a special arrangement has been made for Juvenile Books. There are also some new indexes. This catalogue forms a most useful reference book to books in ordinary circulation.

Fiction.

THE CIRCLE. By Katherine Cecil Thurston. (Blackwood. 6s.)

Mrs. THURSTON'S book is one concerning which it is difficult not to say too much or too little. There are passages of real power, but also there are passages full of effort which fall far short of strength, which, in point of fact, leave no emotional impression upon the reader. The author often seems to lose her grip on essential emotion by reason of her desire to reproduce its physical effects. In scene after scene facial expression, gesture, the play of light and shadow are obtruded to the weakening, almost ruining, of the heart of the situation. It is as though we were reading a drama encumbered by the minutest stage directions. Every motion of the actors is recorded, almost to the numbers of their steps across a room. It is clear that such a method must break continuity, must take the edge off dialogue, and reduce the fire of passion to a remote and rather unkindling glow. Remoteness is perhaps the word which best generally characterises "The Circle." Only in patches and as it were by chance do we seem to touch actuality. The old curio shop appeals to the imagination, but not so much as a fact as an idea; and the London street in which it is set is hardly a London street at all. The girl Anna, again, is an idea, a beautiful idea, rather than a living creature. When the story opens she is sixteen, when it closes she is eight years older; into those eight years have been crowded wide experiences, artistic triumphs, and love; but at the end we are not much nearer to a true knowledge of the character than we were at the beginning. Perhaps the best character in the book is a timid and faithful cripple whom Anna rescued from a pursuing crowd at the beginning of the story; he is human enough, yet even his humanity is aloof. We confess that we do not believe in Mrs. Maxted. The American lover, Strode, is rather colourless; when he touches us at all it is through Anna, and the girl's father is a mere abstraction; the whole business of his madness and death is overwrought.

"The Circle," however, is a book which impresses the reader; the care, the elaboration of minor detail, the genuine effort to present difficult situations and subtle moods, all have a cumulative effect of a curiously distinctive kind. The first three chapters are in their way remarkable, and the concluding book has a nervous tension which is now and then almost insupportable. The pity is that simple emotion is so seldom touched, that pure nature is overpowered by artifice. Our feeling in closing the book is one of disappointment, for "The Circle" comes near to being a fine performance. Simplicity is what it lacks, and perhaps sympathetic imagination; of constructive imagination it has enough and to spare.

THE LONG VIGIL. By F. Jenner Tayler. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THERE is a tradition—based on certain Scriptural words—that St John never tasted death, that he is still living, awaiting the Second Coming. Some hold that he dwells obscurely on the island of Patmos. Mr. Tayler transfers him to London, dresses him in the garb of the modern man, and imagines him taking an interest in the affairs of one Pole, a clerk on a hundred and forty pounds a year and a stool in a city office. Pole is a mild young man with a taste for the organ, and St. John appears suddenly on the bench as he plays with the announcement that it is Pole's duty to ask Miss Pratt to marry him. Now Miss Pratt is the girl who types in the office, and she is threatened with blindness and has notice to leave; moreover she is a singularly unattractive girl; finally, Pole wants to marry someone else. But Pole cannot withstand the influence of St. John, who talks at large about the will of God and rambles off into reminiscence. There are long pages of argument and reminiscence:—

"You mention Cana," he replied, undisturbed, "and there is truth in your belief that His turning of water into wine at the marriage feast dispelled our doubts, but not once and for all, as you say . . . we stood about watching the filling of the jars with water at His command, and were all prepared for some exposition of divine power; but foreseeing the magnitude of His intention were fearful for the result. However, when the jars were filled, and at His word the servants drew forth ruddy wine from where we had seen water, we looked at one another in amazement. That was just the kind of evidence we wanted."

So St. John gossips about miracles and life, death, and that great forever in the intervals of arranging the love affairs of Pole and Amelia Pratt (and Mildred). And in the meanwhile Amelia Pratt is mixed up with the Anarchists, the attempt on Greenwich Observatory and the explosions on the Underground Railway. So this is by no means an ordinary novel. It has startling contrast

And the introduction of St. John, with his interminable gossip about the disciples, borders on the offensive. Mr. Tayler gives us many delightful minor characters. The Vicar and the pike are excellent. But St. John is out of place. Mr. Tayler has not in the least convinced us of the reality of the apostle in modern dress.

A CANNY COUNTRYSIDE. By John Horne. (Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier.)

The discriminating reader of novels, whose eye falls upon such story-headings as "Jessag Shearer's Victory" or "Casting the Gauger" or "How Nelly Bain Got her Man," will have no difficulty in determining to what school the author of "A Canny Countryside" belongs. Says Mr. Horne:—

As you rise on the lift of the South road from Wick you work into a splash of grey thicked houses dropped in between a jagged sea-border and hillsides throng in heather. You have come to Knockdry.

That is all very well, and of course Mr. Horne may call it Knockdry or whatever else he pleases; but it is by no means the first time we have been there, and fine we ken it is Thrums. Nevertheless, Mr. Horne is not without powers of observation, and though he talks the kail-yard dialect and tells the kail-yard tales, he ought to be readable by any but the most cynical Southron. We do not care particularly for his sentiment, either in its domestic or its religious variety. That is very much put in with the palate knife. But there is a vein of humour in the more light-hearted episodes, especially in those, such as "Getting it Out of Him" and "How Dizzily did it," which chronicle the triumphs of rustic cunning. While for that amiable merchant, Nickie Bell, and for that woman of resource and strenuous speech, Jessag Shearer, we can feel nothing but respect and affection.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE WIFE SEALERS. By L. C. ALEXANDER.

In a prefatory note the author "thinks it right to explain that he is not, himself, a Mormon, and that this story is in no way founded on fact." The story opens with a row in a public-house—Covent Garden way—in which Mr. Nulty, otherwise "Grizzly," comes into possession of a pocket-book. It contained "English, American, and French bank paper amounting to four or five thousand pounds, and memoranda showing investments of a substantial nature." A novel with considerable go and vigour, but no great show of probability. (Richards. 6s.)

THE GATES OF WRATH. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

"As Arthur Forrest closed the eyes of his dead friend, he thought of a verse from the oldest of the sacred books of the East: 'Let him that inherits riches take heed lest peradventure he enter thereby into the gates of wrath.'" The sub-title of the story is "A Melodrama." That it is, but well-written melodrama, neat and concise. A note informs us that "The Gates of Wrath" was published serially before the issue of "The Grand Babylon Hotel" or "Anna of the Five Towns." (Chatto & Windus.)

ROSEBURY. By L. T. MEADE.

The story of a village tragedy. In the third chapter two love-letters are disposed of—one destroyed, the other lost. The tragedy springs from the destroyed letter.

There is a murder, a false accusation, and a death. "Annie sleeps in the churchyard at Rosebury, and daisies, the most innocent flower in the world, cover her grave." (Chatto. 6s.)

ANTHEA'S WAY.

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

Another novel by the prolific author of "Barbara's Money." The story opens with the crash of a cricket-ball "through the plate-glass of the drawing-room window." Jack threw it, and Anthea was watching. "She was Jack's particular chum, the nearest to him in age, and his most ardent lover and admirer." Anthea's way was largely a way of self-sacrifice, but "fate was too strong for her." She came to her own in the end: "Anthea, I have loved you for so long!" "And I," she said, with a sob, "have loved you longer: I have loved you all the time." (Methuen. 6s.)

THE COUNTESS LONDA.

By GUY BOOTHBY.

A story of mystery in Mr. Boothby's usual manner. "Should you happen to hear that the Countess Londa, alias Mrs. Ferrars, Saidie Dexter, Margaret Belton, Dora Mitford, Paula Wexford, Lady Millicent Duffield, was arrested some six months ago for attempting to sell certain Russian plans, you must not believe the fact." The volume has for frontispiece three bare-headed men and a helmeted policeman standing before a coffin. (White. 5s.)

OUTSIDE AND OVERSEA.

By GEORGE MAKGILL.

"Being the History of Captain Mungo Ballas, styled of Ballasburn, in the Shire of Fife; with some account of his Voyages," &c. A story with a foreword in verse. The first chapter contains a letter dated from "Something-spruit, South Africa, August 1, 1900," and the letter refers to an "old book." The old book was a "curious old weather-beaten folio volume in soiled vellum," and of course in places it was "soiled with mildew and damp." This old volume makes the material for the story, which concerns an attempt to found a kingdom in the South Seas. (Methuen. 6s.)

A MIXED MARRIAGE.

By MRS. FRANK PENNY.

When the story opens Mrs. Carlyon (who "worshipped blue blood") is waiting for the arrival of the prince. "He was not a reigning prince, nor heir to any throne; but he was of noble birth, and as proud of his descent as the Nizam himself." Mrs. Carlyon has daughters, and Lorina fascinates the prince. Thence the mixed marriage. In spite of a good deal of cheap and rather obvious melodrama the story has interesting situations and quite legitimate racial points. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE FETICH OF THE FAMILY.

By EDITH A. BARNETT.

Described as a "Record of Human Sacrifice." The story deals with the lives of two sisters; one is weak and clever, the other strong-bodied but mentally unfit. "You'll give up to your sister Blanche, because—poor Blanche." That is the note of the book,—an over-painful book, but written with strength and conviction. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE LIVING BUDDHA.

By ROY HORNIMAN.

The theme is the conflict between Christianity and Buddhism. "The Living Buddha" who gives the book its title is an English officer's child. He falls into the hands of wandering Hindoos who, believing him to be a re-incarnation of Buddha, carry him off to make him the spiritual Head of a great monastery. "The Living Buddha" is brought unconsciously into opposition to his mother who has come as the wife of a Christian missionary into the neighbourhood of the monastery. Later he falls in love with an English girl. (Fisher Unwin.)

Spadework.

THE Earth keeps her treasures well. Sometimes she hoards them against the due day when history is shown to be myth, or when myth is shown to be history. The results of Dr. Evans' spadework at Crete prove that Dædalus, the "flying-man" of the fable, was a maker of history, and the first European genius. They prove that the alphabet was evolved in Crete, at least a thousand years before the reputed date of its carriage, ready-made, from Phœnicia to Greece.

This Dædalus was an Athenian refugee who fled to the Court of Minos, King of Crete: and he was one of the greatest of the sons of men; almost, in his day, "a man to make the sun forgotten"—in Emerson's noble phrase. This "immortal mortal" was the founder of high art and of mechanical science. He was a great sculptor and, withal, though he certainly guessed it not, the first anatomist. Hippocrates and Galen and the rest of them were as long after him as we are after them. He was a brilliant fresco-painter and cut cameos with a microscopic eye and an artist's temper. He was a greatly daring and successful architect, and, excepting, possibly, Moses the law-giver, the first hygienist, though the goddess from whom that word is derived was conceived long after his day. In 1800 B.C. his ideas of sanitation and of ventilation were far in front of those which troubled our immediate ancestors in 1800 A.D.

There were need of warrant before writing in such a strain of a hero of mythology. And, indeed, we have not attributed to him the power of flight, though the fable goes so far. We write of sober history—history made long ago in Crete, the easternmost island of Europe, and discovered, after four thousand years, by a native of its westernmost. This most distinguished digger of the soil, Dr. Arthur Evans, after manifold delays and difficulties, has found, embedded in the Cretan hill of Kephala, the astonishing proofs which have made history of the myth, and have revealed facts incredibly stranger than what sixty generations or more have regarded as fiction.

The Royal Academy, to their winter Exhibition of the Old Masters, have, with a fortuitous fitness, added a "side-show" of the works of the oldest Master, which was to have been open for only a month. But, in deference to the astonished and delighted expert, it has been arranged that until the close of the winter exhibition we are to see this collection, of such interest to the archaeologist, the artist, the historian, the ethnologist, the biologist, and, indeed, everyone for whom Crete was the stepping-stone by which civilisation passed from Asia to Europe, from Egypt to Greece.

Here were letters born. The Greeks attributed their alphabet to Cadmus the Phœnician, who, about 800 B.C., left the Syrian coast for Greece and founded Thebes, bringing with him (as his hosts' descendants thought) that supremest of present-day commonplaces, the letter. But Cadmus did not introduce letters into Europe—nor did anyone else. To Europe itself, aided in all probability by Egyptian suggestion, belongs this final device for bridging the "seas of misunderstanding" that roll between man and man. This great advance in the evolution of mind (for letters were not invented, but evolved) was the first glory of Europe, and its final steps date from at least a thousand years before the Phœnicians. Whilst the rest of Europe, with Greece itself, were wrapped in the darkness of the Stone Age, Crete was already receiving from the Nile Valley the germs of civilisation; and she was fostering them to such purpose that we may boast of their vitality to-day.

After six years' delay, due to local stupidity and jealousy—for Crete has fallen from her high estate—Dr. Arthur Evans has been enabled to carry out three campaigns of excavation, in which he has dug further into the bowels of the Cretan hill of Kephala, upon the summit of which his eye had recognised traces of prehistoric building. He is gradually unearthing one stratum after another, the earliest of which, many feet below the Minœan palace of Knossos (built in the eighteenth century before Christ), contains associated Egyptian relics indicating a date in the fourth millenium before our era. This far date, indeed, by which man had already accomplished so much, closely corresponds with that whereto an almost forgotten chronology ascribed the Creation of our still "rotatory isle," our now "lukewarm bullet."

To that date, therefore (circa 4004 B.C.), we may now refer the evolution of letters on Cretan soil from a pictographic script, itself of Egyptian origin. Either there was direct intercourse between Crete and Egypt or the two were connected by Libyan intermediaries. The Cretan letters were, however, derived from the form of native—not Egyptian—objects, as well as from gestures, an admixture of gesture-writing with picture-writing being universal, found in every part of Europe, in Asia, and in North America. In the palace of Minos at Knossos, built for the tyrant by Athenian genius, when Athens was but an infant city, Dr. Evans has found a series of clay archives; and these demonstrate the development of the literal and arbitrary forms which probably constituted hardly so much an alphabet as a syllabary, many being doubtless equivalent to such a closed syllable as "but." Some of these forms, now definitely linearised, are almost identical with the letters of the Greek alphabet. In much of primitive Europe we had already seen evidence of pictorial writing; in the Nile Valley, throughout Syria and in Asia Minor, a more or less formalised pictographic script had been found; Schliemann had demonstrated a high degree of prehistoric civilisation at Mycenæ and at Troy; yet until Dr. Evans began to dig at Knossos it was believed that "pre-Homeric Greece was a stranger to writing, there being no trace either in the Peloponnese or the rest of Greece of anything before his time that even distantly resembled any kind of writing." The belief in "man before writing" so late as six thousand years ago he has dispelled.

But Dr. Evans has done much more than discover the birthplace of letters and their ancestry. If he has disposed of Cadmus he has reinstated Minos and Dædalus. The palace of Knossos, there can be no doubt, was the Labyrinth of the story of Theseus and Ariadne and the Minotaur. How much more is really history the decipherment of Dr. Evans' tablets may reveal.

Certain of the statuary which Dr. Evans has unearthed seems to us the most significant of his finds. The statuettes of flying youths and some others constitute the oldest anatomical records known. Of course we except Egyptian work which tells us that man walked upright long before Knossos. That we could well have guessed. But Dædalus' work demonstrates this, that four thousand years ago, at least, the arrangement and mutual relations of the surface muscles of the forearm, and the manner in which the minute venules on the back of the hand join to form the main superficial veins of the arm, were precisely the same as in each of us to-day. This, too, we might have guessed, but by no means with such certainty. We take it that, as Dr. Evans has revealed the evolution of the alphabet, and therein a phase of the evolution of the human mind and of the functions of the human brain, so he has added one more proof, not so much of the slowness of physical evolution as of its essential completion many thousands of years ago. And so it is. Nature has given this particular planet over to the Vertebrata, and to them, early in their history, she granted four limbs. At first used for progression alone, these became gradually differentiated in function, until, in the finale, a series of modifications in the vertebral curves, hurriedly epitomised by every infant to-day, permitted Man the Erected to walk Erect. Spared from locomotion, his fore-limbs have made of him even a Dædalus, the Admirable Crichton of four millenia ago. These venturesome limbs may, indeed, have subtly urged forward the cerebral development which is the mark of our race. But there are no more limbs to spare. Our eyes are placed before and not upon our spines; our physical horizon can be no further widened. Physical evolution, properly so-called, is an accomplished fact. Adaptation to environment still continues, no doubt. Our hair must go, our fifth toes are already palpably doomed—they are not perfect in many of us. Our appendices are going—none too quickly, and our nails and teeth will follow. Already our hair and teeth fall in the fight before we do.

This elimination of the superfluous, however, is not the process which has made of the free-swimming single cell of the sea a hundred million years ago the man of to-day. That process, for so many ages in climax, has reached in us, or rather in our far ancestors, its physical acme. But, though since their day we have learnt and ceased to write in pictures, and to talk in gestures; though we write in letters and talk in words, and make the ether carry them for us; though we have evolved systems of government which owe little enough to Minos; though we recognise a system of ethics the germ of which was not in Crete nor yet in Egypt, we have yet to traverse an infinite vista of evolution in another and a loftier plane.

Antiseptic Humour.

To put it shortly, one must distinguish between telling the truth in jest and jesting at the truth. The first process compels men to swallow an antidote, the second cheats them into swallowing a poison. And the humour which has helped to cleanse the world has always been the telling of the truth—not the laughing at it. You may check that statement from the records of all the jesters the world has seen from Aristophanes, who told the bare truth about democracy and the feminist movement, down to Mr. Dooley, whose "Observations" have just reached our table from Mr. Heinemann's office. Now and again the jester has gone wrong, mistaking his mission. Mark Twain—usually antiseptic—was poisonous when he wrote "A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur." For he was simply laughing at two ideals. He was jesting at truth, and not telling truth in jest.

It was a very true instinct that maintained the King's jester as a Court official, the only official who was privileged to tell the truth to His Majesty. Now and again the jester lost his head for his pains; but the King kept his head, and the jester's work was accomplished. Europe would probably go to bed with an easier mind if it knew of a good jester, domiciled in each Royal Palace, licensed to sell laughter, and with no closing hour.

But in these days the centre of gravity—and merriment—has shifted. We can all laugh at kings, and in America they are almost beyond a joke. Now we have to laugh at ourselves, and the task of the humourist is by no means lightened. That task is no longer to laugh at kings, but to laugh at humanity, and with the laughter to bring healing. The post of king's jester, the man who told the truth as a joke, has been taken up by men half unconscious of their mission, men such as Mr. Gilbert, Mark Twain, and many others. For democracy has its period of hysterics, just as the palace. We go suddenly mad about æsthetics, or Imperialism. There is a Woman Question. Christian Science comes to the front. A Durbar is held in India, a Coronation in England. America has a difficulty with the Philippine Islands. What is to be said about these things? The world flies into a sudden fury. Only the humourist keeps his head. Our debt to Mr. Gilbert will probably be paid on his tombstone, where people will remember that he saw through æstheticism to the sense that lay behind it. But, of course, he merely joked about it. He has joked about many things, including the sons of kings.

On the whole we are Not intelligent,

say the sons of "Gama Rex"; and the Almanach de Gotha is less instructive. But this is not the sort of thing that can be said seriously—in a leading article, for instance. It can be said only in jest. And Mark Twain, who, as we have said, made one big mistake, made one big hit with his nonsense about Christian Science. It could not have been done seriously. But as mere nonsense it is a clean and swift antidote to hysteria.

How then does Mr. Dooley come out of the ordeal? For we have implicitly placed him in the succession of the humourists who count. The function of the humourist—the world's antiseptic—is to stand aside and watch. Then he must tell what he sees. He must tell the truth. The inventor of Mr. Dooley has invented a man who looks across a bar in New York and sees the world between him and Mr. Hennessy. Dooley talks of many things, of Arctic Exploration and Swearing, of Books and Woman's Rights, of the End of the Boer War, and the Home Life of Geniuses. He is funny enough. Dooley has been talking long enough now to enable us to be certain of laughter when he faces Hennessy and discourses at large on men, women, and things. One may dip here and there among these "Observations" and get the happy epigram on nearly every page. To take an example or two:—

Hogan says all janiuses was unhappily marrid. I guess that's thrue iv their wives, too.

Ivrything seems to be some kind iv wurruk. Wurruk is wurruk if ye're paid to do it, an' it's pleasure if ye pay to be allowed to do it.

I don't think we injye other people's sufferin', Hinnissy. It isn't aeshally injyement. But we feel betther f'r it.

I tell ye what, Hinnissy, th' Day's Wurruk has broke up more homes thin comic opry. If th' coorts wad allow it, manny a woman cud get a divorce on th' groun's that her husband cared more f'r his Day's Wurruk thin he did f'r her.

A king nowadays is no more thin a hitchin' post f'r wan pollytician afther another. He ain't allowed to move himsilf, but amny crazy pollytician that ties up to him is apt to pull him out be th' roots.

There is laughter enough there. But it is not enough to be funny in order to perform the antiseptic functions of the humourist. And if—when the laughter is over—you will take those extracts quite seriously you will find they are really quite serious. The humourist's function—if he is to be anything more than a funny man—is to see things as they are, without passion or prejudice, and to present them as he sees them to an astonished public. Now, Mr. Dooley has much of that intellectual aloofness which is the mark of the great humourist. He sits quietly behind his bar and observes. He does not go to the Coronation; he is not married; he does not hold with reading, but he knows of each of these things "the way an astronomer knows th' stars. I'm studyin' it through me glasses all the time." He is never carried away by popular enthusiasm, and even Mr. Carnegie's free libraries fail to move him.

Th' thruth is that readin' is the nex' thing this side of goin' to bed fr' restin' th' mind. With mos' people it takes the place iv wurruk. A man doesn't think whin he's readin', or if he has to, th' book is no fun.

That is a thing which ought to be said in counteraction of the dim delusion that the march of mind goes step by step with the manufacture of printer's ink. But one can hardly say it seriously.

Too much truth is perhaps dangerous. Enthusiasms, hysterics, delusions have been strangely helpful in the world's history. And a whole generation of humourists would probably stand still and laugh at each other. But it is a wholesome tonic to find here and there, and now and then, a man who sees things as they are. The humourist is really but a man who sees a little more clearly than the enthusiast or the dullard, and gets a little nearer to the truth. And the truth, well told, is one of the newest things in the world. It brings the shock of surprise.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

"JEAN COSTE, instituteur de village" (Ollendorf), is a remarkable and powerful study from life of the tribulations of the unfortunate lay schoolmaster of France. The style is crude and harsh, that of the serious, semi-literate wholly inartistic pedagogue; but what sincerity, what poignancy in all the simple details of a tragic life! It is a book to put into the hands of every discontented person as a lesson against discontent with bearable ills. Gorki paints us the unmitigated misfortunes of the ragged and the ruffianly with that large and seizing understanding of the miseries of the poor and the humble that the Russian writers have the secret of; but, however tragic their lives to our beholding, the poor have a satisfaction in their recognised position denied that far poorer and more miserable portion known as the shabby genteel. The poor can fraternise, and they do most generously and mercifully help each other; and they can go naked and unashamed, and gratefully accept chance alleviation of their woes. But the tragic misery of such a life as that depicted in this little poignant tale is unmitigable, because of the dignity and pride the situation as wretchedly paid village schoolmaster claims, because of the sufferer's intolerable isolation between two hostile parties of a not benevolent community: the clerical party which detests the lay teacher and boycotts him inhumanly, and the peasants from whom he has sprung, who are jealous of his elevation to the rank of monsieur, and who despise him because of his poverty. Add to the vexations of unfriendly neighbours, the inadequate salary of £40 a year, with which to support a wife and family, to appear decently clad, with the strict prohibition to accept presents for the sake of that false personal dignity the poor devil would so gladly dispense with.

All this is told with poignancy and pathos in "Jean Coste," if not with literary art. The hero's resignation and unceasing effort to make the best of it, catch you by the throat in the face of destiny's implacable pursuit of him. He accepts his nomination as village schoolmaster on a salary of £10, with an added ten pounds as the mayor's secretary, with hope and delight in the prospect of being his own master instead of an under-teacher with a better salary in a provincial town. His delicate wife, with surer instinct, dislikes the change, and here begins the poor fellow's woes. He and his wife love one another devotedly, and it cuts him to the quick that there should be division between them. But he is an incorrigible optimist, however hard he may be pelted, and only at the end, cowed and broken by unmerited suffering he has striven to bear cheerfully, does his brave patient spirit break down in leaden despondency. Twins are added to the family of four and the ailing wife grows worse. To help to buy medicine and meat for her, he sends away the charwoman, and before and after class hours does all the household work himself, mends the children's clothes and his own, patches his boots as best he can, and heroically strives to cheer his unhappy wife. His mother, a grasping ill-natured peasant, grows blind, and he receives her as an added burden, the gloom of his house deepening with the declared hatred between the two women he loves. Still neither resignation nor cheerfulness forsake him, though a more hopelessly miserable existence than his could not be imagined.

The repulsive figure of the suspicious, avaricious old mother is wonderfully well drawn, and it is a relief to find her dead on guard over the few pounds she risked death to keep from her almost starving son and sick daughter-in-law. But while the whole book is irremediably sad, perhaps the most touching picture is that of poor Coste at the meeting of local schoolmasters under the scrutinising gaze of the inspector. The reading of it, so simple and unaffected, causes a physical ache of anguish, because here there is no cruelty or injustice to excite. There is nothing felt but sympathy and indulgence for the poor fellow in his broken shoes, threadbare coat and insecurely mended trousers, but he is crushed by the timidity of poverty and misfortune. He wished to walk the twelve miles to the place of meeting, but false pride prevented him from refusing to join the schoolmistress in the diligence, and he set out, already worn from having spent half the night mending and improving, with brush and ink, his poor clothes. Even a sympathetic reception cannot put him at ease; he can think of nothing but his ragged trousers and broken boots, and it is only the discovery that among the twenty teachers gathered, more than one is nearly as miserably clad as himself. The inspector, perfumed and elegant, arrives, and it falls to Coste's lot to address the audience. "All eyes are turned towards the teacher of Maleval. He trembles in every member, his ears hum, his heart leaps within his breast; he hears nothing, and with a wandering look, stays in his place, unable to move, to understand. His colleagues regard this as the effect of emotion, and try to encourage him. He only thinks of one thing: his persistent ill-luck. Taken thus by surprise, he would be ridiculous and pitiable. Oh no, it was not fair he should be so pursued by misfortune, he who strove to pass unnoticed to be obliged to affront all that eyesight which hurt him already, all those looks examining him, contemplating his piteous aspect and the garments of the poor devil. For a mortal half-hour must he speak in this space before the black-board which terrifies him, under the eyes of his chief, who will judge him unfavourably." The inspector, well-dressed, well fed, is all indulgence, though privately noting him as "badly dressed" for report, but while Coste is stuttering through incoherent nonsense on the theme of the dignity and greatness of the teachers' calling in compliance with orders, he longs to cry out from the depths of his suffering: "I have four children, a blind mother, a sick wife. I work like a black after my class, without an hour of leisure for study or thought. I am dying of shame. What can you expect me to say?" Politics is the canker at the heart of all things in France to-day. Coste and the curé are regarded as traditional enemies. Both esteem each other, and at heart are friends, but their friendship dare not show itself openly and helpfully. The curé, an excellent, large-minded and kindly creature, falls into disgrace with the clerical fanatics because of his sympathy with the lay-teacher, and Coste is reproached by the Republican for his timid relations with the curé, though neither of them have any politics to speak of. "Jean Coste" is a tragic bit of life.

Impressions.

XVII.—The Meaning.

THROUGH the open window came the lash of the waves on the beach, and the rush of wind, but those in the room were hardly conscious of nature's noises. Without, the elements raged; within, the few, come together for a little while, were united in spirit, removed from external things. It was Schubert this time, and he who played, when he had finished one composition, waited a minute in the silence, of which the sea and the wind were part, then touched the notes enquiringly again.

The faint green walls of the room, over which the eye could roam and rest, were in keeping with the art which cannot be explained in words, which calls emotions from the depths of being that march and soar with the music, and stop when it ceases with the suddenness of a parting.

The owner of this room who played Schubert that afternoon had broken the simplicity of the walls at two points—no more.

Here stood a dull green cast, like old bronze, of the Winged Victory of Samothrace, that was pieced together to make one of the treasures of the Louvre. Headless, maimed, yet still instinct with the joy of life, you see her just alighting on the prow of the vessel, swiftly bringing the news of victory to the shores of Greece. The wind blows back her garments, the salt sea air flies past her, victory in her eyes, triumph in every line of her on-rushing figure. So she stands, the embodiment of young joy, fixed in that supreme moment, silent, but eternally eloquent, unassailable by time or her ancient companions, the sea and the wind, still raging outside.

On the other wall was a photograph of a picture of music, the art hardly known to the sculptor of the Victory. In the recess of a dimly lighted studio, their faces hidden, two men are playing—the elder the violin, the younger the piano. You can feel the music; you can feel the silence of the five listeners, and the emotions that move them. One buries his face in his hands; another stares like a somnambulist, his fingers clasped about his knees, his eyes peering into veiled adventures of the soul; a third gazes helplessly at the violinist—hypnotised; the eyes of the fourth are on the ground; the fifth is a woman. And above their heads—white, calm, content—is the death-mask of Beethoven.

Such was the room by the sea where Schubert was being played—the faint green walls, the Winged Victory, held but not stilled, and that wordless picture of music brooding on immortal things. He who was playing Schubert stopped. One of the company broke the silence, and bending towards him whispered: "What does it mean?"

He played the piece over again, then turned and said, "That is what it means."

Drama.

Ibsen, Symbolism, and some Musical Plays.

LAST week was one of dramatic experiments. Nor could any experiment well be more daring than that of the Stage Society (which appears to be enjoying a longer lease of existence than is usually granted to such leaders of revolts) in producing the difficult and enigmatic utterance of Henrik Ibsen's old age, "When We Dead Awaken." Ibsen has always had the good fortune, in England at least, to attract interpreters of intelligence and cultivation beyond the common. Earlier performances of his works were made memorable by the genius of Miss Elizabeth Robins; this no less by that of Miss Henrietta Watson, who held the audience spellbound by a thrilling and finished representation of the uncanny woman from out of the past. Miss Mabel Hackney was also extremely good, although a trifle restless, in the more mundane part of Maia Rubek. The men, I think, were rather less adequate. As for the play itself, it is of course, in its directness, in its elevation, in its absorption in the things that matter, in its scorn for humorous relief, and for all that is mere literature, a hundred times more interesting than the stock conventions and outworn formulas that do duty, week in, week out, in the majority of contemporary dramas. Here is a man who at least has still, even though the accents begin to falter, something to say. It is Ibsen. But it is not, frankly, at any rate upon the boards, the best of Ibsen. The ideas and the situations are from his forge, and have his mark upon them, but the intellectual force which should weld them into a firm and consistent dramatic whole has abated. The piece is called an epilogue, and is possibly, in a certain degree, autobiographic. At any rate it is a comment upon the artistic temperament. Arnold Rubek, the sculptor, has deserted the dreams and ideals of his youth, has thirsted for the facile splendours of success, and has married the pretty Philistine, Maia—the illusion of the world. But the draught proves bitter on the palate, and the dreams and ideals awake in the person of his old model, Irene, the mysterious lady whom ordinary folk think mad. With Irene, who gave her soul for him long ago, he climbs once more to the tops of the mountains, leaving Maia to live the life of the lower slopes with the "bear-killer" Ulfheim, who typifies the average sensual man, and will help her to the earthly raptures, the "glory of the world," for which she pines. So far the main theme is fairly plain sailing, although there are countless details which are puzzling and confusing enough. But what of the issue? What is Ibsen's ultimate word on the problem which he has set? Is it an irony or a prean, that clash of the elements which whirls the aspiring pair, Rubek and his art, in an avalanche, as they set out on their upward journey? I do not feel sure. Pax vobiscum are the last words of the play, and what is Pax but Irene. But if this is what is meant, it must be admitted that Ibsen's optimism has all the gloom of other people's pessimism.

The weakness of the play, however, does not depend mainly upon its philosophical inconclusiveness, for obviously a dramatist, like anybody else, is entitled to ask questions and not to answer them, but rather upon an almost inevitable result of the symbolic method adopted. Irene and Maia stand for the two spiritual forces that sway in turn the soul of Arnold Rubek. For the purposes of the allegory it is all well and good that Maia, who is illusion, should be discarded and sent away with the bear-killer. But unfortunately, when the theme is presented dramatically, the abstractions become human beings and necessarily appeal to the interest of the audience as such. Maia is now essentially the wronged wife, and one's sympathies are bound to be turned against Rubek, although it is most important for Ibsen's intention that he should retain them. I must say that I was uncomfortably conscious of this during the whole of the long scene in which Rubek casts Maia off. As symbolism it may pass, but as humanity it is rather intolerable. A little more subtlety on the part of Mr. Titheradge, who played the sculptor, and even on that of Miss Hackney, who for all her cleverness seemed to me imperfectly to comprehend what the whole piece was about, might have helped matters. But I think that the fault really lies with Ibsen himself, and that the situation might have been made more plausible if a definite statement of the issue as between husband and wife had been evaded.

Ibsen's symbolism never lends itself very well to expression in terms of scenic art. The high mountains are a conception quite beyond the resources of the ordinary stage-manager, who glues tufts of vegetation on to cardboard rocks and rolls cannon-balls or something of that sort to represent thunder. Possibly Mr. Gordon Craig might make a reality of it. The tableaux which he contributes to the musical play of "Sword or Song" at the Shaftesbury are very good scenic symbolism indeed. They are intended to suggest the struggle of good and evil spirits over the destinies of the hero. The evil spirits are mopping and mowing creatures with fearsome skulls, shaggy hides and black tufted claws: the good spirits have long white robes extending far beyond their feet, in curves like those of angels in pictures by William Blake (not, as a well-meaning contemporary has it, William Black). I could wish that Mr. Craig did not find it necessary to use so much coloured lime-light. But the first tableau, which represents a birth-chamber, seen through a great window which covers the whole front of the stage, is quite beautiful. Within, immense blue curtains are draped from the roof on either side of a bed in the centre; six tapers in wooden candlesticks are ranged on a high shelf at the back; and the white-robed figures chant to the child. Without, the demons leap up in impotent fury at the panes. Unfortunately Mr. Craig's scenes do not blend very well with the rest of "Sword or Song," which probably appears by comparison even more tawdry and artificial than it really is. It is a romantic piece with a good deal of singing and dancing in it, and a bustling and noisy band of musical gipsies. I trust that I may be excused from any analysis of the melodramatic plot. The sight of so handsome a woman as Miss Julia Neilson, dressed as a lad, but not even beginning, either in gait, gesture or expression, to look like a lad, is not one which I can pretend to find attractive. The other new musical play of the week, which is "A Princess of Kensington" at the Savoy, makes no attempt at symbolism. It has its fairies, indeed, Oberon and Titania and their train, daintily dressed and dancing very prettily. But their function is only the traditional one of complicating the love affairs of unhappy mortals by their tricky arts. The entertainment is a very good one, with many gay effects of colour and some capital fooling.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

The Householder and the Crafts.

VISITORS to the Arts and Crafts Exhibition at the New Gallery differ from the ordinary frequenters of picture shows. The attitude of collector, connoisseur, and student-craftsman towards the exhibits is more critical than that of the picture dilettante: they are judges rather than admirers, and their comments have point. "Appalling! He hasn't the slightest feeling for colour," was the remark of a young craftsman on a certain recess containing printed cotton hangings and Axminster carpets, arranged by an eminent member of the society. "Did you ever see such a fire-place!" fell from the lips of a householder after gazing at a screaming chimney-piece, that might suit one of the palaces of the late King of Bavaria, certainly not an English drawing-room. But whether one likes the majority of the exhibits or not, the collection is singularly interesting, and so apparently the public think. At no other exhibition of the past few years have the rooms of the New Gallery been so crowded. Cramped is hardly the word to describe the arts and crafts here gathered. Their variety, and the way they hustle one another, bewilder the eye, which soon longs for repose. It was a positive relief to retire from time to time to the entrance hall and to gaze upon a pulpit, in oak inlaid with ebony, not because it was a particularly ingratiating pulpit, but because it was large and alone.

Repose is the quality that this seventh exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society lacks. The members have, for the most part, strayed from the narrow road of simplicity and usefulness, of beauty in form and colour, and have sought the easier ways of the extravagant and fantastic. The custom of printing the names of the designers, as well as of the makers and sellers of the articles, has produced the effect that was to be expected. Designers have determined to be original at all cost, and when the unoriginal man strives to be original, he usually ends in being merely vulgar. Excessive decoration and oddities of form, which may be beautiful or not so long as they are novel, would seem to be the characteristics of the "new art" in furniture of which we were shown such terrible examples in a room at South Kensington a few years ago. And judging by a "Foreword" (not preface, or note, you observe) to the catalogue by Mr. Walter Crane, the members of the Arts and Crafts Society are not ill-content to work under the banner of the "new art." I do not know if Mr. W. Tingey would call his "Writing Table" an example of the "new art." Certainly it rivets the attention, if for no other reason because the four legs emerge from above as well as from below the table. The design is certainly novel, but what are these corner pilasters for? Presumably they are intended for candles, but two candles behind the shoulders, and two in front, are hardly the lighting arrangements that a sensitive writer desires. So few designers of furniture remember that the object of their labours should be directed mainly to the convenience of the purchaser. A piece of furniture is not like a bonnet or a silk hat which may be discarded at the end of the season: it will probably be the owner's companion for the rest of his life. Beauty of form is essential, but if the article is not comfortable and convenient, mere originality of design may become sheer annoyance. For whom can Mr. Henry's arm-chair, with one arm, be intended? Then how many designers of writing tables give a thought to the size of paper? They supply endless drawers with dazzling hinges and cavernous pigeon-holes, but it is rare that drawers or pigeon-holes will accommodate the ordinary sizes of foolscap or note-paper: they are usually either too large or too small. Then as regards the easy opening and closing of drawers and cupboards. I tried a drawer in one of the most lavishly decorated cabinets. It needed gentle persuasion to make it open at all. First and foremost, the householder wants good workmanship, such an honest taking piece of work, for example, as Mr. Charles Spooner's "Oak Dresser." There are craftsmen exhibiting at the New Gallery who are bent on producing good work, simple, severe, and useful; who are not led away by the advertisement attractions of originality; whom the vice of over-decoration has not assailed. A Secessionist movement from their ranks would be an interesting experiment.

One is bewildered by the abundance, variety, and, if I may say so, splendid uselessness of many of the exhibits.

I can imagine the hopefulness with which a young couple with a hundred pounds, say, to spend on pretty and useful things would enter the West Gallery, and the despair that would gradually settle upon them. They might mildly admire, but they would certainly not wish to spend £31 on four drawings by Mr. Heywood Sumner for Fitzroy School pictures. A drawing-room cabinet of Italian walnut, inlaid with holly, satinwood, and rosewood, exhibited by Messrs. Morris & Co., would attract them, but they would postpone inquiries about the price until they could afford to live in Park Lane. Three guineas for a Head carved in wood with a Penknife! "Yes! within our means," they might say, "but not exactly useful." Neither would they feel justified in laying out money on a Model for a Presentation Sword, or for a Crucifix in Champlévé Enamel. A Painted Screen representing a battle between Blake and Van Tromp might be worth all the £30 asked for it, but—no, not quite suitable for a small drawing-room in Streatham.

While looking at these objects the lady, we will imagine, noticed four embroidered silk panels hanging on the second wall, each with a single figure that reminded her of Botticelli or Burne Jones, she could not be sure which. The titles were "The Entrance," "The Stress," "The Despair," and "The Victory," and she had never seen before such wonderful needlework. "Astonishing!" she cried. "See, there's actually sunshine in the silk. But where could we hang them. Oh! the price is £1000!" Meanwhile her companion had been studying a sketch for the decoration of a double staircase and landing. A line of huddled figures streams along the wall parallel to the upward flight of steps, and beneath their eager forms these words are inscribed: "Concerning the vicissitudes of the social struggle carried on from father to son, and of the wide and noble prospect that rewards success." (On the landing above the staircase is a square panel showing a terrace with a group of agitated figures grouped about a youth winged like Mercury. Beneath is this: "And how Icarus, the Mystic, took flight into the Empyrean." Under the line of tottering figures descending the wall on the downward flight of steps this is written: "And disappeared from the pleasant life of men instead of descending the ladder in accordance with the natural law." They gazed at it for some minutes, then the man said: "It's called 'The Social Ladder'; it would certainly give our guests material for conversation, but that will be in the Park Lane days." "Look!" the exclamation came from the lady. She was bending over a case of jewels, waistbelt of silver and cloisonné enamel; cloak-clasp in carved silver; belt-clasp in silver and enamel, with six other delightful articles, and the entire case was priced ten guineas. There was something so complete about the exhibit as well as beautiful that they bought it. They also admired a china cabinet in bright wood, so designed that every piece of china can be perfectly well seen; and a set of silver-grain bedroom furniture, inlaid with pewter and blue wood; but the only other purchase they made was a knife, fork and spoon in silver, a quaint and pretty design. Two pounds ten shillings did not seem an excessive price to pay for that. Then they absented themselves from the temptations of further purchases. "There are many beautiful things in the exhibition," said one as they passed through the swing doors, "but they must be sought for, not without labour." "Yes," answered the other, "and it would take a week of afternoons to examine everything."

The surprises of the exhibition are the jewels and metal work. The day of humble stones in beautiful settings has come. In no other branch of the industrial arts has the advance during the past decade been so marked. In printing one is glad to see a tendency towards legibility—none too soon. However beautiful a Morris page may be decoratively and in spacing and printing, it is far from being a joy for ever if the page begins to dazzle, and the eyes to tire, after half an hour. Legible and beautiful is Mr. Cristie's type for "The Sermon on the Mount," and to read Waller's "Go, lovely Rose," as executed by the Pear Tree Press, is to find in that poem a new morning freshness.

Science.

The Study of Science.

THE Science Masters of Public Schools assembled in conference at the London University lately decided that Greek ought no longer to be a compulsory subject for matriculation at any University, and it was—as Mr. Dooley would say—the sense of the meeting that Natural Science might fitly take its place. Thus did the cobbler in the fable convince himself that there was nothing like leather, and were the professors of (say) Swedish Calisthenics consulted in such a matter, they would no doubt come to a similar recommendation of their own particular nostrum. But the subjects required at matriculation must always govern the course of study at our public—and for that matter of our private—schools, and if the resolution of the Science Masters were to find favour in the eyes of the University authorities, the teaching of Natural Science to boys in their teens would quickly become a good deal more general than it now is. Would this be for the benefit of the boys or of Science?

Now it may at once be said that if every boy before leaving school could really pick up even a superficial knowledge of Natural Science, we should as a nation be much better informed than we now are. Nothing has more astonished me since I began to write these articles a year ago, than the utter and complete ignorance of the commonest phenomena of electricity and the like displayed by the Man in the Street as typified by many of my correspondents. It is also quite true that the study of science is as good a mental gymnastic as any other, and that the boy who spends his time in observing and classifying the facts of Nature is rather more profitably employed than if he were to devote himself to the investigation of the laws which govern the inflexions of the Greek verb. But it does not follow that everything that is good to know is easily learned, and there are many things which would prevent the average public schoolboy from acquiring even a smattering of science did the Science Master charm never so wisely. In the first place, the facts at the disposal of the science student have lately increased so enormously in number that it requires the close and unremitting attention of a great part of one's life before one can boast of a working acquaintance with even a considerable part of them. But such attention is quite out of the question for a public schoolboy, who has, unless he is to pass through life as a man of one idea, to acquire some knowledge of history besides giving time to games and the other things which go to make up the politics of his little world. And if it should be said that it is only the rudiments of science with which he is to be required to acquaint himself, who shall say at this time of day what these rudiments are? Thanks to the immense though silent advance that has been made during the last two decades in our knowledge of the constitution of the universe, there is not one single branch of Physical Science but has had what were once thought to be its fundamental principles rudely upset. Take, as an instance, electricity, which for the present bulks perhaps more largely than any other in the public eye. It will be conceded that theory should in this as in other studies precede practice, but what theory of electricity can the beginner now be taught? Is he to believe with Sir Oliver Lodge, that electricity is a constantly varying strain or stress in the hypothetical ether which surrounds the molecules of all substances? Or with Prof. Silvanus Thompson, that electricity is the ether itself? Or with M. Le Bon, that electricity is the effluvia given off under certain conditions by all matter? Or with Prof. Osborne Reynolds, that it is the "tendency to revert" of the irregularly piled groups of grains of which, according to him, this universe is composed? All these theories, as the readers of the ACADEMY know, have lately been put forward with equal skill and plausibility, and no one of them yet shows signs of gaining any ascendancy of acceptance over its fellows. In like manner, it might be shown that every other branch of Natural Science, from Chemistry down to Mechanics, is the battle-ground of equally plausible and equally inconsistent theories. M. Lucien Poincaré, Inspector-general of Public Instruction in France, put the case in a nutshell when he lately said in his annual review of the progress of science, that "there hardly exists any longer one of those great theories universally admitted round which all experimenters used by unanimous consent to range themselves. A sort of anarchy now reigns in the realm of the natural sciences. All liberties are permitted. No law appears to be rigorously necessary."

It will, of course, be said that there is a difference between showing anybody how to use a spade and initiating him into the art or mystery of making railway cuttings and sinking mine shafts, and that what we ought to do with our boys is to instruct them in the use of the equipment which they will have to acquire for themselves in after life. For this there is much to be said; but what is the equipment that will prove most useful to the future student of science? I should say, in the first place, mathematics, which now enters more largely into scientific practice than those whose ideas of science are limited to the notion that it is something to do with stinking stuff kept in a bottle would readily believe. Always necessary to applied science, mathematics has now become one of the most important means of investigation in the study of scientific theory as well. Clerk Maxwell offered mathematical proof of his great discovery of the electro-magnetic theory of light long before Hertz showed that it was possible to demonstrate it experimentally, and the same might be said of many of the researches of Lord Kelvin. No one can open a book upon any of the physical sciences nowadays, without being struck by the predominant part that the more advanced branches of mathematics—such as, for instance, the differential, integral, and infinitesimal calculi—play in their discussion. But these are not learned in a day, and the foundation of them forms but one of the things that can be most profitably taught in schools. Nor should the usefulness of Greek in the study of science be lightly set aside. Thanks partly to its own richness and flexibility, partly to the fact that all European scholars are fairly in agreement as to what it means, the Greek language forms the basis of all our modern scientific nomenclature. The student of science who begins without a competent knowledge of its vocabulary, as distinguished from the arbitrary rules which grammarians have been pleased to make for it, is thereby placed at a great disadvantage, and spends, it may be hours in puzzling over words like "isomerism," "entropy," and "dielectric," which the classical scholar would comprehend at sight. Mathematics and Greek are then two of the most important requisites for the study of Natural Science.

It will be gathered from what has been said that science is not, in the opinion of many, the best possible study for a schoolboy. It does not follow from this that it should be a matter of indifference to grown men. Quite apart from any practical utility it may have for any of us, there is probably none which is more forming to the mind, which teaches us to distinguish more easily between probability and proof, or which favours more the concentration of thought without which all mental effort is apt to be fruitless. But without considering these advantages, there is none which, at the present moment, at all events, appeals more to the imagination, which is more likely to satisfy our human appetite for the marvellous, and which is in the strictest sense of the word more romantic. Whether we make any practical use or not of such knowledge as we can acquire of the nature of the universe or of our own bodies and minds as part thereof, it is quite certain that the pursuit of it is one of the most fascinating that can be conceived. This is the truth which I have tried, though doubtless clumsily enough, to enforce in the series of articles of which this will be the last. It has given me much pleasure to write them, and although I cannot flatter myself that the readers of the ACADEMY have derived anything like equal pleasure from reading them, I shall be well content if they have given anyone so much as a glimpse into the delights of the study of knowable things.

F. LEGGE.

Correspondence.

A Suggestion.

SIR,—During the last quarter of the last century one well-known novelist wrote of another, and of that other's works, the following lines:—

The mass of the public finds them dull, and wonders how a writer can expend such an immensity of talent in making himself unreadable. To a discriminating taste, however, — can write nothing that does not repay attention. . . . But the book is in a single word a dead one . . . was spontaneous and sincere; but to read its successor is, to the finer sense, like masticating ashes and sawdust. That a novel should have a certain charm seems to us the most rudimentary of principles, and there is no more charm in this laborious monument to a treacherous ideal than there is interest in a heap of gravel.

You, sir, are probably aware that Henry James wrote these lines of Gustave Flaubert; but do they not read wonderfully like a modern criticism of Henry James himself? They appear in the volume called "French Poets and Novelists." (Macmillan. '78, '84, and '93.)—Yours, &c.,

A. J. DAWSON.

Fern Hill Park, Woking.

P.S.—Note particularly, "laborious monument to a treacherous ideal!"

Miss Burney's Diary.

SIR,—The Bookworm mentions the edition of Miss Burney's Diary and Letters, edited by her niece, Charlotte Barrett, in 4 vols. in 1891 (Bell). That I suppose was a reprint of the "Cheap Edition" which I have now before me, "published for Henry Colburn by his successors, Hurst and Blackett," in 1854. The advertisement inserted before the title page of this edition runs: "Now in course of publication, to be completed in 7 monthly volumes, small 8vo., commencing the 1st March, embellished with Portraits; price 3s. per vol.; elegantly bound; and the title is: "Diary and Letters of Madame d'Arblay, author of 'Evelina,' 'Cecilia,' &c. Edited by her niece."

Heading "Opinions of the Press" is an extract from that "Edinburgh Review" which, as "The Bookworm" notes, "started Miss Burney's modern vogue," and next one from the "Times," which is to the point: "Miss Burney's work ought to be placed beside Boswell's Life, to which it forms an excellent supplement."

Could "The Bookworm" give us particulars of the original edition?—Yours, &c.,

C. H. MINCHIN.

Pau, France.

An Examination Paper.

SIR,—May one suggest an examination paper on "The Disentanglers"? The scientific side may be left to Mr. Legge.—Yours, &c., H.

I. Logan, or rather Fastcastle, does not unto this day know the secret of the Emir's feathers. (P. 320.)

Discuss this in connection with the definition of man as "a featherless biped," and suggest emendations of—

(a.) Messrs. McBrain, of the steamers. (P. 369.)

(b.) Kestabrig. (P. 379.)

II. "There is one of us in an old novel I read a bit of once . . . Once she arrived in a snow storm and a hearse." (P. 19.)

What novel is this?

III. Discuss the relation between Messrs. Gray and Graham, disentanglers, and the Society for the Utilization of Johnnies.

IV. "Poison the lemons? With a hypodermic syringe?" asked Miss Martin. "No; that is good business. I have made one of my villains do that." (P. 179.)

Is this novel extant?

V. "It is damned awkward," said Logan, testily. "Ah, old boy, but remember that, 'damned awkward' is a damned awkward expression." (P. 269.)

Give source of this.

VI. What is "a social header"?

VII. Examine and criticise the statement on p. 87 that a fortune running into "six figures" may be anything from £100,000 to £999,000 19s. 11½d.

Blowitz.

SIR,—Allow me to rectify a slight inaccuracy in your kindly notice of M. de Blowitz. He never dictated to a French shorthand, but usually to a French longhand amanuensis. He occasionally, however, dictated in French to an English colleague, who took it down in shorthand in English.—Yours, &c., J. G. ALGER.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 175 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best account of "My Day's Work." Thirty-two replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss Lena Carrington, Norman House, First Tower, Jersey, C.I., for the following:—

In a broad sense there are two different kinds of work in the world: the bustling, for the most part mechanical work of the body, and the fervent, imaginative work of the brain. To these might be added a third, common to all—the strenuous unconscious work of the soul.

The day of an invalid such as I am must of necessity belong to the second class of work—the work of the brain. There is the long morning spent in study—the reading of a favourite author, the criticism of a new book. In the afternoon there is the reading aloud to a few friends, and later the correcting and revising of MSS. fresh from the typewriter's hand, and in the twilight lying in front of a deep red fire come the quiet thoughts, the gathering together of fresh ideas, or perhaps a sudden inspiration which demands the instant bringing forth of light, clean paper and sharp pencils. The evening spent in furthering that new inspiration, studying books of reference, planning details, characters, atmosphere, and then to bed with brain teeming with the excitement of creation. That is my day's work.

Of that more important work of the soul—the stifling of impatient words, the turning of one's thoughts from vain regret—the schooling of the spirit under the hand of pain—nothing can be said. The mystery of the inner life is sacred.

Other replies follow:—

I start with a south-west wind as boisterous companion along the high road to the top of the wood, I climb the stile and plunge downward by the winding path among the trees, telling myself it is too early in the year to find anything, but not believing it the least, while the young hart's-tongue fronds laugh at me for pretending to think it is still winter. Now I leave the path and trespass boldly, for close at hand is that little clearing where the earliest sunbeams have been at play for weeks past, and—yes—there is the glitter of gold.

Winter indeed! No, the hart's-tongue was right after all. Call it January if you will, but the first primroses of the year have been found.

The afternoon walk must follow. The high road is straight and dull, and the hills have sulkily covered their faces in mist. Only one giant stands out distinct in his russet-coloured heather mantle against a long streak of pale clear evening light. I reach the brow of the hill and gaze down, as at a far-off vision—into the world below—towns—villages—railway—and I, an exile, stand here so completely cut off from it all. Do I wish to be back? No, not yet, not yet.

Now it is evening, and from my pillow I look straight out over the tree-tops, through wide open windows at the star-lit sky with its fair promises for to-morrow. A day's work? Yes. And the wages! Health. The same day's work as my forty fellow consumptive companions.

[M. J., Bristol.]

"Pity the individual poor man,—not the mass."

My work is to interview the individual poor man when, at some crisis in his affairs, he appeals to charity for help.

It is my task to lead him back by gentle questionings over the hills and dales of his life; to discover the particular trait in his character which has led him to failure, or to gauge the depth of the misfortune which has suddenly overwhelmed him.

Sometimes like a patient describing his symptoms he is painfully anxious to be exact; other times he is equally anxious to be circumstantially inexact; often he has no memory, or is garrulous, evasive and vague; occasionally he is angry; always to some extent untruthful.

Having told his tale, he goes home, and when the testimony of those who have known him has been collected a light is kindled by which one may read something of his character, get a glimpse sometimes of the real man, and perhaps prescribe for him successfully.

To say that this digging into human nature, and doctoring of ills more deadly than any the medical man knows of, is interesting is to utter a stupidity.

More knowledge may be gained by the study of a few failures than by the reading of hundreds of biographies of successful men.

Someday, many years hence, when I am old and wise, I hope to learn the whole truth about one man, and then—

But then my day's work will be done.

[L. V. S., London.]

My day's work is my day's pleasure; for content and the congenial task are one. Electrical engineers link the most mysterious, the most powerful, and the most subtle force in all the Universe to their chariot wheels. They drive into unexplored realms of imagination, and are ever bringing new gifts to lay at the feet of Progress.

It is my mission, and I consider it a high one, to produce Light and Power. Light—the crime preventer; and Power—the ability to accomplish things.

Variety is of the essence of my day's work. One day it will be watching a little glittering engine, in a cruiser, twisting current from the copper of a humming dynamo. Another day it will be passing from stone to stone up some Highland stream to gauge the gleaming waterfall. And another, hot on the track of a new invention, or welding the ideas of an artist-architect with the practice of the craftsman's workshop.

There are periods of disappointment and of jealous rivalry; but these can be reduced by the spirit of the individual. They are for the training of character, and are common to all professions.

My day's work is usually all I could desire it. Alas! the result of my day's work seldom is. But an electrician knows that he is in the pioneer ranks in the march through the ages, and it spurs one on to feel that even another day's work may pierce the barriers of a new vista of wonder.

[D. S. M., Glasgow.]

Seven o'clock,—the irritating perturbation of a three-and-sixpenny alarm drags me back to another dawning, one minute's fierce will-struggle; bed-clothes fly apart, a "Sandow's" strands stretch and strain in reluctant obedience, hasty splash of an icy tub, hastier toilet: breakfast ill-served, ill-cooked, then the mud, the rain—and the 8.15.

The City's roar, haste and bustle, turmoil and gloom; one single maxim—"Do others or they'll do you." First a fluttering pile of correspondence to explore, then the daily round from office to office. Noon, Full 'Change, the greedy, gabbling crowd, knowing no language but that of money and commerce; later, a scrambled lunch, then two hours to record a hundred scribbled memoranda, formulate countless schemes, probe competition, exhume fresh business.

4 p.m.—Raucous ciamour of 'Change again, faces gloomed by ill-luck or bright with hope of gain, the eternal talk of trade, ever the same.

A moment snatched for tea, then back to the office to reel off letter upon letter, and speed coded cablegrams east and west. Perhaps by seven it is over, the day of the broker's clerk; a wearing, tearing day of turmoil and toil. Perhaps home by eight, for dinner, with two or three hours of my own, sick at heart with the squalor of Mammon, brain-sick and fagged. The short hours quickly fly and the day is done.

Such is my day, such was my yesterday, such will be my to-morrow.

Cui bono?

[H. E., London.]

I'm a widow with four children to provide for, two of whom are sick. Practically speaking, my work is never done. Hood's famous poem comes very near describing my own case, although I feel buoyed up by the prospect that my children will in the future "rise up" and support their mother by-and-by.

Early in the morning when all the little "doves" are asleep I get up and repair their clothes for a short time. Then I hurry off to clean out some offices down town, and by the time I get back the children are awake and crying for food. Hastily getting breakfast ready and partaken, I "pack" as many as are able off to school, then commence to tidy up my home in order to make things look decent before the doctor makes his appearance.

"No great improvement this morning," is his somewhat disheartening "bulletin." "Get another bottle of mixture, and see that they have every attention." This is said as he shuts the door and hurries off to his next patient.

After a two hours with "my head in the wash-tub" I next have my attention divided between making the dinner and cleaning up the sick room and the breakfast dishes.

Dinner past, there is now a considerable amount of laundry work to perform, while the sewing machine and darning needles brings six o'clock with its welcome cup of tea.

The evening is spent between the sick room and preparing the bairns to get to their hammocks.

By 11.30 p.m. all is at rest again.

[Mrs. S., Aberdeen.]

The model arrives, the picture progresses, at first joyously, then perversely away from the dream. I alter and scrape and repaint.

Isn't it Millet who says—"Art's not a picnic, it's a fight"? That is where the fun comes in. If it was easy, it would be dull.

But the luminous idea grows dim as the struggle continues, the model grows weary and cannot keep the pose, eye and brain are blinded by too much effort to see. A truce is called. The model goes. Outside, the sunlight is brilliant on the grass, and the sky gleams between the branches. Rapidly I try to suggest it all with a little coloured mud which is all the painter has—a wad adventure surely, yet some have achieved it.

The morning's gone.

After lunch—watercolour for an hour, or design. Then a renewed attack upon the picture till it is too dark to see colour or one's own failure.

I go out to study the open-air pictures that are never failures—the children round the watchman's fire—the workmen trudging homeward in the violet dusk—the cottage-windows shining softly under the crescent moon. When the lamp is lit comes black and white, illustration, decoration, and some writing. The black lines fall into position, regiment after regiment, or have to be laboriously dragged into something like position. A book grows sheet by sheet, slowly, steadily. The good day's done, and poor and little is the day's work.

There is to-morrow.

[E. R., Bushey.]

My labours are chiefly those of a clerk in the Civil Service, but I contrive to vary them with the delights of study. Rising at seven I am usually immersed in some branch of mathematics till breakfast time. Nine o'clock finds me on the way to the office, where I am busily employed until half-past four in the afternoon. Notwithstanding the jocular comparison of a Government official with the fountains in Trafalgar Square, which play from ten to four, my work, although congenial and interesting, is by no means light. To make an intelligent précis, for example, of a mass of involved correspondence, is not always a simple matter, while to solve some of the problems which arise in dealing with the public demand an ingenuity fully as great as that evoked by the morning's exercises in Euclid. At five o'clock, however, I am enjoying my evening meal. Then comes the great treat of the day—an attempt "to plough the classic field." The pleasures of gaining, for the first time, an insight into the meaning and beauty of some ancient author, can only be imperfectly described, and are only equalled by the joys of looking forward to a wider knowledge and a fuller appreciation. At nine o'clock my day's work is completed, and is generally followed by a little music, which forms a fitting prelude to those soft slumbers which "become the touches of sweet harmony."

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

Messrs. Macmillan will shortly publish an edition in five volumes of "Plutarch's Lives." The version given is that published in the seventeenth century, with a prefatory life of Plutarch by Dryden, and thus generally known as Dryden's "Plutarch." This translation was revised by A. H. Clough, who prefaced it with an introductory biographic and critical sketch of Plutarch, with some account of Dryden's life.

Prof. E. A. Gardner, sometime Director of the British School at Athens, will shortly publish with Messrs. Macmillan a work on "Ancient Athens," which will give the reader the fullest results of modern archaeological scholarship set out in a popular form. Photographic illustrations on almost every page help out the text point by point, and in stating the ground for conclusions as to topography and the like, all citations from the classics are translated.

Maurus Jokai once read of the skull of a criminal guilty of twenty-one mortal sins, which is said to swing, enclosed in an iron casket, from an iron bar in the foundry of a German fortress. The idea suggested the theme of a novel, which was afterwards written. It will be published by Mr. Grant Richards, next month. The translation is by Mr. D. E. Boggs, and the title is "Told by the Death's Head." In the preface Jokai writes: "What if this skull could speak? What if it could defend itself? If my highly esteemed readers will promise to give me their credulous attention, I will relate what was told me by the death's head."

The death of Frank Norris removed from the ranks of fiction one of the most notable of the younger writers of the day. His last novel, "The Octopus" was published by Mr. Grant Richards in the Autumn of 1901. Readers of "The Octopus" will remember that in a preface the author announced his intention of completing his "Epic of the Wheat" in two further novels, "The Pit" and "The Wolf." "The Pit," which was finished by Mr. Norris before his death, will be published next month.

A new edition is being prepared of "The Roadmender," by Michael Fairless, which was published in the early part of last year and has since been reprinted six times. Fairless was one of the Christian names of a woman who gave up a great portion of a short life to work among the poor people, and "The Roadmender" gives in the main her real experiences. Her life was too fully occupied to allow her to write anything until she was prostrated by illness in 1900. This book was written during the physical disability and pain of her last illness. Two of the sections portray the last stages of her life spent in Chelsea and in Sussex.

GEO. R. SIMS'

NEW WEEKLY,

MEN AND WOMEN

A POPULAR JOURNAL FOR EVERYONE.

Men and Women is a comprehensive title. It is intended to convey the comprehensive character of the new journal.

Men and Women makes its appearance as a candidate for public favour in the firm belief that it will take a position of its own, and cover ground not at present occupied.

Men and Women who write, and the genial gossip of the Book World, will be made a special feature, and will be contributed by a distinguished novelist and littérateur.

Fiction will not be neglected; short complete stories of sterling merit will from time to time find a place in the pages of Men and Women.

A special series of articles will deal in a novel and realistic manner with "Types of Men and Women."

The Men and Women of the World of Pleasure and the World of Pain, of the World of Work and the World of Play, of the World of Politics and the World of Art, the Man in the Street and the Woman at Home, will pass before us, leaving a record of such acts and deeds as they may accomplish for the edification or amusement of their fellow-creatures.

The Editor has also prepared, from certain papers which have come into his possession, a series of domestic revelations entitled "Young Mrs. Caudle." The original Mrs. Caudle was a lady of middle age; her successor is quite a young lady, but has views of her own on a variety of subjects, and is by no means willing to let her husband have the last word on anything. Married Women—to say nothing of Married Men—will, it is anticipated, be not only amused but instructed by the little domestic differences at which they will be permitted to assist.

In Men and Women the reader will find bright and interesting paragraphs and articles concerning not only the World of Rank and Fashion, but the Men and Women of the Classes and of the Masses who are making the Story of our Times from day to day.

Orders now received by all Newsagents and at the Railway Bookstalls.

The Literary Week.

HAS America a larger public for minor verse than we have? If the question is affected by the number of volumes issued the answer must certainly be, yes. Within the last week we have received from one publisher in Boston no less than seven volumes. None of the verse reaches a very high level, but none is really bad, and often the note struck is one of simplicity and sincerity. Perhaps these qualities constitute the appeal of such work to American readers, and it must be confessed they are qualities sadly lacking in much of the verse which reaches us from home sources. In this country the flow of minor verse is steady, but nothing compared with that of fiction. We have received ten new novels since Monday. Among other books published during the week we may note the following:—

ANCIENT ATHENS. By Ernest Arthur Gardner.

Prof. Gardner says in his Preface: "The author of a book on Ancient Athens must needs owe much to his predecessors, and these are so many that, in an attempt to make mere particular acknowledgment, there is no little danger of omission." The list of works referred to seems reasonably full. In order to avoid controversial matter in the body of his work Prof. Gardner has relegated such matter to the notes at the ends of certain chapters. "It has been my aim," he writes, "to give as clearly and directly as possible the impressions produced by the sites and buildings described, as viewed in the light of the references made to them by classical authors." The volume is fully and well illustrated from photographs.

DE SENANCOUR'S OBERMANN. With an Introduction by Arthur Edward Waite.

The first complete English translation of a book now close on a century old. "Obermann" owed much of its vogue in England to Matthew Arnold's essay, and it seems curious that no earlier translation should have been published. Mr. Waite's introduction is both biographical and critical; he regards "Obermann" as "a great book of the soul" and its author as a "man of vision." We quote a passage from the conclusion of the book: "And if I should reach old age, if, on a day, still thought-haunted, but ceasing from speech with men, there should be a friend at my side to receive my farewell on earth, let my chair be set down on the short grass, may there be peaceful daisies in front of me, beneath the sun, under the vast sky, that in relinquishing this fleeting life I may recall something of the infinite illusion."

THE ROMANCE OF MY CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH. By Mme. Edmond Adam.

Translated by Helen Stanley. Mme. Adam, it will be remembered, gathered about her during the Empire a number of advanced politicians, artists, and wits, and in 1879 founded the "Nouvelle Revue." In Mme. Adam's preface we read: "I am the daughter of a man who was a sincere sectarian, disinterested even to self-sacrifice, and who dreamed of absolute liberty and absolute equality. Until the terrible year of 1870 his mind mastered my own. For an instant, during the days of the Commune, he thought his dreams were about to be realised. Were he alive now he would be a disciple of Monsieur Brisson, whose political ancestor he was. He would have pursued only one idea: the upsetting of everything."

MAIN CURRENTS IN NINETEENTH CENTURY LITERATURE. By George Brandes.

The third volume of "Main Currents," dealing with the "Reaction in France" (1874). "A certain aggregation of personages, actions, emotions and moods, ideas and works, find expression in the French language, and influence French Society at the beginning of the nineteenth century, form in my eyes a naturally coherent group, from the fact that they centre round one idea, namely, the re-establishment of a fallen power. This fallen power is the principle of authority." The volume opens with the Revolution and the Concordat, and leads by way of the Lyric Poetry of Lamartine and Hugo to the "Dissolution of the Practical Principle of Authority" and the "Culmination and Collapse of the Reaction."

We like Mr. Burgin's cheeriness. We read that he the other day expressed himself as follows, in a letter dictated through the Edison-Bell phonograph: "Oh, dear! forty-seven to-day and just brought out the 'Shutters of Silence,' my twentieth novel, and have two more novels and thirty-eight short stories coming out this year. As the girl said when she sat at the window in Venice: 'I'm looking at the canal, and drinking it all in, and life never seemed so full before.'"

THE "Manchester Guardian" is to be congratulated on the fact that it was able the other day to give a three-column report of an interview with Mr. George Meredith. Mr. Meredith, we believe, has never before permitted his spoken views to be printed; he has always preferred to speak to the public through the medium of his chosen art. This record of a long conversation has, then, a particular and personal interest. The main subject of the talk was the future of Liberalism, but there were many digressions into matters which come more within our province. Mr. Meredith has never written what is called a political novel; his politics have been implied in character rather than expressed in development of plot. "Beauchamp's Career," perhaps, may be considered an exception, but the interests of that remarkable book cannot be bound by the narrow limits of any classification. Mr. Meredith doubts whether the nation as a whole understands Imperialism. "Do our people know what Imperial principles are? They have yet, I think, to be instructed in them." Then the speaker proceeds to the question of education and the show of patriotism at the time of the Boer War. It was only patriotism, Mr. Meredith considers, in one direction:—

It was not the patriotism that looked all round the country's interests, although I for one was very glad to see that the country was stirred in its heart and tightened in its nerve by the disasters of Colenso and Magersfontein. That was all to the good, for it showed the country concerned with itself. But we want to see the lower orders in England—the peasantry and the artisans—taking a livelier, steady, and constant interest in the concerns of the country. . . .

Concerning education, Mr. Meredith said:—

I trust that ultimately (at present, I admit, it does not seem as though we can look for it to come speedily) but I hope that ultimately we shall be able to take teaching out of the hands of the clergy, and that we shall be able to instruct the clergy in the fact that Christianity is a spiritual religion and not one that is to be governed by material conditions. A spiritual God I most perfectly believe in. I have that belief constantly before me—I feel it within me; but a material God that interferes in material, mortal affairs I have never seen, and that I don't mind anybody knowing; and it is, I am sorry to say, for the material God that the clergy seem to be striving. . . .

That last sentence is the text upon which Mr. Meredith has written again and again; it accentuates the responsibility of the individual, while it gives him, in the spiritual idea, not a haven of refuge but a point of repose and rest. Mr. Meredith's unalterable hope in human nature constitutes the great appeal of his philosophy; his is the controlling optimism which never overreaches itself, because it is anchored fast to life and the sum of human experience. In conclusion Mr. Meredith said:—

I suppose I should regard myself as getting old—I am seventy-four. But I do not feel to be growing old either in heart or mind. I still look on life with a young man's eye. I have always hoped I should not grow old as some do—with a palsied intellect, living backwards, regarding other people as anachronisms because they themselves have lived on into other times and left their sympathies behind them with their years.

Nothing has been more remarkable, perhaps, than that perennial youthfulness of Mr. Meredith. He has never gone into the wilderness and brought back strange goblins to frighten us; which does not mean that he has no knowledge of the wilderness, but that he recognises it for what it is.

It appears that in Germany there is now a Poet's Trust. The lyrical poets of that practical country, to the number of about seventy, met some time ago to consider the matter of remuneration; perhaps pay would be a better word in the circumstances. They decided that they were not receiving high enough terms, and they have now entered into a compact not to accept less than sixpence a line. We sympathise with the gentlemen whose lyric fervours were rewarded with less than this; we sympathise, too, with the editors whose hands are to be forced, if the forcing comes about. To have seventy poets in a country each of whom writes verses worth sixpence a line must be a sore trial.

THE difficulties of the compilers of dictionaries are well illustrated in a note in "Notes and Queries," by Dr. Murray, editor of the "New English Dictionary." The word which Dr. Murray discusses is the now too familiar "Appendicitis." Dr. Murray writes:—

When the portion of the dictionary dealing with app- was written in 1883, we had before us a single reference, from a recent medical source, for this word. As words in -itis are not (in origin) English in form, but Græco-Latin, and thus do not come within the scope of an English dictionary, unless, like bronchitis, they happen to be in English use, I referred our quotation for appendicitis to a well-known distinguished medical professor His answer was that appendicitis was a name recently given to a very obscure and rare disease; the term was purely technical or professional, and had even less claim to inclusion in an English dictionary than hundreds of other Latin or Latinized Greek terms of which the medical lexicons are full, and which no one thinks of as English.

Yet, twenty years later, appendicitis appears to be a disease neither rare nor obscure. It is perhaps fortunate that our bodies are reticent concerning their dictionary possibilities.

Mr. DOOLEY does not believe in free libraries. He says in the "New York American": "Libries niver encouraged lithrachoor anny more thin tombstones encourage livin'. No wan iver wrote annything because he was tol' that a hundred years fr'm now his books might be taken down fr'm a shelf in a granite sepulcher an' some wan wud write 'Good' or 'This man is crazy' in th' margin. What lithrachoor needs is fillin' food." In the conversation with his friend Hennessey the following passage occurs:—

"Has Andrew Carnaygie given ye a libry yet?" asked Mr. Dooley. "Not that I know iv," said Mr. Hennessey. "He will," said Mr. Dooley. "Ye'll not escape him. Before he dies he hopes to crowd a libry on ivry man, woman, an' child in th' country. He's given thim to cities, towns, vilages, an' whistlin' stations. They're tearin' down gas houses an' poor-houses to put up libries. Before another year ivry house in Pittsburg that ain't a blast furnace will be a Carnaygie libry. In some places all th' buildin's is libries. If ye write him fr' an autygraft he sinds ye a libry.

Mr. Dooley, as we said the other day, always has his eyes open; he is a philosopher who gets at things from the inside.

IN "Blackwood's Magazine" we find a series of "Letters to a Literary Aspirant." The letters are written in a spirit of implied criticism, and occasionally they hit the mark very neatly:—

Your object, then, at every stage in your novel-making must be to discover the water-worn channels in your reader's mind, so that by means of one of these your own stream of romance may flow more readily and make a goodlier torrent; otherwise your symbols might be Chinese characters instead of English for all the images they will awaken in his brain. It is precisely here that the cunning and experienced professional scores his points and makes his income. . . .

After more advice of a similar utilitarian kind, the writer proceeds to give examples of the types of novels that bring circulation and income: the first is laid in France in that indefinite past which has such attractions for certain romancers: the second represents the "North British Melodramatic Idyll" and opens thus:—

God wots I am but a feckless loon, and the ongoings I here-with give to the world only the clavers of a dreich and waesome peat-lug; yet it behoveth all men to speak of what they have seen, particularly should the profession of the ministry have given them (as by the grace of Providence it has given me) the gift of what they call in our parts the gab; and so will I e'en take up the tale upon a frosty morning in the latter part of November towards the close of the Fatal Year. Fatal indeed it had been for the old house of Auchterfechan. Two braw sons snippit awa' by the tattiebogles, the kye blithered but and ben, and the winsome bit lass Miss Buttercup wrestling now with the dread curse of the Drumwharrochs. For the malison had erstwhile withered her rosy cheeks, and the doctor's nag stood even at that instant before the sneek kailyard.

What an astonishingly familiar air the passage has.

THERE has been held a "Shakespearean religious service," and the scene of it, we learn from an article in the "Shrine," was Tirnanog. Says the writer of the article, who signs himself "A Broad Churchman":—

The participators met, by invitation, in the drawing-room of the gentleman who had devised this service, as one that might prove agreeable to the religious ideas of his friends. As I entered to time, he was seated in an easy chair, facing the assembly, beneath an ornamental bracket, whereon, half enveloped in chrysanthemums, was a marble figure of the infant Shakespeare, with Jovian brow, a smile upon his lips, with eyes glancing, and little arms stretched forth to Heaven. The conductor of the service had an open "Shakespeare" on his knees, and all of us, by request, had come provided each with a copy of the poet's works. This initial service needed some explanatory comment, and I shall now report it by the aid of my notes, as far as possible, upon the conductor's own lines.

For this remarkable performance the sonnets were largely used, and the one-hundred-and-forty-sixth was selected for the opening as being an "expression of the moods of general confession and repentance." Then followed a creed touching our "Lord the Ideal," which introduces the Roman Empire, the Reformation, and the Renaissance. At the Renaissance—our Lord the Ideal appeared in the universality of His glory of Beauty, Truth, and Love, as Pan-Logos, and in the person of Shakespeare judged the state of the world. He sanctified the sceptre of Justice, that beneath its sway, not only Love might still more live and thrive in the world, but that Beauty, Truth, and Love, now for ever in harmony, might accomplish the eternal Kingdom of the Ideal and make earth heaven.

After this came a celebration of the threefold Ideal "in terms of Sonnet," the one-hundred-and-fifth. There was more of the same kind of thing, and a second creed, the whole business concluding with the one-hundred-and-twenty-sixth Sonnet. The writer concludes:—

At the close of the service I re-issued into the actual world in that state of perfect religious harmony and peace, which I have so often been left to desiderate, in issuing not from mission chapels only, but even from cathedrals and mosques, and Indian and Chinese temples. As a Broad Churchman I was satisfied at last.

We envy "a broad Churchman" his faculty of being pleased. For ourselves, we think we should have left the service with very different feelings. The infant Shakespeare, "with Jovian brow, a smile upon his lips," even without the chrysanthemums, would have been too much for us.

Is the "Monthly Review" going to make a feature of editorials in verse? This month again the first article swings to metre, and we detect the hand which wrote the last. The verses have for title "An Essay on Criticism," and after playing round the subject generally the writer pounces on Mr. Kipling. Why, he asks, turn critic of political and imperial matters, giving friendly bears, expecting buns,

A paper full of stale, unwholesome Huns.

Mr. Kipling is conjured to return to the inferential criticism which his best work displays.

In that Day's Work be sure you gained, my friend,
If not the critic's name, at least his end;
Your song and story might have roused a slave
To see life bodily and see it brave.
With voice so genial and so long of reach
To your Own People you the Law could preach,
And even now and then without offence
To Lesser Breeds expose their lack of sense.
Return, return! and let us hear again
The ringing engines and the deep-sea rain,
The roaring chanty of the shore-wind's verse,
Too bluff to bicker and too strong to curse,
Let us again with hearts serene behold
The coastwise beacons that we knew of old;
So shall you guide us when the stars are veiled,
And stand among the Lights that never Failed.

THE writer of "Literature and Life" in the "Saturday Review of the New York American" is a master, as we have had occasion to point out before, of a certain vague floridity. It appears that Count Robert de Montesquiou-Fezensac is now in New York to "read poems which he has written and essays on art to the exclusive." He hopes to extend the liberty of poetry by cultivating "in the shadow of the Ivory Tower wherein Vigny withdrew, according to Sainte-Beuve, singular, rare and perfumed flowers." The writer continues:—

Are you sure that he is mistaken? The muse of poetry wants to see herself beautiful. To reflect her beauty she may not prefer the natural springs in the woods rather than the mirror by which a subtle artifice shows her divine visage in the crystalline limpidity of fictitious and imaginary water.

We should like to know what Count Robert de Montesquiou-Fezensac thinks about those six concluding words.

THERE is shortly to be issued a new monthly art magazine under the title of the "Burlington Magazine for Connoisseurs." The editor is to be Mr. Robert Dell, who is to have the advice of a consultative committee consisting of thirty-one members. It is claimed that the "Burlington Magazine" will represent, more than any existing publication, the leading art periodicals of the Continent. One good point is that the majority of the illustrations will be inset plates, without any text on the back. The promoters of the enterprise are at any rate ambitious, and we wish the venture well.

EDINBURGH is not a city which supports many native journalistic ventures, but it is shortly to have the opportunity of reading a new daily paper of its own. In politics the new paper is to be liberal in the manner of Lord Rosebery. The "Scotsman," the promoters think, has had its own way far too long.

THE "Literary World" prints a list of "Fifty Representative Historical Novels," compiled by Mr. Jonathan Nield, who some months ago published a volume containing a list of romances covering practically the whole field of history. The list is distinctly interesting. Mr. Nield has included no book of doubtful pretensions, and the periods dealt with range from the sixth century B.C. to 1825.

MR. W. G. COLLINGWOOD has an interesting article in "Good Words" on "Ruskin's Library." Ruskin's books were scattered all over his house, but in his study were kept his books of constant reference and his pet editions. Curiously enough, in that workroom there were few volumes on Art or Political Economy, save two,—one an odd volume, mostly uncut, and Viollet le Duc's "Dictionnaire de l'Architecture." Ruskin, says Mr. Collingwood, "came to his own conclusions; he got at the root of the matter, mostly, and he could make you see it. All the tinkering criticism about his mistakes only shows that he thought 'first-hand,' so to say, and wrote with a full pen." Ruskin had one abominable habit—that of cutting down books to fit a shelf. It is almost incredible that he could saw off the top edge and rip out the best plates from so valuable a folio as Westwood's "Minatures and Ornaments of Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS." Yet he did it.

It is possible to say with some certainty what are the best books on historical, scientific, or philosophical questions, but who is to decide which are the best current novels? A contemporary give the following as the "Best New Novels":—

"Lord Leonard the Luckless" -	W. E. Norris.
"The Private Papers of Henry Rycroft." -	George Gissing.
"The Golden Kingdom" -	Andrew Balfour.
"The Red House" -	E. Nesbit.
"The Countess Londa" -	Guy Boothby.
"The Gates of Wrath" -	Arnold Bennett.
"The Circle" -	Katherine Thurston.
"The Riggles and Others" -	Evelyn E. Rynd.
"Anthea's Way" -	Adeline Sergeant.
"A Mixed Marriage" -	Mrs. Frank Penny.

We do not suppose that any two people would accept this selection as it stands.

MR. HENRY ARTHUR JONES, answering the question of "T. P.'s Weekly" concerning the "Books of My Childhood," says:—

The "Pilgrim's Progress." What a dramatist Bunyan might have made if he had not fallen into the hands of the Puritans!

Does Mr. Jones always read in terms of the Drama? Bunyan would have made one of the worst dramatists in the world.

Bibliographical.

SAID a writer in the "Sphere" last Saturday (January 31): "It has not been noticed that Mr. Basil Hood has based his new opera, 'A Princess of Kensington,' on a lengthy poem entitled 'Kensington Garden,' written by Thomas Tickell, and published in 1722." As a matter of fact, Mr. Hood's indebtedness to Tickell (such as it is) was duly pointed out in one of the London daily papers on Friday, January 23. Moreover, it is not accurate to say that "A Princess of Kensington" is "based" upon "Kensington Garden." All that the Savoy librettist has taken from Tickell is the suggestion that Oberon once held his court where now is Kensington, that that place is named after his daughter Kenna, and that Kenna had a fairy lover named Azuriel who was fiercely jealous of a mortal prince named Albion. All of this is told by Mr. Hood in the first ten minutes of his opera; everything that follows is wholly of his own invention. For my own part, I am glad that we have a librettist so well read as Mr. Hood appears to be. Apart from the Savoy products, contemporary comic opera is magnificently independent of all assistance from literature.

An article on Thomas Campbell in a leading literary review—wonders will never cease! 'Tis many a year since any authoritative critic thought it worth his while to devote an essay to the author of "The Pleasures of Hope." Of course Campbell found his way into Mr. Miles's "Poets and Poetry of the 19th Century," but that is not saying much. More to the purpose is the fact that he figured in 1891 in Henry Morley's series called "Companion Poets." A selection from his verse figured in the "Canterbury Poets" in 1885. His "Poetical Works" were reprinted by Routledge in 1880 and 1887, and by Gall and Inglis in 1881. That he should be included in Messrs. Oliphant's "Famous Scots" series (1899) was to be expected, as Scotland looks well after her own children. That certain poems by Campbell are still being read by youthful Britons is made clear by the selections published in recent times "for the use of schools"—in 1889, 1894, 1895 (two selections), and 1902.

Mr. Harland speaks of his "Mademoiselle Miss and Other Stories" as if they were antique productions, but the volume containing them is only ten years old. One of Mr. Harland's earliest publications was "My Uncle Florimond," imported over here from the United States in 1888. Then he published here "Grandison Mather" (1889, reprinted 1891), "A Latin-Quarter Courtship and Other Stories" (1889), "Two Women or One" (1890), and "Mea Culpa" (1891). It was, I should say, his "Grey Roses" (1895, reprinted 1901) which first attracted our critics and public. Afterwards came "Comedies and Errors" (1898), but it was his "Cardinal's Snuff Box" which first secured for him universal acceptance.

In one of the numerous series of reprints, Bishop Wilson's "Sacra Privata, or Private Meditations and Prayers," is to figure. It first came out in 1786, but not until 1853 (so it was claimed) was it "printed entire from the original manuscript." Its popularity of late years is, of course, due to the eulogies of Mr. Matthew Arnold. In sheer vogue it seems to have been outdone by two other works of the Bishop—his "Knowledge and Practice of Christianity made Easy" (reprinted by the S.P.C.K. in 1848) and his "Short and Plain Instruction for the Better Understanding of the Lord's Supper" (reprinted in 1888).

Messrs. Macmillan's promised reprint of the English translation of Plutarch's "Lives" which A. H. Clough revised and corrected from the original, has led to the appearance of some amusing paragraphs, by which it was made clear that the writers knew absolutely nothing of the work with which they dealt. Clough himself was described as "late Professor at University College, London"—late indeed, seeing that he died in 1861! The paragraphists seemed not to be aware that they were referring to the poet and essayist, the derided of Mr. Swinburne, the beloved of Mr. Matthew Arnold.

The volume on Cardinal Mazarin which Mr. Arthur H. Hassall has prepared for the "Foreign Statesmen" series will be welcome. Of late years we have had no English monograph on the Cardinal save that written by Mr. Gustav Masson and published in 1886. Meanwhile, for most English people, I fear, the only real Mazarin is the Mazarin of Alexandre Dumas, as remembered through the mists of middle and old age.

In reply to Mr. Minchin's letter of last week I may note that the "Diary and Letters of Madame D'Arblay," edited by her niece, Charlotte Barrett, appeared originally in seven volumes in 1842-6. My business, for the moment, was only with the latest reprints of the work.

I see Mr. Bernard Capes has written a novel which he calls "A Castle in Spain." That strikes one as rather an obvious title, and certainly a story so-named was published by Messrs. Chatto some eighteen years ago.

A Literary Man.

ROBERT BUCHANAN: SOME ACCOUNT OF HIS LIFE, HIS LIFE'S WORK, AND HIS LITERARY FRIENDSHIPS. By Harriet Jay. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS biography of Robert Buchanan, diffuse in its very title, is written by his sister-in-law, who was also his adopted daughter. Trained (as she says) from her earliest years to look up to him with reverence as the embodiment of all the moral—and other—virtues, she is therefore the last person in the world to write his life in any true sense. She is at the same time well fitted to produce the usual domestic “great and good man” record. And being a novelist, she is also able to make her biography readable—for which we are thankful exceedingly. It is on the usual principle of letting the man “speak for himself,” and is quite a capable piece of work in its kind, which we love not.

A Scot born in England of an English mother, and educated in Glasgow, Buchanan all his life fought fiercely for things he could not quite achieve—which he had it not in him quite to achieve. He was a thinker—enough not to be quite a poet; a poet—enough to spoil his thinking. He was poor, and had to struggle for a living; which is a very bad thing for a poet in days when no man can live by poetry. He was versatile enough to do many things for a living, but not versatile enough to do them quite well enough. He was almost great in several ways, and ate his heart out in the stormy effort for that little more. Full of energy, and sensitiveness, and impatience, and consciousness of powers which somehow did not work out to rounded issues, he struck all round him, made many enemies, gained few friends, and was not a contented or successful man. Perhaps, though a fighter, he was not altogether strong.

His father was an Ayrshire tailor, who, under the influence of Robert Owen, turned Socialist orator, journalist, reformer, and infidel; his mother, young, pretty, adored and adoring, the parent of his own quick emotions, was the daughter of a Midlands’ lawyer, also a Socialist. He went first to a London school, where the master held peculiar (and seemingly economical) views on the diet of the young, which resulted in small Robert falling back on a supplementary diet of garden snails, and coming home chiefly bones. He removed to a French and German school kept by a Gallic gentleman, and his parents to a cottage at Norwood—where, among other social and Socialistic acquaintance, he had the society of Louis Blanc. Thence he passed to a small day-school at Glasgow, where his father edited the “Glasgow Sentinel,” and soon prospered in the world. It was not a very happy position for poor young Robert. His schoolfellows practised the gospel of Christianity by warning one another: “Don’t play with yon laddie, his father’s an infidel!” Often he “prayed with all his soul that his father would mend his ways, go to church, and accept the social sanctities like other men.” Nor did the poor little poet take kindly to the bare creed or negation of creed in which he was trained:—

“While my father was confidently preaching God’s non-existence,” says he, “I was praying to God in the language of the canonical books. I cannot even remember a time when I did not kneel by my bedside before going to sleep, and repeat the Lord’s Prayer. So far away was I from any human sympathy in this foolish matter, that this praying of mine was ever done secretly, with a strong sense of shame and dread of discovery.”

He was in after-life, of course, an Agnostic, with “a strong sense of natural religion”—which vague phrase you can interpret for yourself. Sent to a boarding-school at Rothesay, in the Isle of Bute, he began to develop all the characteristics of his after self. Worshipping his mother, he was bitterly homesick. He also fell in love. He was twelve, and she was nine; and they parted—never to meet again. “Again and again my youthful Juliet rushed into my arms,” he writes, “again and again our tears mingled together.” Naturally, being Robert Buchanan, he began to write verse, for the first time. He met a dazzling vision (let us hope it was before the “youthful Juliet”); her name was Rebecca, and he rhymed it with “deck her.” Did not Tennyson write—

I wove a crown before her,
To show that I adore her,
For her I love the dearest,
A garland for Lenora—or something like it? Let us excuse poor Robert at twelve. The spirit of revolt which was his throughout life came with those of love and poetry. “Were you that devil of a boy who was at school with my daughter at Rothesay?” wrote to him a gentleman some years later. He was. He made up his mind to get expelled (having first tried jumping off a steamer, coming home dripping, and saying he had fallen overboard) and he got expelled—perhaps the only time he got his desire.

So he passes ultimately to the Glasgow High School, and he makes friends with a “poet” on his father’s staff, one Hugh Macdonald, who teaches him Scottish song. Macdonald also published the boy’s first ballad in the “Glasgow Times”—perhaps the strongest argument against Macdonald being a poet. But “the very air was full of poetry. Why, in the adjacent town of Paisley alone the poets were to be counted by thousands. Macdonald knew them all.” Great Phœbus! “It is more than likely that if you stopped a policeman on his beat in the streets of Glasgow, you would find that he was a poet, and that he knew his Shakespeare and even his Shelley, to say nothing of his Burns!” After which, it seems necessary to remind the reader that Miss Jay is a novelist.

But all this seems to explain, or help to explain, Buchanan’s habitual lack of poetic completion, of severity with himself in what he wrote. He learned to associate poetry with too unexact a standard. There are hardly in the literature of the world a thousand poets. Of higher import was it that he saw Vandenhoff in “King Lear,” and for the first time grasped the greatness of the play, if not of Shakespeare (for his understanding of Shakespeare shows limitations, like most things concerned with him). The players themselves he came to know, and writes:—

Morals they had none to boast of; they tripped, they swaggered, they ran after petticoats and petticoats ran after them; but the spirit of the savage old literature ran in their veins like blood, and they had the fine qualities of their defects. Their very speech was archaic, their very oaths were reminiscent of Bardolph and Pistol . . . Among them, for a short period, drifted a young player of another nature, afterwards known to the world as Henry Irving. A quiet, studious young man, even then ambitious, but exhibiting little talent even as a “walking gentleman,” I was much drawn to him by his thoughtful personality, so different to the wilder personalities of his companions, and I took him to my father’s house and introduced him to my mother.

His father’s sudden and complete failure made him risk the venture of throwing himself on London, whither his poetic ambitions drew him. With plenty of clothes but little in his pockets he reached Euston, to have his luggage impounded on account of a lost ticket. He had no friends, did not know where to go. Lying in Regent’s Park, with tears in his eyes, he saw a youth looking at him; a close-cropped youth with a pugilistic aspect and a short clay:—

He reminded me instantly of . . . the Artful Dodger, and by that token he was quite as ragged and disreputable-looking. We got into conversation, and . . . hearing that I was without a home, he invited me to accompany him to his quarters in the neighbourhood of Shoreditch. Late that afternoon I found myself in the east of London, in a sort of low lodging-house or thieves' kitchen. It is all like a dream now, but I remember my new friend was very kind to me, and saved me from impolite attentions on the part of my companions. The whole place reminded me of Oliver Twist, and I fancy Fagin was there as well as my friend the Dodger, whose bed I shared that night, throwing myself full dressed upon it and sleeping like a top till morning. There were other beds in the wretched room, and other youths and men of my friend's persuasion, but no one molested me, and, what is more wonderful, no one robbed me of the small sum in my pocket. I rose up in the early dawn, and shook hands with my friend, who was half asleep. I never saw him again.

It is not "the cheese," as Buchanan might have been told, for one gentleman in misfortune to prey on another. The account shows some of the weaknesses which explain Buchanan's want of success. It is over-wordy in the original (he cannot say "rose" without adding "up"). He conveys no idea, gets no grip of the scene he visited; an alert writer would have seized it in a few strokes.

We have dealt at some length with this early and preliminary period of Buchanan's life, because it shows his character in the making. What he was as boy and youth, he remained throughout. Whether success would have mitigated his character, one knows not. That first delusive success with his London poems must have made his comparative obscurity afterwards the harder to bear. His life becomes mainly a record of literary struggles, and largely the writing of "pot-boilers"; and in these pages has a very fragmentary appearance. It resolves itself into a series of papers by various hands on "Buchanan's this" and "Buchanan's that." The spirit of revolt was strong in him; and we fancy that, like Shelley, he would have made or found antagonisms however his life had run. Where he did not quarrel with men, he held aloof from them. Proctor, the semi-poet, was kind to him in his first friendless days; but (despite Proctor's invitations) he kept "intending" to call on him again till the old man's death. He was poor, and pride held him back, suggests Miss Jay. We suspect pride had much to do with all his isolation. He was "no hero-worshipper," she says. We suspect he could not afford to hero-worship, while he felt himself dubiously one of the heroes. He offended Lewes by irreverence towards the divinity of George Eliot. Lewes kept her behind a curtain, and no one might approach till he drew it, says Buchanan. It tempted his irreverence. He was friendly with Browning; but they cooled to each other. Browning said that "White Rose and Red" was "a beautiful poem! a beautiful poem!" clapping his hand warmly. But later, when Lecky, at an Academy dinner, eulogized the "City of Dream," Browning murmured, "Of whom is he speaking? Of Buchanan, the writer of plays?" So insincerity is hinted—or a little more than hinted. They disagreed over Walt Whitman, whom Browning denounced "on moral grounds," yet after confessed he knew only from "garbled" extracts. (The phrase is Buchanan's.) Buchanan's enthusiasm for Browning also "lessened as the years wore on," he says—but does not suggest insincerity. It is a glimpse of the misfortune of temperament to which his isolation was due. Of noble impulses, ideals, and efforts, of energy resurgent against misfortune, of a warm heart centred on a few, we get glimpses, and plenteous declarations. But not from these fragmentary materials for a biography is it possible to form a coherent idea of Buchanan the man. On the whole, in his attitude towards life as towards religion, one conceives him an Agnostic, dreaming of something unrealised, passionately striving towards it, and feeling himself benighted in the search.

"A Robust, Clear, and Manful Intellect."

MALLET DU PAN AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Bernard Mallet. (Longmans.)

"In England, nothing whatever has been published about Mallet du Pan except two articles in the 'Edinburgh Review.'" This is the statement of Mr. Bernard Mallet in presenting to English readers an entirely admirable biography of his remarkable ancestor. The arrival of this work is a piece of poetic justice, for Mallet du Pan, the pioneer historian, as he wished to be, and was, of the French Revolution, was a deep admirer of England. The unshakeable nation he called us, and it is impossible to read without pride his description of the England to which he fled when Geneva, his first refuge, was entered by the French troops in 1798:—

I could fancy myself in another world, in another century. The contrast between the Continent and England is astounding. Et penitus toto divisos orbe Britannus is indeed true of to-day. Across the sea I left Europe in the throes of a convulsive effort to secure at any cost a shameful peace. Here, we are in the full tide of war, crushed by taxation and exposed to the fury of the most desperate of enemies, but nevertheless security, abundance and energy reign supreme alike in cottage and palace. I have not met a single instance of nervousness or apprehension. . . . You may imagine that I am in my element, with no need to express my opinions and no fear of exile if I am wanting in respect to Barras or Merlin de Douai!

Indirectly English readers have already profited by the extraordinary sanity, uprightness, and clear-sightedness of this journalist of the Revolution. To his son, Carlyle wrote: "A fine, robust, clear, and manful intellect was in him, all directed towards practical solidities, and none of it playing truant in the air; a quiet valour that defies all fortune—and he had some rather ugly fortune to defy—everywhere integrity, simplicity, and in that wild element of journalism, too, with its sad etceteras, the assurance of a man." Taine wrote enthusiastically of Mallet's "analysis always exact, predictions almost always true." Sainte-Beuve, while denying him brilliance and ease, said all that need be said of a journalist when he declared that "no one is more often right, pen in hand, than he."

And that is the first and last impression that one receives from this record. Mallet du Pan preserved a marvellous sanity amid the deliriums of his time—not sanity of the glacial and self-preserving kind, but hot, alert, and dangerous. A Swiss by birth, he was reared in the city in which Amiel was to watch with a bewildered and sensitive philosophy the slow and peaceful revolutions of later times. He belonged to that Genevese school which his French biographer has described as one of "precise observation guided by moral sense." He could accept facts and expound them with incomparable force. Thus, always consistent, he was always in the van of thought. A Royalist to the core, he could write in 1789: "The principles of the Revolution have become the law of the land. They were imperiously demanded by the abuses of every kind under which France had groaned since Louis XIV. To attempt to oppose the new order of government by schemes of active resistance, by chimerical ideas of counter-revolution, would be an act of madness." Yet he never ceased to denounce intolerance and anarchy in the Assembly. There is something Olympian in the clear sight of this sleepless publicist who understood so much better than his fellows the meaning of the Revolution, and to whom that upheaval was so much more dreadful because he saw it steady and saw it whole. He saw that the axe had been laid to the very root of the tree, and that a new society must be planted and nurtured. But under what conditions? "Among a people corrupted by the mean vices engendered by despotism, amid an excessive inequality of fortune and still more of education and talent, with books which substituted enthusiasm for reflection, amid a chaos of morals, rights, and systems!"

Again and again one is braced by the superb courage and intelligence of the editor of the "Mercure," whose single pen made itself formidable while a myriad swords dripped blood. His daughter has left a description of the home life which lay behind this quietly heroic figure:—

Imagine my childhood, passed amid the first horrors of the Revolution; those still evenings, when, seated in my little chair by my mother's side, every knock on the door filled me with fright, thinking that it meant nothing less than the return of his corpse. My mother said nothing, nor did I; but young as I was—I was but thirteen—I guessed and felt all these things. And then that fearful scene at the Opéra, when I heard this "good" people yell "Down with the Aristocrats!" and "Mallet du Pan to the gibbet!"

It was amid scenes and perils like these that Mallet du Pan kept the cool head of a great publicist, and looked beyond even his worthiest readers into the needs of the future historian. To be a pioneer historian was his ideal. He therefore placed facts before comment, though a presentation of facts such as his was the essence of comment. His analytic reports of the debates in the Assemblies were read throughout Europe with confidence.

At last, threatened with the public guillotine and the private pistol, denounced by the parties between whom he strove to hold the balance, the victim of four assaults on his house, three arrests, and one hundred and fifteen denunciations, threatened finally with a trial that could end only in his death, Mallet sat down to his desk and forged one more thunderbolt, then prepared for flight.

Such a man could find no resting-place in Europe, and death or England were the foregone alternatives of his future. Chased, it is said, by a French privateer, he landed at Yarmouth in May 1798, and came to the house of Mr. John Reeves in Cecil Street, in the Strand. Here and in his house near Bond Street he mingled with the strange world of exiles and emigrés, and continued with declining strength and disappointed hopes of Government support, his rapier criticism of the Revolution and the Napoleonic régime. But he saw that Bonaparte held France in the hollow of his hand, and his acceptance of the fact exposed him to charges of inconsistency wholly unjust. His was a locomotive mind. His present biographer justly remarks that Mallet du Pan would not even now need to recall his sketch of Napoleon after the triumphant return from Egypt.

Able and energetic in action, mock heroic in speech, never were valour and contempt for humanity, capacity, and false greatness, intelligence, ignorant jugglery, insolent immodesty, and splendid qualities, united to the same degree as in this man extraordinary rather than great.

To the last day of his strength this game man kept up the struggle in London. But disease, poverty, and age were allied against him, and he died two years after his arrival in England. The Government pension that had been vainly sought for himself was generously given to his widow.

This memoir, admirably planned and written, will be Mallet du Pan's memorial on English book-shelves. Its one seeming defect—a paucity of anecdote—was inevitable, for the man's life was in his opinions. But it is good to end with a story, and we will do so. In his youth he had known Voltaire well, and he united a deep admiration for his genius with a critical regard for his philosophy. He warmly defended Voltaire against those who imagined that his conversation was a tissue of blasphemies. In eight years of intercourse with the author of "Candide," he never once, he declares, heard him express a doubt as to the existence of God or make a single jest of religion. On the contrary:—

I saw him one evening at supper give a tremendous lesson to D'Alembert and Condorcet (two Atheist writers) by sending his servants out of the room in the middle of a meal, and saying to the two Academicians, "Now, gentlemen, you are at liberty to pursue your discussion. As I do not wish to be robbed and murdered to-night by my servants, I am anxious that all notions of God and of a future state should not be eradicated from their minds."

Mr. Lang's Scotland.

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. By Andrew Lang. Vol. II. (Blackwood.)

THE second instalment of Mr. Lang's erudite and lively history extends from the murder of Cardinal Beaton in 1546 to the death of James VI. in 1625. It is a crowded century of stirring and romantic exploit, to which Mr. Lang is well qualified to do justice, and of which he has already handled some of the more outstanding episodes in separate monographs on the Casket Letters and the Gowrie conspiracy. We discussed the general character of Mr. Lang's historical work, in connection with his first volume, in the ACADEMY of 12 May, 1900, and there is little on that score to add now. His interest is frankly in individual destiny rather than in the wider social and intellectual movements which are the background of history. He quotes, but with little sympathy, Carlyle's protest against the, perhaps, extravagant interest which in almost all historians who have touched the subject, the personality of Mary of Scotland has aroused:—

When he desires to see and hear the spiritual ferment of a grave, ardent, and deeply-moved people; to watch the tokens of hearts convinced of sin; and the stir of indignation against a secular imposture, the new joy of men between whose hearts and God the barrier of ceremony is broken—he is told a tale of scandal in high life. He is put off with the amours and hates of Darnley, Riccio, Mary, and Bothwell.

In fact, while human beings are of concern to human beings, that tragedy will be the subject of interest and dispute. There are here terrible and sorrowful facts, facts in great numbers, if not precisely recorded.

We have some sympathy with Carlyle's point of view; but this does not prevent us from appreciating the freshness with which Mr. Lang tells a twice-told tale, and the skill and patience which he devotes to analysing the cloud of evidence which obscures rather than reveals dark and sanguinary events.

It may be interesting, within the brief space at our disposal, to quote two examples of Mr. Lang's deliberate judgments upon his leading dramatis personæ. Of Murray he says:—

He was a Calvinistic opportunist. Believing in union with England, and in Protestantism, he steadily did his best for these causes. He had a pension from Elizabeth, and took a rich present from France. He was undeniably grasping: kirk lands or maiden's lands came alike welcome to him. He was ambitious, but it is vainly asserted that he schemed to win the crown. . . . An opportunist, in an age of public crime, has an uneasy course to steer. But Murray was brave; in private life without reproach; sagacious; honourable in his tutelage of his ward, the little King; and he would have made an excellent ruler, had he not been debarred by the accident of his birth.

Of John Knox:—

Knox had none of Murray's avarice; he betrayed no man; he took money from none, to none did he truckle. He even urged clemency on Murray, after Langside fight, and the Regent spared his future murderer, Bothwellhaugh. But, as Lethington said, Knox "was a man subject unto vanity." As a historian he is, necessarily, a partisan, and is credulous of evil about his adversaries, and apt to boast, as the heathen Odysseus declines to do, over dead men and women. As a Christian, Knox's fault was to confine his view too much to the fighting parts of Scripture, and to the denunciations of the prophets. The "sweet reasonableness" of the Gospel was to him less attractive. He laid on men burdens too heavy to be borne, and tried to substitute for sacerdotalism the sway of preachers but dubiously inspired. His horror of political murder was confined to the murders perpetrated by his opponents. His intellect, once convinced of certain dogmas, remained stereotyped in a narrow mould. How little his theology affected, morally, the leaders of his party, every page in this portion of history tells. He was the greatest force working in the direction of resistance to constituted authority—itsself then usually corrupt, but sometimes better than anarchy tempered by political sermons. His efforts in favour of education, and of a proper provision for the clergy and the poor, were too far in advance of his age to be entirely successful. He bequeathed to Scotland a new and terrible war between the kirk and the State. He was a wonderful force, but the force was rather that of Judaism than of the Gospel.

For Mr. Lang's careful summing-up of Mary we have, unfortunately, no room. But we notice that, after telling us that "For Mary men poured out their lives like water. She was more to them than a woman: she was a religion and an ideal," he qualifies the statement by a warning that it applies rather to the Catholic youth of England than to Mary's own subjects, and presently adds that, in sixteenth-century Scotland, "men acted as their personal interests, or seeming interests, inspired them; and loving loyalty to the queen is a refraction from the Jacobite sentiment of a later time."

"To Better Herself."

LA GRANDE MADEMOISELLE, 1627-1652. By Arvede Barine. Translated by Helen Meyer. (Putnam's Sons. 12s. net.)

MORE and more as we recede from the past and from its thoughts and its system of life, the more valuable become the books that lift again the curtain of oblivion falling inevitably over its scenes and its actors. The contrast is already so enormous that any intimate revelation of the manner of existence three centuries ago has a refreshing quaintness. The brain is drawn from its familiar outlook. It contemplates the unaccustomed and comes back from it stimulated as if by a change of environment.

Monsieur Arvede Barine's "La Grande Mademoiselle" raises the curtain to some extent upon the royal and political conduct of the reign of Louis XIII. La Grande Mademoiselle, round which the action is here centred, was the king's niece, and daughter of the Gaston D'Orleans, then Monsieur of France, whose character was such a marvellous mixture of baseness and intelligence, cowardice and effrontery, charm of manner and interminable appalling treacheries.

Mademoiselle, herself, was not a lovable personality. In her memoirs the egoism revealed is not only intense and passionate, but choked with pettinesses and an almost farcical vanity. In all the grim drama enacted at that period, when so much was changing, and so much was being done already to prepare the soil for the terrible revolution to come, Mademoiselle's chief preoccupation was the desire practically "to better herself" in life. In her position there was but one way to do this—through a brilliant marriage. And the futile efforts she made to attain this end are ludicrous in the complacent blindness that instigated them. Neither vulgarity nor absurdity affected her; she was without all partialities save one—the husband might be in his infancy or his dotage—Mademoiselle owned herself indifferent to details of this nature; but what he must have, or stand at least a very reasonable probability of having sooner or later, was a throne for the ambitious Frenchwoman to occupy. At the time when she was trying for the Emperor Ferdinand III. she writes in her memoirs, "The desire to be an empress followed me wherever I journeyed," and hearing that he was very devout, with a view to furthering her own cause Mademoiselle tells us she thought it best already "to form habits best suited to the habits and humour of the Emperor."

The Emperor did not marry the lady, and the end of the episode has a touch of humour. For she writes: "By following his example I became so worshipful that after I had feigned the appearance of devotion a while I longed to be a nun." The religious mood, however, did not last long. The desire to be an Empress was of a greater duration. Even the Emperor's re-marriage to the Austrian Princess did not entirely kill hope. With an ingenious candour Mademoiselle says upon this matter: "The Empress is enciente; she will die when she is delivered, and then—"

Such was the daughter of Gaston D'Orleans. But if her coarseness was sometimes appalling, it must be remembered that neither her period nor her surroundings were of a nature to encourage softness of temperament. Richelieu was head of France, and Richelieu's influence was like an icy breath upon the least germ of delicate or sensitive feeling. And Mademoiselle along with the rest had to bend her proud neck forcibly in the yoke of the Cardinal. Even a careless word might have to be accounted for. The description of Mademoiselle, when a child of eleven years old, sent for by Richelieu to be first sternly humiliated, and then punished for an idle phrase, is interesting in the amount it lays bare. Louis XIII. after twenty-three years of married life had at last a son and heir. Mademoiselle, delighted with the new toy, in its doll-like paraphernalia of muslin and lace, exclaimed, "We will play at husband and wife." Richelieu heard,—there was nothing that sooner or later did not come to be heard by him,—and the remark cost the little girl both an interview she never forgot with the man whose only apparent warmth lay, as if ironically, in the splendid rose of his clerical garments, and also the termination of her residence under the roof of the Royal Palace. For in the utterance Richelieu scented, not danger, but the seed from which danger might subsequently grow, and that was enough to make preventive measures immediate. That he was not, moreover, very wide of the mark in his apprehensions was proved by the sequel. For Mademoiselle did subsequently cherish very confident dreams of marrying her young cousin, and worked so hard for it, that there was even some vague talk of considering the matter. Its absurdity, however, was too obvious. Louis XIV. was a child of thirteen, and the masterful Mademoiselle a great lusty creature of twenty-four.

To write of French History from the time of Louis XIII. onward to the Revolution and not be interesting is almost impossible. But Monsieur Barine's book suffers to an unusual extent by translation. Obscurity of meaning is frequent, the phrasing is not always comprehensible, and the persistence of literal transcriptions from the original results, at times, in the conveyance, not of the same, but of a somewhat divergent impression. "Louis XIII. was of a nature dry and hard," is a foreign way of making a sentence. The following also is scarcely translated into easy English: "A fine consolation truly? it clothed and fed the children, it brought back the dead, to maintain a camp of tinselled merry-makers, among whom nothing be seen but collations of gallantry to women." In spite of confused translation, however, M. Barine's book is full of interesting matter.

The Deserted Village.

THE VILLAGE PROBLEM. By G. F. Millin. (Swan Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.)

NOT for the first time in history has the decay of a hardy peasantry, its country's pride, been lamented by the observer of portents. When the capitalist and the slave turned the free labourer off the soil of Italy it was vaguely felt that the Roman loafer was a poor substitute for the hardy peasant. In England, a century and a half ago, Goldsmith noted and immortalised the deserted village. Then came an interlude, during which we turned our hearts towards the cheap loaf, minding not at all where it was produced or who produced it or what he was paid for producing it. And then he found that the rush to the town and the cheap loaf was even further depopulating the country, filling the towns with the unemployed who had no money even to buy the cheap loaf, and degrading our race. To some it occurred that the Cobdenite doctrine of Free Trade was a good thing then and there when England wanted raw material for its factories and cheap bread for the workers who worked in them. But man shall not live by bread alone, and Free Trade is certainly not a First Principle. More important is the making of men, and after all man is best made by contact with his mother earth, whence all nourishment must ultimately be drawn.

In a series of short and lucid essays Mr. Millin draws up his indictment, gives his verdict, and pronounces sentence. We will put them shortly. The indictment is that while our towns swarm with men who cannot afford to buy the cheap loaf, the villager has to walk miles—in one case eleven—a day to reach his work on another man's land. The verdict is that private ownership of land is an absurdity. You may own your boots, if you made them, or bought them from someone who had paid the maker for them. But you cannot own land, since you did not make it, and have not paid the maker of it. And the sentence is banishment of the town-dweller to the country village, where, as Mr. Millin maintains on the evidence of figures, he can live on the land if only he has common sense.

Mr. Millin's remedy for the slum and the city is the village community, living on its own land, self-supporting, exchanging bread and ideals, meat and manufactures. One can scarcely resist this call to the country, which has been heard and answered by so many that have dwelt in towns, but not by the unemployed and incompetent:—

I have the most unfaltering faith in the attractiveness of God's green earth for human hearts, and in the cultivation of the soil as the healthiest and happiest of all physical labours; and I firmly believe that at no very distant period we shall have a repopulation of the land by a people sharpened and quickened by intercourse with their fellows, made wiser and broader by even their painful experiences of town life, and settled under altogether higher and better conditions than in the past.

It is a delightful ideal, and there are many who seek it, having forsaken the town for the soil. But there are possibilities of deterioration about Mr. Millin's scheme of villages, planted about the country, making their living out of themselves:—

These young communities will not only have their first-rate elementary schools and flourishing churches and chapels, but they will soon be requiring their secondary and technical schools, their public pleasure grounds and local bands, their concert-halls and lecture-rooms.

Works of art, actors, musicians, all will be wanted by the village community. And here we see the dreadful corollary. For the loafer who opens the carriage door of the musician will appear, as the tramp appeared punctually in America to the astonishment of Mr. Henry George. With that our village becomes a city, and the whole weary round of pavement begins again. But even an interval of God's green earth would be welcome.

Finis Coronat Opus.

FRENCH ENGRAVERS AND DRAUGHTSMEN OF THE XVIIITH CENTURY. By Lady Dilke. (Bell. 28s. net.)

IN this spacious and beautiful volume Lady Dilke worthily completes the learned yet lucid series of studies in which the pictorial and decorative art-work of France in the eighteenth century is "resumed," and to a certain extent exhibited. As we turn over pages which recount the sincere and exquisite labours of burin and needle in setting down all kinds of masterpieces graceful and alluring—Moreau's "Les Graces Vengées," Gabriel de Saint-Aubin's "Réunion dans un parc," Drouais' "Mme. du Barry" . . . —it seems well nigh incredible that these things came before the deluge of blood. Perhaps the curiously elaborate culs-de-lampe such as Choffard put into his Ovid (1770), the decorative tangles of Cupids and flowers that gave elegance rather than animation to the pages they honoured, bring out even more strongly than more ambitious illustrations the pathos of this pre-revolution art.

In a series of interesting memoirs incessantly annotated, Lady Dilke gives us a clear notion of the connection between painting and engraving in the country and period of which she treats, and by a number of often excellent reproductions enables her reader to follow her criticism intelligently.

In "Art in the Modern State" she had already dwelt on the inferiority imposed upon the engraver in the French Academy where he was eligible for membership, though he was not permitted to undertake any "ouvrage de peintres." We are not therefore surprised in the volume before us to find men of genius hanging on to the coat-tails of painters with the touching instance of a Mohammedan's wives. Rigaud, for instance, was a kind of Sultan to engravers, and happily so one admits on seeing Pierre-Imbert Drevet's extraordinary translation of Rigaud's Bossuet in the grand and voluminous robe which seems, by its splendid superfluity, to announce that rhetoric is incarnate.

There is plenty of interesting human nature revealed in these pages. Poor, uninspired, but heroic Abbé de Saint Non, who engulfed his fortune in a "Voyage pittoresque de Naples et dans les Deux Siciles," in which he allowed his own hand to figure merely in "the simpler ornaments" used as tail-pieces—one can fancy the poet of the "Parleys with Certain People" finding in him the inspiration for a monologue probing into the ruin which is sometimes finer than reward. Wille—"phlegmatique buriniste allemand"—seems more the satirist's mark than the poet's, as he writes on the day of Louis Capet's execution that, "toujours incommodé," he was unable to leave his house, but saw the procession pass by it. Le Bas, enraged because Mme. de Pompadour sends to him for his bill as though he were an "apothecary," though apparently without desiring to show contempt for either apothecaries or engravers, offers the moralist an example of the artistic sensitiveness which has spared less illustrious mortals than Madame the trouble of paying the artist at all. Diderot accused Le Bas of dealing the death-blow to good engraving, but that remark is a reflection on his conscientiousness, not his talents. "Almost all the best-known engravers of 'estampes galantes' and of illustrations for books were pupils of Le Bas or of men who had worked for him," says Lady Dilke.

The subjects for the book-engraving of her period were apt to be dull. It was the practice to decorate "thèses" with engravings, and it was perhaps a sense of the otioseness of the latter in this connection which betrayed Voltaire into an ill-tempered diatribe against book-illustration. Still one cannot look at the work done in La Fontaine, Molière, Shakespeare, Rousseau, by the association of Lancret and De Larmessin, Boucher and Laurent Cars, Hayman and Gravelot, Moreau-le-jeune and Le Mire, without seeing that great literature owed eighteenth century French art a considerable debt. For the first sight of apt illustrations to a work so well known that it has grown faded in its longevity, like a wreath of immortelles in a churchyard, has the effect of reviving an extinct interest. It is more potent than a "new reading."

RELIGION FOR ALL MANKIND. By Rev. Charles Voysey. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE work of Mr. Voysey and the Theistic Church is well known, or at least in some sense familiar to those who take any account of spiritual matters outside the ring-fence of their own belief. In this volume Mr. Voysey sets forth the basis of his faith, a basis which he claims to be founded "on facts which are never in dispute." In his preface Mr. Voysey says:—

The following pages are written for the help and comfort of all my fellowmen, and chiefly for those who have doubted and discarded the Christian Religion, and in consequence have become Agnostics and Pessimists . . .

My object is to bring proofs of the Wisdom and Righteousness and Love of God in those events and experiences which are commonly called "evils." It is not possible to explain everything, but it is possible to explain by far the greater part.

No reader, of whatever faith or lack of faith, can fail to sympathise with Mr. Voysey's object and his earnestness of purpose. To those who have "discarded the Christian Religion" much that he has to say will no doubt appeal, and very properly appeal. But as a gospel preached to those who have accepted, even though without any vital thought, what is called revealed religion, Mr. Voysey's evangel will hardly count. We cannot enter here into the illogicalities into which Mr. Voysey's belief leads him, illogicalities to certain types of mind as bewildering as the miracles are to other types. Indeed, we can hardly do more than repeat the old truth that men believe only what they can believe. To such a mind as Sir Thomas Browne's no miracle was too marvellous for acceptance; he desired even greater tests for his belief, so that he might give the utmost of his allegiance to the God whom he served. There are thousands of such men to-day, men to whom faith is the breath of life. To such men the doctrine of the Incarnation is as simple as the rule of three; it is part of a kind of divine evolution. And the appeal of it is so profound, so poignant, so linked with the highest human analogies, that it touches every phase of existence. But Mr. Voysey has his place as all honest belief must have its place.

PENAL SERVITUDE. By W. B. N. (Heinemann.)

LORD WILLIAM NEVILL'S book has some interest as a personal document, but it is in no way striking. The author's point of view is uninspired and entirely ordinary; it might, perhaps, be urged with some justice that that is the point of view which such a book demands. Yet something more is needed to carry to anything like real success a volume dealing with so difficult a subject. For facts we can go to blue books, and Lord William Nevill after all gives us little more than facts. The book, too, strikes us as unsympathetic; personally we consider the opening chapters not in the best of taste, and particularly certain references to Mr. Justice Lawrence. On the whole, the general impression left upon the reader is one of satisfaction that such a difficult part of our administration is so well conducted. Lord William Nevill in the main speaks highly of the prison staffs, and particularly of the medical staffs. Here and there we have the wrong man in the wrong place, but the wonder to us is that so trying a calling as any form of prison administration should gather about itself so many men to whom one would have supposed a less restricted calling would have made a stronger appeal. It is most fortunate, of course, that this is so—we mention the fact merely as an interesting human point.

The question of food in convict prisons is always one which receives considerable criticism, naturally and rightly.

Even the existing dietary is far from being even approximately sound, and Lord William Nevill gives specific instances in which absolutely uneatable food was served to prisoners. Those responsible, we are told, were severely reprimanded; we suggest that the only proper punishment would be instant dismissal. There can be no possible excuse for any such lapses of perfectly simple duty.

SONGS FROM THE NOVELS OF THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK. (Brimley Johnson. 2s. 6d. net.)

A COLLECTION of the songs scattered through Peacock's novels has long been desired. The editor of the present volume only echoes a frequently expressed opinion in saying that "they have been admitted pre-eminent in their kind." He adds: "It is seldom that Peacock descends in this work to the commonplace, and few omissions have been required to maintain the standard of excellence." Well, here, at any rate, we have the desired collection; and each man may form his own judgment. For ourselves, we wish we could echo the editorial opinion just quoted. Frankly, the impression made on us is one of disappointment. We by no means feel that Peacock never reaches the commonplace. Some of the "Drinking-Songs," for example, which have long been well known (as the editor also says), are good specimens of their kind, of the song that is meant for singing in jolly company rather than for reading. And the excellence of such songs is that, while they express familiar and universal sentiments in plain and open fashion, they just clear the top-bar of commonplace. But other nations have drinking-songs which are admirable reading no less than admirable singing. We would sooner have one stave of Walter de Mapes' inspired Latin joviality than a hogshead of Peacock's verses; and even in English, old Bishop still is worth a dozen of him. We feel that he is working on an old pattern well, but not inspiredly. And incomparably the best drinking-song he wrote is not among the drinking-songs—"Old Care." It is among the "Glees and Catches." These same are right gleeful and catchy things to sing; but they want to be sung. As verse for reading, they do not appeal to us as first rate. Of the Robin Hood poems, the first is excellent; the second, despite its "go," would hardly be noted in the work of a living poet. The "War Song of Dinas Vawr" is well known and good: is it supremely good? If all were on a level with two of its stanzas, it would be. Is it equal, for example, to the "Massacre of the Macpherson"? And when Peacock is serious, it seems to us he never gets above mediocrity—sometimes good mediocrity. In fine, the collection was worth making, and if your expectation is not strung too high, will not disappoint you. If we are disappointed, the modern sin of unsifted praise has something to answer for it.

THE SEA-BOARD OF MENDIP. By Francis A. Knight. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS would certainly have been reckoned by Lamb among his biblia a-biblia; and undoubtedly it is not a book for the seeker of entertainment or yet for the literary epicure. Nevertheless it is a book for which the author deserves thanks; one of those careful and laborious accounts of Old English parishes which few are disinterested and zealous enough to undertake. The parishes which it comprises, some ten in number, constitute (as the author says) "one of the most interesting corners of one of the most interesting counties in England"; and of them and their sea-board he has given a most thorough and painstaking description, alike historically and archaeologically. To this he has added an account of their flora and fauna, the whole being illustrated. Even for the reader to whom such dry-as-dust records do not appeal, the book is not without its occasional interest; as, for instance, the description of the ancient British "camp" or fortification at Worleburg, Weston-super-Mare; with its pits containing the hewn and cloven skeletons of the Iberian British defenders, flung there (probably) by the Romans who had stormed the place, and fired the huts built over the store-pits. But its main interest is for the student of local history and archæology; and to him this very thorough book may be warmly commended.

Mr. Gambier Bolton's admirable photographs of animals are known to most people, and in "A Book of Beasts and Birds" (Newnes) we have an interesting collection of his illustrations, together with a succinct text by the same hand. The book is popular, and not over technical, but the photographs are necessarily its chief attraction. Many strike us as being as good as they could be; the creatures have been caught in characteristic attitudes, and many at most happy moments. Anyone who has seen a baboon yawn, will be glad to have Mr. Bolton's picture of that extraordinary contortion.

The Royal Yacht Squadron has found its historians in Mr. Montague Guest (the Squadron's Librarian), and Mr. W. B. Boulton. The handsome volume before us (Murray), contains memorials of the Squadron's members, together with "an Enquiry into the History of Yachting and its development in the Solent; and a complete list of Members with their yachts from the foundation of the Club to the present time from the Official Records." The book is fully and admirably illustrated, and has for frontispiece a photogravure reproduction of Turner's "Royal Yacht Squadron Regatta." The volume is dedicated to the King, who is Admiral of the Squadron.

The twelfth volume of "Country Life" is well up to the level of its predecessors, which, in point of illustration, is saying a good deal. The journal touches upon most phases of country life, particularly in the way of houses, gardens, and sport. Many of the illustrations are remarkably good, and in all cases the reproduction is excellent. What we rather miss is the simplicity of the country: to turn over these pages is to be a little too much impressed with sumptuousness and wealth.

In "Shakespeare's Church" (Unwin), by Mr. T. Harvey Bloom, we have an Architectural and Ecclesiastical History of the fabric and ornaments of the Collegiate Church of the Holy Trinity of Stratford-upon-Avon. The book is full of interesting detail, and the monuments in the church are very fully described. There is also a list of inscriptions on the tombs in the churchyard. The volume is adequately illustrated from photographs.

NEW EDITIONS: The latest volume in the "Arden Shakespeare" (Methuen) is "Othello." Mr. H. C. Hart appears to have done his work of editing with great care. In a forty-four page introduction the various early editions are commented on and compared, and a general estimate of the play is attempted. "To my thinking," says Mr. Hart, "Othello" is the most perfect play that Shakespeare wrote. The central interests are more absorbing and continuously in evidence than elsewhere."—In the "World's Classics" (Richards) we have Thackeray's "Esmond" and Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter." These admirable cheap reissues, without introductions and notes of any kind, are, within their limits, all that could be desired.—"The Enemies of Books" (Stock), by William Blades, has been issued in a revised and enlarged form in the "Book Lover's Library." The volume has one page of illustrations, showing the anobium and the weird "image of Bookworm as it is graven in the 'Micrographia' of R. Hooke. . . . London, 1665."

Fiction.

THE GATES OF WRATH. By Arnold Bennett. (Chatto. 3s. 6d.)

"'The Gates of Wrath,'" Mr. Bennett tells us in a note, "was published serially before the issue of 'The Grand Babylon Hotel,' or of 'Anna of the Five Towns.'" The story is described as a melodrama, and melodrama it is; sometimes it is so overcoloured as to border upon farce, but here and there it touches a deeper note and approaches reality. As a mere sensational novel, indeed, the book is well enough, but it is not much better than many others of its kind; perhaps Mr. Bennett manages his material rather more artistically than is usual in such work, but the result is not distinguished; also, the tone is not consistent. Sometimes the author appears to be parodying the crudities of the sensation-monger; we come across the familiar phrasing, the copious externals of description. Who does not know this lovely wicked woman?

Then perhaps you would examine that oval face, neither dark nor fair, but something between the two, with its pearl-shaped hazel eyes, the marvellous profile of the Grecian nose, the exquisite firm mouth, with rich red lips, rather thin and compressed, the chin a miracle of fine curves, the rounded rose-leaf cheeks, unmarred by any cosmetic, the high, clear-white forehead, the little half-hidden ears—you would examine all this, and wonder at it and enjoy it.

As for the story itself, it concerns incredible villainy, a vast fortune, plot and counter-plot, and a monomaniac. Everything is neatly pieced together, and everything goes the way of pure melodrama. But, since it comes from Mr. Bennett, it is disappointing melodrama. There is no reason in the world why the author of "Anna of the Five Towns" should not write melodrama, but we feel that it should be better than this. There is not a touch of romance in the book, and romance is just what was needed to carry it off. Stevenson's "The Dynamiters" is melodramatic enough in all conscience, but it is also full of the romance of which he had the secret. He was able to invest the grotesque with an air of quite human interest, almost of probability; and his people were alive. Mr. Bennett's people are not alive, which reduces "The Gates of Wrath" to a level below that at which we feel the author's work should stand.

Is it possible for a novelist successfully to serve two masters—to give his best to a public which wants his best and to write down to a public which takes no account of the best? In the case of a serious novelist, a man who has a true and virile artistic sense, we doubt it. Yet experiments are always interesting, and Mr. Bennett is fond of experiments. On the result of this particular one, however, we cannot offer him more than very qualified congratulations.

THE LIVING BUDDHA. By Roy Horniman. (Unwin. 6s.)

THAT which in this melodramatic volume matches the fervid red of its covers is not its most remarkable feature. The author, while possessing a distinctly old-fashioned fondness for coincidence and lime-light, shows considerable power of entering sympathetically into the life and thought of a foreign civilisation. The civilisation is Chinese, and opposed to the evangelical work of the hero's stepfather. One is interested to find, however, that Mr. Horniman's missionary sympathises with Buddhism, and is disposed to regard its teaching as sufficient for the citizens of Tsang-Lo. The friendly tolerant note also characterises some excellent sketches of Chinese officials—the young Mandarin on whom the Fuchsia League leave their floral symbol of death, and Cheng, the banished statesman, who opens conversation with "the Divine Confucius" instead of with the weather. The hero is a woman's ideal—the abbot of a lamasery, with blue eyes that burn and heal. Although he does not know it, he is an Englishman kidnapped in infancy during the Mutiny, when he lost a thumb and came to be mistaken for a lama whose reappearance without one of these members was piously looked for. A conventional novelist would have converted the abbot and married him to the pretty girl who perturbs his asceticism. Attava would have resumed himself in Jack. "The regimental button that hung round his neck" would have persuaded him of his British heritage; he would have swallowed his Buddhism at one or two honest gulps. But Mr. Horniman has his own method, and in spite of some side-slips—if the motorists will still allow critics the use of the term—he achieves a dignified close to a novel which suggests that its author might have made an even more entertaining volume of travel.

FUGITIVE ANNE. By Mrs. Campbell Praed. (John Long, 6s.)

DESCRIBED as a romance and dealing with men and women in their pre-historic innocence. And probably no knight was ever so miraculously chivalrous, and no distressed maid so trusting as the two central figures who wander through the unexplored bush, the one with her body painted black and the other in patch-work garments. If this story faithfully represents the marriage laws of the Australian Commonwealth, and if it be really true that the unhappy wife must resort to such expedients in order to escape the persecutions of a husband, then it must be reasonable to suppose that the bush is full of such fair ladies.

Perhaps it was considerations of this kind that induced Prof. Eric Hansen to enter upon a scientific expedition into the interior of Australia, combining his discoveries of matter with observations of woman in the primitive state. Be that as it may, the fugitive Anne, disguised as suggested and pursued by a relentless husband, meets by chance in the Australian bush the handsome Danish explorer. Their adventures are more or less unique, chaste, but thrilling; there is much talker talker in a language which the intelligent reader will recognise as aboriginal; there are meetings with Red Men, and partings from cannibals; but how the fugitive wife becomes a baroness and a goddess, and is only saved from figuring on a dusky menu by an earthquake and an epilogue: these are things which must be read to be appreciated.

Mrs. Campbell Praed is skilled in rhetorical flourish and has taken immense trouble in elaborating the groundwork and detail of her story.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A HUMBLE LOVER. By MISS BERTRAM-EDWARDS.

An East-Anglian story, opening with roast pork and a slight disagreement between a rector and his curate. But we soon get to the love story, which is very prettily played out between William, the plain, and Cosset, the beautiful. "You will never, never leave me?" said William, as Cosset turned to go. "Leave you!" she cried, her voice almost reproachful in its self-assertion; "I could not if I would!" The story has pleasant, humorous passages. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

THE MAGIC OF TO-MORROW. By CYRIL SEYMOUR.

"Being the strange true story of one who claimed foreknowledge of the day that never comes." A cyclist attacked by highwaymen is succoured by one, Azrael Deville, a retired doctor of medicine. With this gentleman the cyclist makes a compact, and after he had retired to rest the Doctor "approached the lamp, turned it down, and blew out the light. 'At last,' he whispered to himself in the darkness—'at last I have found my fool! What shall I make of him?'" That is the story. (Chatto and Windus.)

THE RED HOUSE.

By E. NESBIT.

"Conventionally, our life-story ended in a shower of rice at the church door, amid the scent of white flowers all about us." But the real story begins six months after, with a quarrel over a shaving brush and Chloe's handkerchief case. A little later comes the Red House, with the many quaint things which happened there. The book mingles fun and sentiment with grace and ease. The conclusion of the whole matter is a baby in a cradle. (Methuen. 6s.)

AUNT BETHIA'S BUTTON.

By JOHN RANDAL.

The button was a pink Balas ruby, and there was much excitement over it. At Gwynneth's wedding, however, it completed the set of three on the bride's dress. There are soldiers and parsons and an orphanage in the story, which moves briskly to its ending by a "rice-strewn porch." "All indeed concerned were the happier for the union of two tender loyal hearts, with the exception of Miss Meddlcott, whose orphanage has been reconstructed upon new lines, which makes the superintendent answerable to a ladies' committee, the head of which is to be the rector's wife." (Methuen. 6s.)

THE GLITTERING ROAD.

By W. A. MACKENZIE.

Concerning the island of Palmetto and how it regained its freedom. A vigorous and melodramatic story, ending with the death of the chief actor. "The organ pealed . . . And then, through a lane of the men of Palmetto holding torches, a lane miles long, went Hector Chisholm Grant to his rest on the highest peak of the Monte, a rare and most royal progress." These lines are amongst those which stand for motto to the book:—

I and Thou, my weary heart,
We will choose the better part,
We will up and take our load
Out upon the Glittering Road.

THE STEEPLE.

By REGINALD TURNER.

A story, sincerely written but not very convincing, of the varieties of religious experience. At the end of the book we read this concerning one of the characters: "There are two traditions: one is, that he is living a simple Mormon life in Salt Lake City; the other, and more generally believed, that he holds a high position in Thibet." Another of the characters was the author of "The Steeple—a Plea for a Larger Church. By a Larger Churchman. Popular edition. Price sixpence." But the Bishop, "handsome still and venerable . . . knows it will have no sale, even at that price." (Greening.)

THE WORLD MASTERS.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

A story of cosmopolitan plotting and adventure, with picturesque, but improbable, incidents such as a pitched battle between two armed private yachts in mid-Atlantic. It opens on the Kaiser's birthday in the reception rooms of the German Embassy on the Nevski Prospekt. "Precisely at half-past [ten] a sleigh drawn by three perfectly black Orloff horses swept into the courtyard, and a few minutes later the major-domo passed through the open folding-doors and said, in loud but well-trained tones: 'His Highness the Prince de Condé, Duc de Montpensier! Mademoiselle la Marquise de Montpensier!' The announcement of the once most noble names in Europe instantly hushed the hum of conversation, and all eyes were turned towards the doorway." (John Long.)

The Continuity of London.

WITH what strength and faith does London bear the load of two milleniums on her back! London, Londinium, Augusta, Caer Lud, Troynovant—her very names search the caverns of Time and ring back echoes as of hosts that cannot be mustered. Yet to-night the murmur of her wheels, the sighing of her sleeping children, do but transmit to another day the sounds that have linked these names in a symphony of greatness. From centuries of tumult that drug the ear, one turns to Nature to learn endurance of this vast persistence of men. One turns to that River in whose slime the coins of Commodus and the bric-a-brac of colonial Rome are the accretions of yesterday; whose waves, lapping on stone pier and wooden wharf, slewing the barges with every tide, remember between their artificial shores the howl of wolves and the sea-eagle's bitter scream. Still, at night, the police boats must prowl the low banks, closing the tide-gates without which Lambeth and Battersea would drown. Still, the Redriff waterman grows old and weather-bitten at his simple trade. Still, in winter, men shun the river, the sea-gulls return to it. And still as the image of St. Paul's fades from the ruffling stream, the watcher is forewarned of a time when not the mirror but the temple shall be broken, and silence resume her reign with the smile of a goddess that stumbled.

He who runs may read the age of London, but he who reads it in books may run the faster. In Mr. Lethaby's "London Before the Conquest" (Macmillan) you see a scholar's evocation of London's youth, watch his solitaire-play with dates, and listen to his talk as with groping finger he maps the dubious past. What if Besant is brushed aside, and Stow is challenged in his City tomb; what if Stukeley be accused of conjecture, and Loftie of building "a castrum in the air"; what if J. R. Green is sent to school to Roach Smith, and dates and footnotes and capitals vex the lay eye: nothing can belittle or dehumanise this epic past of London.

Indeed a quiet eloquence creeps into Mr. Lethaby's pages, and once at least he performs an eerie dance over the grave of a London which he despairs of re-waking: "For me the old British Solar God lights up the squalor of Billingsgate. The Sea God, Lud, and the brazen horse give more pleasure than the railway bridge at Ludgate. Caesar's sword at Bishopsgate and the head of Bran buried on Tower Hill are real City assets. London is rich in romantic lore. In her cathedral Arthur was crowned and drew the sword from the stone. Here Iseult attended a council called by King Mark. From the quay Ursula and her virgins embarked; Launcelot swam his horse over the river at Westminster, and from it Guinevere went a-maying." And yet the railway bridge at Ludgate is a mouldering antiquity to those who, like Mr. Wells, like all whose imaginations have taken a new flame from science, can look forward, and then backward.

To live in London is to capture the curve of human destiny. For the more we turn the pages of her story the more does the sense of change become the sense of continuity. "A great burh, Lundanaborg, which is the greatest and most famous of all burhs in the northern lands," croons a saga-man, and to-day the vastness of London is not only a fact, but a burden. Her strength and faith are not shaken, but her grace is gone for a season. Once more she must shed worn-out tissues if she is to recover civic ecstasy. Not since 1666 has the weary Titan been so weary. Then her burnt-sacrifice availed, and the fields fled before her. Then she was too much centre, now she is too much circumference. Then her breath was bad, now her nerves are shaken. An enormous adjustment is in progress, but it is an adjustment that could be matched again and again in her unbroken history. Mr. Lethaby contends that Green was wrong in his view that Saxon London "grew up on ground from which the Roman city had practically disappeared." If no such break occurred, then the only challenge of London's continuity for 2,000 years is silenced. Mr. Lethaby's view is that the Saxons still maintained the Roman houses and streets. "Here a Roman mansion with its mosaic floors would still be inhabited. There a portico would be patched with gathered bricks and covered with shingles, while by its side stood a house of wattle and daub. Here was a Roman basilican church, while in another place would be found one of timber and thatch. . . . Daubers and mudwallers were much in request right through the Middle Age." And if we begin with the present and try back, the same continuity, the same meeting of remote ends, haunts the enterprise. Roman London may be faintly seen in the ordinary aspect of the City streets. In a passage of singular interest Mr. Lethaby says: "A succession of fires slowly raising the surface with layers of debris, gradual encroachments, and the obliteration of open spaces, have modified the old lines in some cases considerably, but still it is certain, I believe, that the general 'squareness' and more or less symmetrical alignment of the Roman city can be traced in the existing streets. A line from the bridge to the north gate must always have formed a great main street, and standing at the bottom of Bridge Street (Fish Street Hill) we may still gain some idea of what the entrance to the City by the Roman bridge was like." So that for nearly two thousand years the wheels have kept that orbit.

There cannot be a doubt that the Roman street system was carried on by the Saxons; and we know that Wren's plans for remodelling the streets after the Great Fire were rejected: hence London remains a vast palimpsest upon which no student can pore without wonder as the unity of the past and present comes slowly into view. You learn to dismiss all strangeness from her story, and to think of it as connected and inevitable romance of progression. Do you stop on London Bridge to watch the oranges passing on a chain of human backs from boat to wharf? Even as your eye runs up the vast funnels of the steamer it alights also on the two primitive eel-boats from Holland that are ever lying off Billingsgate, and already the present and the past are mingled. Up the river comes the whole scent and rumour of the immemorial haven. You think of the eighteenth century sailors sleeping down there in Rotherhithe's leafy churchyard; you think of the Merchant Adventurers and that gallant flotilla which carried Sir Hugh Willoughby, amid flags and cannonades, to "discover regions, dominions, islands, and places unknown"; you think of Chaucer and Whittington; and still the perspective of mast and flag fades away into pictures like this: "dromonds from the Mediterranean, long ships and round ships from the north, and slavers from Rouen and Dublin, with many a splendid war dragon like Olaf Tryggvison's—'Forward on it was a dragon's head, but afterwards a crook fashioned in the end as the tail of a dragon; but either side of the neck and all the stern was overlaid with gold. That ship the King called the Worm, because when the sail was aloft then should that be as the wings of the dragon." On the river, as in the streets, we see no disconnected phenomenon, but only the head of an unbroken pageant.

In nearer ways one sees how all the Londons have overlapped. Two hundred years ago men built big square brick houses with wainscotted rooms in which to live a spacious citizen life. To-day these houses are to be found everywhere, in Bloomsbury, in Westminster, in Chelsea, but they are survivals which the time hardly tolerates. They are pulled down when the chance offers, and in their place rises the twentieth-century block of flats in which family is piled on family. It is said that thousands are willingly exchanging house-life in the suburbs for flat-life in the centre. London is too big for comfort; its distances are intolerable to a generation that has succeeded to a county of houses and is asked to find its own locomotion. Thus the old conditions are tending to return, as the palaces, in a new form, are returning to the Strand. London's increase has been horizontal; but it is becoming vertical. We descend to an incredible depth in the clay and gravel to be shot like pellets through a tube in evasion of the press above. We step into a cage and are hoisted from the business level into the dizzy comfort of a fifth floor rather than accept the morning and evening journey to suburbs which have no finality and little charm. The time consumed by the Londoner in going forth to his labour and returning from it in the evening is preposterous.

Already barbarism has begun to reappear, as it always must where there is any considerable violation of comfort. The platform fights on the Underground are a sorry spectacle, and to see a City clerk plant his muddled heel on the handle of a carriage door to keep out supernumerary passengers is to begin the day with a sense of the brutality of the struggle. It is possible to doubt whether London has not, in fact, over-reached herself; whether all that science can do to make locomotion easy over her network of streets must not fall short of reasonable requirements. The "flat" system is the interim answer, and though it may seem a sordid and banal subject it is the system of living which twentieth-century London is inclined to adopt: a thousand years hence historians will describe it. So determined are people to escape transportation to remote suburbs that they will live anywhere, will endure anything, to be housed in the centre. Therefore they rent flats at £100 to £400 a year into which sunshine hardly penetrates. Therefore they will look out on dead walls and unspeakable abysses of brick and dust-shoots if only they may live in the centre. And what we really witness is the enormous breathing and uneasy movements of the London whose life has been continuous for a thousand years and another thousand years. Mr. Lethaby tells us that the Roman level in Thames Street was found at 20 to 25 feet below the modern surface. The tower from which Bow Bells are rung rests on a Roman causeway, and if, as is proposed, London seeks her water from beneath instead of from afar she will bore for it through her own grave.

Endowed with the impulse but not with the genius to grow, London is ever perplexed, ever disunited, and still as her irresistible strength prevails over obstacles she corrects the pride of her citizens by taxing their patience. Yet even their pride may suggest to Londoners the folly of fretting in a City whose reputed founder, Brutus, was the grandson of Aeneas and therefore a descendant of Zeus. We have spoken of two milleniums, but the boldest breed of chroniclers speak of a third, during which London was ruled by seventy-two kings of the Trojan race—"besides some others whose short and insignificant Raignes have left them buried in oblivion."

Art on the Dissecting-Table.

It would be easy enough to laugh at Mr. Stanley Lee's "Lost Art of Reading," published by Messrs. Putnam's Sons. It is too large, and has faults of style. Yet he has something to say; and he is very much in earnest about it. Not anything very original, indeed—it has all, we doubt, been said before; but it is stuff which bears being said often, and nowadays cries to be said often, until, haply, it may even be listened to. Take this (of Boswell) as a sample of his utterances:—

To book-labourers, college-employees, analysis-hands of whatever kind, his book is a standing notice that the prerogative of being immortal is granted by men even to a fool, if he has the grace not to know it. For that matter, even if the fool knows he is a fool, if he cares more about his subject than he cares about not letting any one else know it, he is never forgotten. The world cannot afford to leave such a fool out.

As this passage implies, Mr. Lee is largely concerned to protest against the dominance of cold analysis in modern teaching and writing about literature. You cannot teach boys or youths to understand artistic literature by teaching them callously to anatomise it. Yet that method is tyrannous in America, as publication after publication shows us. Nor in America alone. Mr. Lee cites the astounding contribution to a literary journal from a Head of Department in Chicago University, who (having previously in the same journal rewritten the "Ode to a Grecian Urn") animadverted on the "Ode to a Nightingale." This, it seems, was not worth rewriting. "There is almost nothing in it that properly belongs to the subject treated. The faults of the 'Grecian Urn' are such as the poet himself, under wise criticism, might easily have removed. The faults of the 'Nightingale' are such that they cannot be removed. They inhere in the idea and structure." Mr. Lee proceeds:—

The Head of the Department dwells at length upon the "hopeless fortune of the poem," expressing his regret that it can never be retrieved. After duly analysing what he considers the poem's leading thought, he regrets that a poet like John Keats should go so far, apropos of a nightingale, as to sigh in his immortal stanzas "for something which, whatever it may be, is nothing short of a dead drunk."

The Chicago wonder quotes:—

Still wouldst thou sing and I have ears in vain,
To thy high requiem become a clod.

After analysing these lines, he goes on to comment:—

What the fitness is, or what the poetic or other effectiveness of suggesting that the corpse of a person who has ceased upon the midnight still has ears, only to add that it has them in vain, I cannot pretend to understand.

That corpses have ears (by the way) should not be a surprising revelation even to such a Head of a Department. For the close of the "Urn":—

To whom thou say'st,
"Beauty is truth, truth beauty"—that is all Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know;

this wooden Head suggested:—

Preaching this wisdom with thy cheerful mien:
Possessing beauty thou possessest all;
Pause at that goal, nor further push thy quest.

For giving further publicity to this egregious "criticism," Mr. Lee assigns the good reason:—

When we find that a mind like this has been placed at the head of a Department of Poetry in a great, representative American university, the last thing that should be done with it is to cover it up. The more people know where the analytical mind is to-day—where it is getting to be—and the more they think what its being there means, the better.

"If Shakespeare came to Chicago" is the title of the chapter in which this occurs. It drives home the lesson that Shakespeare did not become Shakespeare by analysis, and cannot be taught by analysis (though analysis has its use in studying him). What was written with passion cannot be understood or taught without passion, is Mr. Lee's true and necessary message to Americans. That is but a section of what he has to say; but it will suffice as a proof and specimen of the usefulness in this volume. "A bare and trivial book stops with what it says itself. A great book depends now and for ever on what it makes a man say back," he says; and he protests against the teaching in crowds, with its machine-turned product, its suppression of individuality. Reader and writer must learn to "let themselves go." Yet it is assumed that "a little man (that is, a man incapable of great passion) who is not even able to read a book with a great passion in it, can somehow teach other people to read it." It is true that teaching and reading are perishing of over-analysis, that synthetic power grows rarer and rarer. The reader (as Mr. Lee in effect says) who analyses a work of art to learn how to enjoy it, is like a lad who takes his piano to pieces to learn how to play it. He exactly reverses the natural process. Yet so are boys "taught" Shakespeare, with the certain result of never being able to enjoy him. For these and other protests Mr. Lee deserves thanks.

Anatole France on Childhood.

A PORTRAIT of Anatole France represents him in his study, surrounded with richly bound books, holding in his hand and fondly looking at a little statuette, a frail masterpiece of Greek workmanship. There is no better definition of his mind and work, so redolent they are of scholarly culture and artistic refinement. Is it not paradoxical that a writer who seems to stand so far from unadorned nature should have written charming pages on childhood? The psychology of children is not something you learn in college. It is the most unclassical, unliterary thing in the world. But Anatole France, for all his amusing pedantry, is no common bookworm. Were it merely as a lover of books, he knows what a wonderful, invaluable manuscript the soul of a child is. Is not the history of our own origins written there?

"My Friend's Book" ("Le Livre de mon Ami") is supposed to be the work of the author's imaginary friend, Pierre Nozière. Pierre Nozière is very much like Anatole France, and the recollections of his boyish days will explain to us much of France's own mind. He was born "in a fine, somewhat decayed old house . . . facing the Louvre and Tuilleries, close to the Palais-Mazarin, on the embankment of that glorious river, which runs between the towers, turrets and spires of old Paris." Is it possible, he asks, that one should be quite dull and vulgar-minded after being brought up there? His father, who was an anthropologist, had his house crammed with a lot of strange things, "racks of savages' arms, pirogues with their paddles, hanging side by side with stuffed alligators . . . and any number of little skeletons which, I thought, had a most spiteful and malicious look." When he went out for a walk he saw bookstalls and curiosity shops "filled with the most beautiful shapes of art and the most interesting relics of the past." He stared at old prints, or admired a rusty helmet, and the world, past and present, made its first appearance to him through an antiquarian's window. Such surroundings were bound to work upon the boy's imagination. He dreamt at night of the goblins he had seen in Callot's quaint etchings. He longed after distant lands. After gazing at two chinaware magots, which were perpetually shaking their heads and lolling their tongues, he resolved on going to China. "The difficult point was how to be taken there by my nurse. I was positive that China was lying somewhere beyond the Arc de Triomphe. But I never contrived to push on so far."

The swarming of fanciful notions in a child's head, his life in a world of his own, are made the subject of delightful chapters: still more delightful perhaps are those which describe the exquisite delicacy of his feelings. There are a few pages on Pierre Nozière's mother, which are equal to anything. She was a sweet, charming soul, with "the heavenly patience and joyful simplicity which belong to those who have no business in the world but love." What she taught her little boy, it is easier to feel than to explain. She taught him what makes life truly worth living: she gave him immaterial treasures, more valuable than silver and gold. "One day, in the small parlour, she laid aside her embroidery work, and lifted me up in her arms; then, showing me one of the flowers on the wall, she said to me: I give you this rose. And, to make it easily known, she stamped a cross on it with her bodkin. Never did any present make me so happy."

When a boy is six or seven, the interesting chapter of vocations begins. Most boys want to become soldiers or omnibus drivers. But Pierre Nozière was no ordinary boy. As his mother often read to him legends out of the "Lives of the Saints," he thought of gratifying his inordinate yearning for glory by becoming a saint. The tale of his endeavours after holy life is a most entertaining one. He began by refusing to take his breakfast. Then he thought of rivalling St. Simeon Stylites. "I climbed up the small cistern in the kitchen, but I couldn't settle there, for I was quickly ousted by Julie, the cook." His next model was St. Nicholas of Patras, who distributed his wealth among the poor: he threw out of the window some new pennies, his marbles and his top; but his father simply shut the window and called him a stupid boy. Other misadventures followed: he was flogged for tearing open an old armchair in order to make himself a hair-shirt. His conclusion was that "it is very hard to practise holiness when living with one's family," and that the great hermit saints were right when they went to the desert. He thought of building a hut in the Zoo, which, in his opinion, was no less than the Earthly Paradise, where all creatures lived together in peace.

The story of his schooldays has not much in common with that of the average Eton boy. There is little opportunity for games and romps in it. His most wicked pastimes were the rearing of caterpillars in his desk, or the tricks he played with his chum Fontanet's cap. He formed, with the said Fontanet, all sorts of schemes: they tried to manufacture swords and shields "with pasteboard, and pieces of the silver paper in which chocolate is wrapped." They intended to write a History of France "with all the details," in fifty volumes. They swore a feud against some tedious school books, and agreed, in case they should be used in the next form, "to enlist as cabin-boys on board a large ship." Pupils and teachers have given Anatole France fine opportunities of displaying his particular kind of humour, which cannot be compared save with that of Heinrich Heine. It is something very enjoyable, but it cannot be easily defined: just a touch of mockery, without any bitterness in it, something very light and exquisite, which will not make you roar, but just smile.

To his own recollections Pierre Nozière adds a few stories of his baby-girl Suzanne and her little friends. Shall I call them stories? They are rather philosophical essays—the most humorous philosophy you ever heard of. For instance, Guignol, the French Punch, is to Pierre Nozière the subject of deep reflections, which are amusingly contrasted with the little girl's more ingenuous views. A dreadful battle takes place between Guignol and Old Nick: Old Nick is killed. Nozière thinks it is rather a pity.

The Evil One being dead, good-bye to sin! Perhaps Beauty, Sin's ally, will have to go. Perhaps we shall see no more the flowers that intoxicate and the eyes that bewitch and kill. Then what shall become of us in this world? Will it be even possible for us to be virtuous? It is very doubtful. Guignol did not sufficiently bear in mind that Evil is the necessary counterpart of Good, as the shade is that of the light; that virtue does wholly consist of effort and struggle, and that, if there is no more Devil to fight against, the Elect will remain as idle as the sinners themselves. Life will be mortally dull. I tell you that when he killed Old Nick, Guignol was very unwise indeed.

He is thus musing: but little Suzanne thinks he is sad. She has a notion that people who are thinking must be in trouble.

With gentle pity she takes hold of my hand, and asks me why I am unhappy. I own that I am sorry Guignol has killed Old Nick. Then she puts her little arms round my neck, and, bringing her mouth close to my ear: "I'll tell you sometin: Guignol, he has killed the nigger, but he has not killed him for good."

Some strict Puritans may think that Anatole France's views on the Evil One are most dangerous. I do not pretend to say that "Le Livre de mon Ami" can be a substitute for the "Pilgrim's Progress." But the Attic style, the delicate feeling, and the light humour make it delicious reading. Perhaps the ordinary English reader would not care so much for "M. Bergeret" or "La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque" which are very unconventional and French in the extreme. But "My Friend's Book" would certainly rank among masterpieces in any country—as some of the small statuettes, of which Anatole France is fond, can, by their perfect shape, rival the great works which made the Hellenic chisel famous.

PAUL MANTOUX.

Impressions.

XVIII.—Companions.

THEY were strangers, and because they were strangers, who would pass on the morrow, from that refuge in the hills, their several ways, they talked of intimate things which must not be set down here. But in the end one related an experience that evolved naturally from their confidences; the second did likewise, and the third.

The first, who was a traveller, said: "It's the world outside experience that possesses me when I am alone. Here is my case! As far back as I can remember, a certain figure has appeared to me in my dreams—a man, twice life-size, clothed in skins, which flapped as he moved. I always knew when he was approaching, and he never frightened me. As a child I regarded him as a kind of nurse, later in life as a companion. If the room was dark when I awoke I could see him just the same. Even if my eyes were closed I could see him by means of the light that gleamed behind my eyeballs in those moments. I called him, 'My Old Man of the Woods,' or 'The Beckoner,' for although his arms were still, his eyes seemed always to be calling me away somewhere. He never appeared when I was about to make a journey, only when I was languid, and inclined to stay at home and be comfortable. So vivid did this apparition become in after life that I made a drawing of it. A year ago—I know you will find this hardly credible—I went by invitation to a man's house in Bayswater. He had been stationed at some place in Africa—I think it was Gogo—and he had brought back with him a lot of photographs. He had turned the pictures in his room to the wall and pinned the photographs on their backs. One of them—I saw it the moment I entered the room—was an enlarged photograph of a tribal god. It was exactly like the drawing I had made of my Beckoner. Oh, no, he didn't think it strange!"

The second, who was a philosopher, said: "My most persistent dream has been in the nature of a performance, a happening in which I had no lot, but which had for me a very real significance. The vision was always in two parts. In the foreground were a number of restless figures, clothed in bright colours, and doing all manner of odd and fantastic things. What they were doing I could never quite understand, for my attention was always concentrated on the veiled figure at the back. It was there before the others began: it remained after they had finished, turning, always turning slowly, never tiring, never revolving quicker at one time than another. It was like Eternity—a changeless but constantly moving background to those ever-shifting figures that played their brief games against its continuity. Some time ago, I saw a performance of Arab tumblers and jugglers. Before they began, a curtain was withdrawn from the back of the stage, disclosing a veiled figure turning slowly just like the figure in my dream—unmoved, uninterested, detached, just going on in that endless movement. The jugglers and tumblers finished their performance, that veiled figure continued. And when the curtain fell it was still turning."

The third, who was a writer, said: "Mine has been a presence, a sensation rather than a figure. It has come to me at all times, but never in my sleep. All my life I have longed for it, but the appearances of this shadowy companion have been infrequent. Whatever of good there has been in my work has come from that companionship—brief, sudden, wordless, have been those visits—and gone before I realised that a new idea, or a ray of clearing light has been flashed at me from something that was not myself. So sure have I been of this, that sometimes when a friend has praised a poem or an essay of mine, I have answered: 'I did not do it. Something outside me spoke, and I heard.' As I grew older these communications became kindlier, less disturbing as it were. They do not now generally take the form of ideas: they are rather explanatory, and bring with them a sense of consolation. And the years have brought me this knowledge: that it depends on myself, on the self-discipline of the day or week whether the visits of this companion shall be frequent or infrequent. It is always ready to give, I am not always ready to receive; but this unseen companion is always near—waiting. I am as sure of that as of my own identity."

Drama.

Gallic Salt.

I HAVE an impression that "A Snug Little Kingdom" owes its existence to the success of "Mice and Men," and that Mr. Mark Ambient was impelled to write it by a belief that the London public, wearied alike of psychology and epigram, of cup and dagger romance and of problem plays, was veering round once more to the gentle breezes of mid-Victorian sentimentality. If so, I think he was sanguine. In the present chaos of the drama, the favour of the public appears to be governed by no calculable laws whatever, not even by that rhythm of fashion which undoubtedly affects other forms of literature, but rather by the casual conjunction of blind accidents, amongst which the personal fascination of this or that individual nime is probably the most important. However this may be, the initial conception of "A Snug Little Kingdom"— the title is from that inveterate sentimentalist, Thackeray—is one that might have suggested itself to the late Mr. Robertson or to Mr. Pinero in his salad days, although either writer, it must be added, would have both carpentered and phrased the piece infinitely better. It is familiar enough, the garret up four pair of stairs, in which Bernard Gray, the young musical composer of genius, lives upon bread and butter and bloater paste, pawns his fiddle, ruefully contemplates his empty coal-box, and is indebted for a roof over his head to the “way with him” that conquers the susceptibilities of his much marrying landlady. One of Bernard’s music-hall songs has got, to his huge delight, upon the barrel-organs, but his opera, “The Kingdom of Love,” has been returned to him with a managerial suggestion that it would be much improved by “a sprinkling of Gallic salt,” and Gallic salt is just what Bernard, in the true spirit of a mid-Victorian hero, would sooner die than sprinkle. There is a further complication in Dolly, who lives, almost equally penniless, in the rooms below, and whose informal guardian Bernard has constituted himself since the eventful night when a whisky-party was broken in upon by the intimation that Dolly’s mother was lying upon Dolly’s nightgown to keep it warm, and had left a message for Dolly not to wake her, but that Dolly couldn’t get at the nightgown and that her mother was quite cold. This is the night, seven years ago, that Dolly’s mother died, and they are all rather sad about it. Is it surprising to hear that Dolly’s young affections have fixed themselves upon Bernard, who calls her his “little pal,” and who only discovers that she is not a “little pal” at all, when he learns that his brother Hubert, an extremely fatuous young doctor, wants to marry her? The position is an awkward one, both financially and emotionally. But the deus ex machina is at hand in Mr. Ben Kershaw, of Huddersfield, the inventor and proprietor of Kershaw’s Sauce, a patient of brother Hubert’s, whom he brings to visit the garret. Bernard wins his confidence by telling him, with quite uncalled-for insolence as I thought, that his gold cannot buy everything. “I like you, m’ lad,” says the Yorkshireman, and proceeds, as they did in the mid-Victorian period, to relate the struggles and the secret sorrow of his life. Mr. Kershaw’s wife had been an actress, and had left her home because her husband forbade her to continue on the stage. It is soon apparent to the audience, and even to Bernard, that his wife was no other than Dolly’s dead mother. Presently Dolly enters: Mr. Kershaw is struck by the likeness to his lost Margaret, questions the girl, hears the harrowing tale of the nightgown and of Dolly’s contempt for the father she has never known, defers the revelation until she shall have learnt to love him, buys the opera, places the girl’s hand in that of the young man, and fills the whole garret with an atmosphere of benevolence, slightly flavoured with the famous sauce.

This is what Mr. Ambient would have us take for “a simple human tale of laughter and tears.” The laughter I grant, although I am sorry to say that in my case it invariably came just when Mr. Ambient asked most pointedly for tears. But the simplicity and the humanity I utterly deny. The play is not simple, for it all turns upon the monstrously artificial coincidence which brings the father and daughter unexpectedly together; it is not human, because none of the characters make the slightest attempt to behave as recognisable human creatures actually do behave. Life in a garret is not like this: there are no such Yorkshire manufacturers. The fact is that Mr. Ambient is not transcribing from nature at all. He is merely perpetuating a debased literary tradition which ultimately, I suppose, may be traced back to the romantic fancy of Dickens. And this particular unreality has long become impossible for anyone who cares for a genuine literary presentment of life, or desires emotion really translated into terms of art. As Mrs. Meynell says of a cognate type of humour which we also owe to Dickens, it is a vulgarity which “was not able to survive an increased commerce of manners and letters with France.” There is a wholesome phrase to put side by side with Mr. Ambient’s silly sneer about “Gallic salt.”

And yet—as I stuffed my handkerchief into my mouth to prevent an indecently loud cackle at the passage about the nightgown, I became aware that quite a number of people all round me were using their handkerchiefs for a very different purpose. Obviously in their case, but not in mine, “A Snug Little Kingdom” had fulfilled one of the essential functions of all art, and particularly of dramatic art, the transference of emotion from the artist to the spectator. I hope that I am not more insensitive to the pathos of orphanhood or the tragedy of remorse than my neighbours. But clearly, when it is not immediate life, but the artistic presentment of life that is in question, there are some of us to whom the falsehood of the setting makes the emotion itself unreal and impossible, and there are others whom such considerations do not affect or divert from the sympathetic human issue. Who, then, has the better part? Is it we who follow a will o’ the wisp of æstheticism and lose our birthright of humanity? Or is it they who waste away their souls in cheap sorrows and futile ecstasies because they have not purged their eyes with euphrasy and entered into the renuncements and the austere delights of the initiate? And the greater artist—must his appeal be to the many or inevitably to the few? Are we to look for him in a Henry James or a Joseph Conrad, or in those whom, borrowing Mr. W. L. Courtney’s happy phrase, we may typify as the Manxman and the Minx-woman? The answer to such questions as these must, I think, be the beginning of any philosophy of criticism.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Two Types.

“Oil painting with the brush is a thing of the past. It is dead, quite dead.” Thus speaks the ingenious, prolific and energetic Monsieur Raffielli, who has been so far successful with his new solid oil paints that a collection of pictures produced with the aid of his sticks of colour are being exhibited at the Holland Gallery, in Grafton Street. “Be it understood, oil painting with the brush—which henceforth we no longer need—has lost its raison d’être,” Monsieur Raffielli, you will observe, has no doubts: his hand is quick, his temperament is sanguine. He would deliver a commission, I am sure, to the hour, pleased with it, prepared to defend it, untroubled by that malady that sometimes afflicts the artist—self-distrust. It is agreeable to think of him successful, at ease, gaily turning out bright pictures, impressing his personality on the world. He is a type.

The late Alfred Stevens was also a type, but as far removed from Raffielli as Raphael is from Mr. Dudley Hardy. “Stevens produced few pictures, owing to his habit of destroying his own work.” What an insight into his temperament that bald statement from his biography gives. He was a lonely, brooding man who denied himself pleasures, and suffered friends to fall out of his life for the sake of his art. Thorough he was to his own hurt. Two years was the time given to him to complete the full-size model of the Wellington Memorial: seven years passed before the model was complete—seven years and the work itself not yet begun. It is still incomplete.

Stevens died in 1875, paralysed, worn out by chagrin and disappointment, little thinking that twenty-eight years later his personality and his last work would be the paramount subject of discussion in art circles for weeks together. Little did he guess in the last badgered, clouded years of his life, that on February 2, 1903, the President of the Royal Academy, in a letter to the "Times," should endorse the statement: "The Wellington monument is by consent the finest piece of monumental sculpture ever produced by an Englishman," and add, "by any artist of modern times." Indeed, the unanimity of opinion about the excellence of the Wellington monument is remarkable. Why, then, these columns of letters and articles that have been written, not only during the past weeks, but any time in the past quarter of a century? Go into St. Paul's Cathedral and look at Stevens's Wellington monument. The design leads up to something that is not there: it is like a figure without a head, a church without a spire. The explanation is that in Stevens's design the monument was to be surmounted by an equestrian statue of the Duke; but he reckoned without the late Dean Milman. The equestrian statue has never crowned the monument, although Stevens had left a sketch model for it, because Dean Milman said that he would not allow the Duke or any other soldier to come riding into the Cathedral: more, not liking the monument overmuch, Dean Milman hid it away in a dark side chapel. Then silence for some years. Nobody hung wreaths on the little lions sejant on the dwarf posts in front of the British Museum railings. They, too, are gone now.

For long the Wellington monument rested undisturbed in the dark side chapel. Perhaps some who peered in, and deciphered the name, murmured a few lines from the great Ode, that stirs, as the monument will never stir—murmured, say, "All is over and done: Render thanks to the Giver, England, for thy son," or, "And in the vast cathedral leave him, God accept him, Christ receive him." The years passed till there came a day when Lord Leighton, always active to right a wrong, or to serve the cause of art, busied himself to persuade the Government to provide funds to remove and complete the memorial. The Government were obdurate, but private subscriptions rewarded Lord Leighton's eloquence, and he was successful in persuading the Cathedral authorities to remove the monument to its present position, under one of the arches of the nave. Then again silence.

It was private enterprise that brought about the hullabaloo of the past few months. Working quietly, a body of enthusiasts, of whom Mr. D. S. MacColl, supported by the "Saturday Review," is spokesman, raised the money for the completion of the monument, chose a sculptor, Mr. John Tweed, to produce the equestrian figure from a sketch model left by Stevens, and, vital fact, obtained the sanction of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's. It looked as if there would be a happy termination to their cloistral labours, but "Black and White" published a drawing showing Mr. Tweed at work upon the equestrian figure. Then Mr. Tweed found himself the most discussed sculptor of the day, and pens began to write at incredible length about the work that broke the heart of that quiet man—Alfred Stevens. The reason was—who would have thought it?—that while the committee of enthusiasts were silently advancing their plans step by step, Sir Edward Poynter, President of the Royal Academy, was secretly planning to carry out the good work begun by his predecessor, Lord Leighton. The sympathy and co-operation of Lord Roberts had been enlisted, Mr. Balfour had been approached, and had promised that the sum of £2,000 should be placed upon the year's estimates. The President of the Royal Academy was beginning, no doubt, to feel justifiably proud of the success of his labours when he learnt that an art critic whose views are not academic, who exhibits temperamental impressions at the New English Art Club, had also been instrumental in collecting another £2,000; that a sculptor, who is a pupil of Rodin and not a member of the Royal Academy, had been commissioned to complete the memorial, and that the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's had given their consent.

There, at the time of writing, the matter rests—rests, I imagine, with the Dean and Chapter. Unless they rescind their permission and the commission, which is not likely, Mr. Tweed will complete the design. The wordy battle is still raging in the columns of the "Times" and elsewhere, and the great public, as is usual in this country, is quite indifferent. I spent an hour in St. Paul's Cathedral the other afternoon, and during that time not one of those present so much as cast a glance at the monument to Wellington.

Sombre, mysterious in the half-lights of the winter afternoon, looks this memorial of Stevens's labour. He desired no short road to success, and one wonders what he would have thought of Monsieur Raffielli's invention which, whatever be its fate, "saves trouble," inasmuch as it does away with brushes, palette, and the paraphernalia of oil painting. All the operator needs is a certain number of these sticks of colour (there are two hundred to choose from) and a canvas. When the sticks of solid oil colour, "unctuous and soft," have done their work on canvas or paper, and the painting is dry, it may be left dull, or varnished with any sort of picture varnish you happen to prefer. "One should be able to paint as quickly as one thinks," says Monsieur Raffielli. "My invention abolishes all the little annoyances of one's work." Well, this invention may have attractions for the amateur, but I cannot think that the serious painter desires to avoid annoyances and difficulties, but rather to grapple with them. The road to a great achievement is not by the easiest paths. The pictures at the Holland Fire Art Gallery, produced by means of these sticks, have just that facile, superficial air that the pictures, say, by Wilson and Cotman at Burlington House, painted in the old "long, arduous, fastidious, painful, and complicated way" have not. If Monsieur Raffielli's invention be seriously taken up by painters, it will mean an enormous increase in the production of pictures. To the present exhibition Monsieur Raffielli sends ten. There they are, bright as a gleam of sun on an April day—finished, shrill, slight, ready for the market.

Monsieur Raffielli is a type; another type was Alfred Stevens, who produced few pictures "owing to his habit of destroying his own work."

Science.

The Living Cell.

It is well to begin, at the beginning: and for us, who are many-celled organisms, that beginning is the living cell. It is the cardinal platitude of biology that the cell is the unit of life; and, as such, its origin, immediate and primæval, its structure, its needs and its life-history, are the most interesting and the most sublime problems conceived or conceivable by science. Of first causes, it is true, science has some word, and of the origin, let us say, of solar or stellar systems; but the mind that postulates first causes or that formulates a nebular hypothesis is an expression of the highest development of cell-activity, and is manifested in a "form divine" itself developed from a single cell. When, therefore, a few observers, who should have remained such and should not have attempted to reason, are propounding one or another form of a heresy which seeks to question the supremacy of the cell; when a parallel to a growing cell is sought in a "growing" crystal—(it might as well be sought in a rolling snowball)—it is necessary to re-affirm that supremacy, even at the risk of platitude. It may, therefore, be asserted that, since the doctrine of spontaneous generation was finally exploded, no fact has come to light or theory been propounded that has done other than make doubly sure our assurance of the remote supremacy of the living cell.

What, then, is this consummation of the material universe—this, which may, in one form, become a Shakespeare or, in another, so similar yet so incalculably different, turn our morning milk sour, and yet which is essentially always the same? You may study it in a thousand forms. If your realm of thought be "the proper study of mankind," in your fellow-man you study the cell. If those beings whose life need have no period, the immortal trees, attract you, in the oak or the acorn you study the cell. Under the microscope, magnifying, how inadequately, 1,500 or 2,000 diameters, you shall detect no particular difference between the corpse of the cell that would have been a man or of the cell that would have been an oak. Be your fancy more bizarre, you may study the cell in that accursed plant, one-four-thousandth of an inch in length, the tubercle bacillus, which sends down into the grave one in seven of the human race. Or you may prefer the study of one of your own guardians, the white corpuscles of the blood, and in these living entities, ten thousand to the cubic millimetre of that so-called "fluid," you shall find all the characters of a cell indistinguishable from the common Amæba, which is only one cell from first to last.

There is a would-be modern tendency—something "really up-to-date"—to believe that there is now no such thing as scientific dogma; that the more we learn the less we know; that we are sure of nothing and never shall be. Fortunately facts remain facts, with the peculiar property that they are independent of what may be thought of them; and logical processes are valid in despite of time or space or minds to which they are but as an idle tale. It may be asserted as a proven and irrefutable scientific fact, as certain as gravitation or the law of the conservation of matter, that every living cell on the earth at this moment, whether plant or animal, whether living alone or a member of a complex community, was derived from a pre-existing cell. Omnis cellula e cellula was the simplified and final form given last century by the great Virchow to the dogma propounded by his English predecessor Hunter in the phrase, omne vivum ex ovo. Every living thing is from an egg; and every living thing (that is to say, every cell or collection of cells) is from a pre-existing cell.

Carlyle somewhere says that "Every man is at heart a proselytiser," and I confess to a whole-hearted zeal in asserting a doctrine so cardinal, so significant, so certain, so universal, so absolute. The tremendous deduction, raising problems incredibly beyond speculation, must be faced. Life had a beginning on this planet, and that beginning was once and for all. How, no one has as yet begun to tell us. Why "this vital putrescence of the dust," as Stevenson has it, we cannot tell. But, at this late day, at any rate, no further increment, no infusion of new blood, no fresh start is possible. We must make the best of what we have. That we are doing so is my optimist belief.

But these are transcendent issues. Let us examine the features of this unit of life. It is a little mass of matter, with or without a definite boundary, and it contains a denser speck called the nucleus—that is all. Sizes and shapes vary. The nerve whereby one is painfully aware of a corn, which controls the growth of a toe-nail, is the direct prolongation and continuation of a cell just outside the spinal cord more than three feet away; but the little mass and the central speck are the essential rude anatomy even of this so highly differentiated cell. The nucleus is a net-like structure which is the governor of the cell. Of the destinies of the whole—such destinies, they may be—the nucleus is the arbiter. It initiates every cell-division, and controls, in higher organisms, every cell-differentiation. Conceive, if you can, the complexity and power of the nucleus of the original cell from which each of us was developed. The entire cell consists of a substance called protoplasm, which is the physical basis of life. Protoplasm, or living matter in its lowest terms, contains, invariably and necessarily, six elements: carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, sulphur and phosphorus. The phosphorus is found within the nucleus, and is characteristic of the "nucleo-proteids" of which the nucleus is composed. The complexity of the molecular constitution of protoplasm is beyond conception, as is the invisible structure of the cell itself. The cell, or the protoplasm of which it is composed, performs, needless to say, the same functions as we do, or as the Cedars of Lebanon did in the days of Solomon and do to-day. It breathes, of course. That is to say, it takes in Oxygen (O_2), combines it with carbon (C) and gives out carbonic acid (CO_2). In other words, it burns. Necessarily, therefore, it is combustible; as are our many-celled bodies; as is also our food, which consists of the bodies of plants or animals defunct. The cell must burn, must breathe. That is an absolute condition of its life; applicable universally—to the bacillus tuberculosis, to the germ of a man, or to the man himself. And, since it develops and grows and burns, it must have fuel; or food as we call it. This food, like ours, must contain the six elements of which the cell is composed, as well as some others, such as chlorine, contained in common salt, the chloride of sodium. The plant cell takes up these elements in very simple forms and builds them into exceedingly complex bodies known as proteids or, less accurately, as albumins, and into starches and sugars. The animal cell cannot effect this synthesis; and here is the essential distinction (one of chemical power) between the two. Since from the proteids it replenishes and regenerates its constantly burning protoplasm, the animal cell must, therefore, utilize the plant-cell for its food. Hence it is that without plant life animal life cannot be. And as the plant-cell's power of building up these complex substances depends directly upon the sun, we recognize in him a necessary of all life, vegetable or animal. But the Cell is still supreme. The sun himself cannot think. The cells of the grey surface of the human brain can conceive of a Cause of the sun. The living cell stands to-day where it ever has stood; before its attributes, the mystery of which, though now well defined, is as yet unsolved, the "intelligible stars" and the inanimate nebulae still pale their ineffectual fires.

Correspondence.

Spadework.

SIR,—I do not think it can be said that, as your "Spadework" article tells us, "Letters were born in Crete." The discoveries of the American Expedition to Babylonia show that writing was in common use in that country at least as early as 6,000 B.C., or two millennia before the date you assign to the evolution of letters on Cretan soil. This writing was carried on by conventional signs developed from pictographs or hieroglyphs, and required only small modification to become the well-known cuneiform characters. These last are in every sense letters, although they represent not single sounds as do those of our alphabet, but syllables. The same may be said of the Cypriote, and, so far as can yet be judged, of the Cretan script.—Yours, &c.,

F. LEGGE.

[When we said "letters" we meant literally letters, as part of our first paragraph—"the alphabet was evolved in Crete"—sufficiently shows. The advance from a syllabary to an alphabet—what we have termed "the evolution of letters"—seems to have taken some thousands of years in Crete, and no wonder; the step to a method so fluid, so nervous, and so plastic, as the actual letter was of almost incalculable value and difficulty. The Cretans seem to have begun where the Babylonians and others left off. The cuneiform method, which is surely even older than Mr. Legge suggests, had already reached its inherent limitations. The Cretans accomplished an advance, or all but the last step of it, which is comparable to the vast gulf that separates the Chinese so-called "alphabet" of to-day from our own—the abandonment of the immobile and fossilized for the plastic and organic.]

"The Veil of the Temple."

SIR,—Adventurous criticism is always fascinating. Though I have seen no conjectures on the subject, may I point out the resemblance between the opening chapters of "The Veil of the Temple" now appearing anonymously in the pages of the "Monthly Review," and "The New Republic" by Mr. W. H. Mallock?—Yours, &c.,

E. R. NOBLE.

Wanted a Word.

SIR,—In your issue of the 17th January, your correspondent "Cataloguer" suggests some words that "might be used" to express the correlative antithesis of sequel, but he rejects them because he "cannot bring to mind any precedent." Of the words suggested, prelude seems to me to be the least objectionable, and we have at least one precedent for such usage in Whewell: "The cause is more than the prelude, the effect is more than the sequel, of the fact." In Addison too we find: "The last Georgic was a good prelude to the Æneis." No doubt the sense in these cases, especially in the second, is slightly different from what is wanted by your correspondent. I fear we have not hitherto been in the way of employing such a term, consequently usage, the great arbiter in such cases, has not been able to authorise any.

If we must coin a word perhaps "prelusion" might be allowable in view of the strong claims of prelude; or would "precess" be preferable? This word has as much right to arise from its verb as the analogous formations access, excess, process, success, &c.—Yours, &c.,

Tolstoy's "Resurrection."

SIR,—The "Athenæum" published a letter, on the 23rd January, stating that: "To those who knew St. Petersburg at the date suggested it is clear . . . that Tolstoy has forgotten the person meant by his own note, and that Lord Radstock was in his mind."

I happen to have by me a letter, received from Tolstoy when the "Revised Edition" of my wife's translation of "Resurrection" was in preparation, in which he says: "I named the preacher Kiesewetter, because I took the type from X——, a German who preaches in English." The Evangelical revivalist preacher with a German name mentioned by Tolstoy, is a gentleman who has had much success in Russia, and though I do not wish to publish his name I send it, herewith, for your private information, and in proof that it is not Lord Radstock.

The statement made in the "Athenæum" calls for correction, and as the correspondence concerning "Resurrection" in that paper has now been closed, I venture to address this letter to you.—Yours, &c.,

Great Baddow, Chelmsford.

AYLMER MAUDE.

Half-forgotten Books.

SIR,—Your correspondent "Bookworm" remarks in the ACADEMY of 31st January that the particulars he has seen of the above series "do not, so far, impress one with a sense of novelty in the choice of the books to be reissued." May I be allowed to point out that Messrs. Routledge and Sons were induced to undertake this series of reprints by urgent requests from many quarters, more particularly from booksellers and librarians, who are surely the right people to know if a book is wanted and if it is unobtainable? The "Library World" some time ago called attention to the fact that many works "which have taken a recognised place in English literature, as well as others which have . . . been enshrined in the catalogues of hundreds of public and other library catalogues," cannot be repurchased as the old copies become worn out. As a librarian, I can bear witness to this. To get even a badly worn, second-hand copy of most of the twenty-five books announced as the first instalment of the new series, entails a good deal of advertising, if it can be got at all. Most of these books have been out of print for many years; the reprints mentioned have been exhausted long ago; and the sixpenny editions that "The Bookworm" alludes to are, of course, quite unsuitable for libraries, and not worth considering.

The "Library World" has published lists of books reported by librarians as out of print, and I notice that two consecutive lists contained together about three hundred books. From these and other lists of suggestions a careful choice has been made of the books that seem most worthy of being recalled to life, whether they have been out of print for five, fifty, or a hundred years; and their re-issue in a presentable form and at a low price will no doubt be a public service.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST A. BAKER,

Editor of "Half-forgotten Books."

Mr. Ashton's Recreations.

SIR,—The February number of "Temple Bar" contains an interesting article on "The Recreations of Distinguished People," written by a gentleman named Charles I. Graham. In it the writer, intermixed with sundry spicy remarks of his own, gives a list of curious and remarkable recreations which he has culled from that most excellent biographical annual "Who's Who"; but whether by a strange oversight, or for some other reason, the writer of the article in question entirely omits to mention my own recreations, which is all the more surprising, as some of these recreations are perhaps the most singular of any. Here they are, copied word for word from the 1903 edition of "Who's Who": "Recreations: Writing letters to the Press on various subjects, of which nearly 500 have already appeared; visiting the tombs of famous personages (was the indirect means of restoring many noteworthy resting-places); looking at ancient and memorable buildings; reading newspapers (English and German); listening to the debates in the House of Commons and at Cogers' Hall, of which he is one of the three trustees); playing draughts."—Yours, &c.,

"Wisdom While You Wait."

SIR,—Many of your readers will be glad to know that that very amusing brochure, "Wisdom While You Wait," which was printed and privately circulated at the close of last year, is about to be issued by Messrs. Isbister & Co. —Yours, &c.,

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 176 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best description, not to exceed 250 words, of "My Favourite Piece of Sculpture." Thirty-three replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss Edith Rickert, 31, Clevedon Mansions, Parliament Hill, N.W., for the following:—

LA FEMME INCONNUE.

Hers is a strange little face, not Greek in its beauty, nor having the glory of mediæval sainthood. Yet in the presence of this fifteenth century Italian woman, few are they that escape looking crude, commonplace, stupid, even brutal. The veiled hair—its simplicity almost more exquisite to the touch than to the sight—the shadowed forehead, the half-closed eyes, the lightly-poised smile that comes and flits away in one's imagination, the delicate, inflexible chin, the slender throat at once stately and dimpled—all these belong to a beauty that is a stranger to all laws save its own. Something akin to Monna Lisa is this unknown woman, so innocently complex, so seriously mysterious. There is no virtue in her face, no vice even, least of all passion; but, although a blind man's fingers might dwell caressingly on its soft chiselling of feature and find nothing more, to one who sees, this delicate perfection of outline sheathes a marvellous soul-power, ready to leap forth from the eyes in splendour of pride and will, to unveil a dauntless forehead, to set the lips in cruelty, perhaps in treachery, or enchant them with infinite witcheries of love.

We have lost her name; but her unknown sculptor has made her a type of the harmony of the potentialities of the soul.

Other replies follow:—

THE SIEGE OF CALAIS.

In these days of the fifteen-minute masterpiece in solid oils, it is not surprising that the living granite of the Egyptian, or the quarried marble of the Greek, should be somewhat neglected.

Long ago, perfection of form was hewn from stone; but from that gallery of gods, only a god could select a favourite.

I first saw my favourite piece of sculpture two years ago: a figure from Rodin's group to commemorate the siege of Calais. I had not seen his work before, and I began my love for it by hating what I considered its brutality.

The weird outline of this self-condemned figure fascinated me. The sunken eyes, famished cheeks, and the hollow chest first appeared to me to be over-contrasted with the muscular hands and legs. That moment of heroic humiliation is crystallized here when six chief citizens, clothed in sheets, and with halters about their necks, walked from the besieged city to deliver the keys to the English King. These stubbornly placed feet and the compressed lips are eloquent of the tenseness of the hidden heart. The "Citoyen" is rugged and magnificent, and no sand-paper sculptor could have depicted him. Rodin has made one of the hands twist the levers from the stock of the gigantic key which he holds, and so gives a boldly subtle impetus to the emotional effect.

In the historic scene was something of the grotesque, the heroic, the haunting, and Auguste Rodin has conjured up the scene

[D. S. M., Glasgow.]

"FEAR."

My favourite piece of sculpture is a female figure of "Fear," fleeing in a fluttering and wind-swept fashion along a platform of glistening, blue-veined marble. The pressure of wind accentuates the nipples of her breasts, the left knee is prominent and nervously aggressive, and the pads of her toes flat with energy—the whole figure, in fact, rich with the eloquence of arrested movement. Her mantle flutters behind "like a petrified hurricane," and her eyes are cast fearfully over her left shoulder. When I look at the craven fear in those eyes, and the contemptible triangular lines from the bottom of her nose to the corners of her drooping mouth, I feel stronger, braver, and wholly disgusted with "Fear." That is why it is my favourite piece of sculpture. In it, the unknown craftsman achieves, to my thinking, the highest mission of art. He makes me feel, and his work is effective.

THE SLEEPING ARIADNE.

The sight of beautiful limbs at rest in deep sleep may sometimes bring to the tired eyes of the beholder a sensation of repose. It is with such quieting of the brain and senses that I gaze on the marble form of Ariadne, who sleeps eternally in the great hall of the Vatican. She reclines in large-limbed grace, the lovely curves wrapt round in drapery of cunning beauty, her crossed feet suggesting the abandonment of heavy sleep. She sleeps for very weariness, poor Ariadne! forsaken by the lover who, but for her gift of the golden thread, had perished in the Labyrinth of Minotaurus. Has she wept till the tears would no longer flow? Has she strained longing eyes for the lover who came not, while day faded into night, and Morpheus gently closed the unwilling eyelids? We cannot answer, for Ariadne's story is wrapt in oblivion.

If Theseus came and touched those heavy lids, and pressed soft lips to hers, I know how Ariadne would lift her lovely head while the round arms would clasp the wanderer, and the folded limbs tremble joyously to life. But false Theseus will never return to wake her. So let us too leave Ariadne to her age-long slumber, and only, now and then, when the roar and din of the world oppresses heart and brain, go seek repose in contemplation of this work of an old-time master.

[D. R. S., London.]

ATHENE.

In one of the museums of Greece, there exists to-day an ancient bas-relief, discovered only within the last fifteen or twenty years, which represents a standing figure of Athene. The type is archaic, or at least archaistic, and the spirit of the conception is curiously unlike that which characterises the work of later Greek sculptors. For instead of the calm triumphant beauty which is so distinguishing a mark of the work of Pheidias and Praxiteles, you have here an Athena who is pensive, melancholy, one might almost say humble. With bent head, she leans upon her spear, as though listening sadly to the plaints of a world whose woes she cannot heal. "Not Zeus himself escapes the fated thing," says Prometheus; and so this Athene, so unpagan in her attitude of resignation and humility, seems to bow before a will uncomprehended but divine.

I know her only from a photograph, yet it gives me more pleasure to look at this, and wonder what were the thoughts of him who made her, than to gaze at the splendid contours of the Venus of Milo, set proudly against her crimson background in the Louvre.

[A. M. B., Godalming.]

LA BELLE HEAUMIÈRE.

When we stand for the first time before La Belle Heaumière, Rodin's interpretation of Villon's ballad "The Complaint of the Armourer's Daughter," we are shaken to the very roots of our being. An instant before life was a dull, flat level, a stagnant thing which the astounding force and energy of La Belle Heaumière has struck through like forked lightning. When we regain ourselves, after that vivid moment, we no longer see the force and the energy; they have given birth to a marvellous beauty which makes itself felt in every detail. The superb pose of despair which is further expressed so poignantly in that wide open hand, in which every finger is rigid with the agony of loss, and in that small bowed head, with the still exquisitely pure outline of the features in strange contrast with the sunken hollows of the body. In La Belle Heaumière the beauty of ruin is a greater beauty to me than any beauty of perfection. We see in this magnificent decay the trace of every passion and ecstasy, of every violence and debasement, and it is this which almost actually grips us by the throat as we realise.

[J. D., London.]

THE DYING GLADIATOR.

It is the Dying Gladiator, or better perhaps the Dying Gaul. I like to think of it as the former, and presently there rises unbidden a dim background of straining faces which gaze down with lessening interest on an ending fight. Past all caring for their plaudits or the wavering verdict of their thumbs, he seems to be looking at the sand, as into a magic crystal, with something of perplexity, or it may be of piteous protest in his frown—the protest of some dumb animal against its tormentor, for here the unlettered barbarian has clashed against the polished brutality of Rome.

The tense muscles, born of a life which depended on their alertness for its continuance, are beginning to slacken, and the body, with a certain grace that seems only to belong to immense strength, bends lower to the earth, waiting the final struggle wherein shall break away the spirit, unrecognised in life, but now slowly waking to a knowledge of itself.

The hair, growing low on the neck, adds yet one other touch of pathos, bringing back the dumb complaining of the brows, and there comes a great pity for him as he silently waits the coming of the cloud, this victim of a "Roman Holiday."

Competition No. 177 (New Series).

This week we give a prize of One Guinea for the best imaginary criticism by a deceased author on a book by any living author. Length not to exceed 250 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 11 February, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The late F. W. H. Myers's "Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death," will be published by Messrs. Longmans next week. The work is in two volumes, one containing 700 closely printed pages, the other 600, including a copious index. In the preface, which was unfinished at the time of his death, Myers writes: "A recluse, perhaps, or an eccentric—or a man living mainly with his intellectual inferiors, may find it easy to work steadily and confidently at a task which he knows the bulk of educated men will ignore or despise. But this is more difficult for a man who feels manifold links with his kind, a man whose desire it is to live among minds equal or superior to his own."

The second volume in the Cambridge Modern History will be published in June. It will deal with the United States. This volume will be the seventh of the History, which is to appear in two sections. Individual volumes of the sections, which treat respectively of the period before, and the period after the eighteenth century, will be published together.

Mr. John Lane announces a new series to be called "The Country Handbooks," a collection of volumes dealing entirely with the country and country life. The first volume, to appear shortly, is written by the editor, Mr. Harry Roberts. "The Tramp's Handbook," for the use of travellers, soldiers, cyclists, and lovers of the country, deals with the practical as well as the idyllic side of tramping and camping out. The author gives useful advice on the cooking utensils necessary for a camping-out party, and discourses on the slang of the open road and other matters of interest. Other volumes are in preparation, including "The Motor Book," by R. J. McCreedy; "The Still Room," by Mrs. Charles Roundell; "The Bird Book," by A. J. R. Roberts; "The Tree Book," by Mary Rowles Jarvis; "The Woman out of Doors," by Menie Muriel Dowie.

A new edition of Mr. Henry Harland's "Mademoiselle Miss" will be issued next week by Mr. John Lane. This was the first published work of the author of "The Cardinal's Snuff-box." In a short prefatory note Mr. Harland says: "These stories were written a good many years ago by a young pen trying its paces. My admiring publisher is so anxious to reprint them, and coaxed so hard, I really haven't the heart to cross him."

In his "French Novels of the Nineteenth Century" series Mr. Grant Richards will publish next week "The Abbé Aubain and Mosaics," by Prosper Mérimée, translated by Emily Mary Waller. An introduction is contributed by Mr. Arthur Symonds, in the course of which he says of Mérimée: "Each of his stories is a story, nothing more or less, and in each he does exactly what he sets out to do. . . . It was Mérimée, really, who perfected the short story in France, who left it a model for the writers of every nation."

Mr. Herbert C. Fyfe has in preparation a second edition of his work, "Submarine Warfare: Past, Present, and Future," which will be issued shortly by Mr. Grant Richards. Both the British and the United States Admiralties have added this book to the officers' and seamen's libraries of British and American warships.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall have in preparation a new series of books, entitled "The Woman's Library," edited by Ethel M. M. McKenna. The idea of the series is to produce bright and attractive volumes which will give women some idea of the various spheres that are open to them. The first two volumes, which will be issued this month, are "Education and Professions," and "Needle-work."

Mr. Albert Dawson, Inglenook, East Finchley, London, author of "Joseph Parker, His Life and Ministry," has been asked to write a complete biography. Mr. Dawson will be glad to have any letters written by Dr. Parker, or information or reminiscences, particularly if relating to his early days, or Banbury and Manchester ministries. All original documents will be carefully returned.

The argument turns upon the solidarity of mankind—the oneness of the human race and its incorporation in Christ by virtue of the Incarnation. It is distinctly refreshing and helpful, amid the many unsatisfactory theories of the Atonement which are current in the present day, to perceive how thoroughly Scriptural is the line of thought adopted by the great Greek theologian.

Few people understand the extent and character of the leakage from the Church of Rome. We hear much of perversity to the Roman Faith, but very little of those who leave it. The Rev. C. S. Isaacson has in this volume collected the personal testimonies of a large number of converts from Romanism. They include English and Irish Clergy as well as some of the most active of Protestant workers on the Continent.

Record.—"Roads from Rome" is indeed an informing book. It is written, too, in a spirit of Christian courtesy, and should do much to open the eyes of those who are captivated by the illusions of the Roman System."

English Churchman.—"A timely volume—a counterblast to the somewhat timorous advertisement of perversity to Rome issued about a year ago under the auspices of Cardinal Vaughan, entitled 'Roads to Rome.'"

The Literary Week.

THE outstanding publication of the week has been Mr. Myers's posthumous work, "Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death," to which we referred in our last issue. Probably no book of recent times has exacted such careful reading and reflection as these thirteen hundred pages, yet promptly on the day of publication appeared the reviews. One editor, however, makes the candid statement that he has not had time to read "the two bulky volumes." He proceeds however to remark that "a friend of ours who has done so declares that the work scientifically and conclusively establishes to his mind the continuity of human existence after death." Among other books of the week we note the following:—

RECOLLECTIONS OF FORTY YEARS' SERVICE. By Major-General Sir Alexander Bruce Tulloch.

Dedicated to "the Backbone of the British Army, the Company Officers." Major-General Tulloch's active service took him to Central India, China, Canada, and half-a-dozen other countries. The narrative is simple and entirely unaffected, such writing as we usually get from soldiers. The chapters devoted to Tel-el-Kebir and South Africa are particularly interesting. In his preface the author says: "I hope my attempts at literary work may be of some use to those who take an interest in Army matters, and instructive to young officers, who will be able to see how very far they have advanced in professional knowledge, as compared with what we were half a century ago, when a correct march past in slow and quick time, and the performance of curious kaleidoscopic drill movements inside a barrack square, were about all that was considered necessary."

AUGUSTUS. By E. S. Shuckburgh.

The Life and Times of the Founder of the Roman Empire. " . . . Augustus was the most successful ruler known to us. He found his world, as it seemed, on the verge of complete collapse. He evoked order out of chaos. . . ." Mr. Shuckburgh has made no attempt to whitewash the character of Augustus; but he tries to set his unquestioned cruelty up to B.C. 31 in a reasonable light. The narrative is based on a wide range of authorities, and the early years of Augustus are very fully treated. The volume is illustrated by photographs of coins and sculpture.

THE STUARTS. By J. J. Foster.

These two sumptuous volumes, both in regard to the printing of the text and the illustrations, are quite an achievement. They illustrate the personal history of the Stuart family in the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. So far as the author, Mr. J. J. Foster, is aware, it has not hitherto been attempted to depict the Stuarts in one work. He has brought together a succession of portraits, relics, medals, maps and views relating to the persons, the adventures, and the surroundings of the chief members of this family, the story of whose fortunes has all "the perennial freshness of a fairy tale."

AS WE ARE AND AS WE MAY BE. By Walter Besant.

A collection of essays on such varied subjects as "The Endowment of the Daughter," "The People's Palace," "The Upward Pressure," "The Land of Romance." In a foreword we read: "'As We Are and As We May Be' is the exposition of a practical philanthropist's creed, and of his hopes for the progress of his fellow-countrymen. Some of these hopes may never be realised; some he had the happiness to see bear fruit." "The Land of Romance" concludes with this characteristic passage concerning the author's firm belief in a final union between England and America: "But it will come—it will come; it must come—it must come; Asia and Europe may become Chinese or Cossack, but our people shall rule over every other land, and all the islands, and every sea."

IN view of the many erroneous statements that have recently appeared in various quarters, Mr. Robertson-Durham, the judicial factor on the estate of the late George Douglas Brown, authorises us to say that Mr. Brown left behind him some MSS. which the judicial factor has placed in the hands of Mr. D. S. Meldrum, who, with other friends of Mr. Brown, is preparing for the press a volume of his writings to which an authorised memoir will be prefixed.

THIS has been a week of obituaries. Three distinguished names—distinguished in very different ways—have been erased from the roll of the living: Prof. Cowell, Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, Edna Lyall. Prof. Cowell was one of the many men of whom our universities are honourably proud; he did his work to the utmost of his power, and devoted his gifts to helping younger men. When he became Professor of Sanskrit at Cambridge active steps were at once taken to promote an intelligent study of Oriental languages. First came the Semitic Languages Tripos in 1878; then, in 1893, the Indian Languages Tripos, and in 1895 the Oriental Languages Tripos. He gave Edward FitzGerald Spanish lessons by way of the plays of Calderon, and it was he who brought to England the manuscript of the "Rubaiyat" and translated it to the wise Woodbridge recluse. In thinking of FitzGerald's immortal rendering of Omar, Cowell's name should never be forgotten.

SIR CHARLES GAVAN DUFFY was a man of a very different type; his enthusiasms took shape in action. At first he was associated with that spirited revolutionary party known as the Young Ireland Party, and he, with Thomas Davis and John Blake Dillon, founded the "Nation." The influence of the "Nation" was remarkable; to-day its files would hardly, perhaps, be worth consulting, save for the verse which was printed in its columns. Finally the "Nation" was suppressed and Duffy was tried three times for treason-felony. But on each occasion the jury disagreed, and after ten months waiting in gaol the young enthusiast was released. In 1849 he revived the "Nation," and exploited a more conciliatory policy. But soon he came to see Ireland, in his own phrase, "like a corpse on the dissecting table," and he left her for the Colony of Victoria. There he almost immediately became a political force, and finally was Speaker of the Assembly. That he accepted a knighthood from a Government which he had flouted was one of the trifling inconsistencies to which the general character of patriot is subject. Sir Charles Gavan Duffy wrote on many subjects, and always with a certain grip and enthusiasm. Perhaps his "Conversations with Carlyle" (whom he knew intimately) and "My Life in Two Hemispheres" are the books by which he will chiefly be remembered. But the romance of his life is associated with those early days of futile effort in the service of what we now see to have been a hopeless cause.

By the death of Miss Ada Ellen Bayly, the "Edna Lyall" of many title-pages, we have lost a writer who at least had earnestness and a reasonably healthy outlook. As literature her books had no great value; they were diffuse and marked by no strong characterization. Yet "Edna Lyall" had the narrative faculty, and her stories have a freshness which is not so common that we can afford to pass it too lightly by. The problems of "Donovan" were just such problems as cannot be treated in fiction with much actuality; at the same time their appeal is so wide that books dealing with them are almost sure to be read. The details of Miss Bayly's life give no particular points for comment: she had the usual ups and downs of the literary career, and when "We Two" was published its success came as the usual surprise. Miss Bayly did her best honestly; she interested many thousands of readers and did none of them any harm, which, after all, is a record of which any writer might be proud.

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS contributes to a new translation of certain short stories by Prosper Mérimée, entitled "The Abbé Aubain," an interesting critical introduction. "Mérimée's temperament," he says, "was really that of the scholar, not of the artist, and even his art came to him as a kind of scholarship." He attempted many things for the sake of proving to himself that he could do them. He began his career "by two very serious mystifications, 'Le Théâtre de Clara Gazul,' a collection of short plays supposed to be translated from the Spanish, and 'La Guzla,' a collection of ballads in prose supposed to be translated from the Illyrian." From that he proceeded by way of a piece in dialogue to the "Chronique du Règne de Charles IX.," which Mr. Symons calls "the most perfect of historical novels." Then, looking for more difficulties to conquer, he chanced upon the short story, concerning his treatment of which Mr. Symons writes:—

He has, above all things, a mastery over effect; and he has none of those preoccupations of the poet, of the thinker, or of the "inspired" writer, which so often come to shake the equilibrium of that to which they add a heavy and toppling burden of splendour. . . . He is interested in his characters only as they come into the light of a crisis; they live for him only in that moment; all the rest is so much detail, so much psychology in the abstract, with which he has nothing to do. Maupassant was to follow him, while thinking that he followed Flaubert, in this rigorous art of cutting your coat to your cloth.

In her Introduction to the "Poems of Robert Browning" in the "Red Letter Library," Mrs. Meynell says:—

A young writer should begin with the study of that one sublime poem, "Saul," and, after giving more or less time to the ingenuities, the energies, and the complexities of the rest, he should go to the reading of "Saul" again. There is in this glorious work a difference in the quality as well as in the degree of poetry. Lofty thoughts there are elsewhere, as in Abt Vogler . . . but "Saul" has the ecstasy of the yonder side, the ecstasy that is beyond imagery and thought, and yet is the nearest thing in the world and the closest to the soul. After the spiritual, intellectual, and natural greatness of "Saul," come the ingenious wisdom of "One Word More"; the simple passion of "Love Among the Ruins," and the "integrity and fire" in others of the love-poems, especially when a woman is supposed to speak; the very subtle eyesight of "By the Fireside," and indeed the fine sense of place that appears in nearly all the poems on Italy; all these are the work of a man of genius, and intelligible to plain and young people.

Let those readers who may think Mr. Meynell's enthusiasm for "Saul" exaggerated turn to the poem again, and we think they will admit that she is right.

A VERSE pamphlet—it is hardly more—by Mr. Yone Noguchi, has lately reached us. The publication is remarkable in one way at least—it is the first book of verse published by a Japanese in England. The title "From the Eastern Sea" faces us from a modest cover of brown paper, and the text is also printed upon brown paper. The dedication to Charles Warren Stoddard runs as follows:—

Night! The spirit of resignation homes in the night. We eloping from the vile land, ask a lodging unto the master of solitude.

O wind! Death-messages from God are sent unto flowers and leaves. Ah, the autumn with frostive teeth tells her fate as a deserted wife!

Stillness! All the mortals send their dream-ships heavenward on the tide of sleep. Thou and I, O Charles, sit alone like two sky stars, east and west.

Mr. Noguchi's verse is not great, but it is certainly interesting. Occasionally it has real suggestion and mystery: on the other hand, it sometimes seems to decline into formlessness both of thought and expression. This has imagination:—

When I am lost in the deep body of the mist on a hill, The universe seems built with me as its pillar.

Am I the God upon the face of the deep, nay, deepless deepness in the beginning?

Here, too, we have a kind of groping imagination, but the expression is vague and formless:—

World of fancy! O new earth!
There mortals dream in the fog of ecstasy.
What a strange amity of earth!
What am I? Mortal? or God?
Oh, where go I? Farewell, my comrade!
O world of evening foes!
There playful Fancy beguiles away
The memory of a better day,
From my breast,
Into a dale of Forgetfulness.

The experiments of Mr. Noguchi's are at any rate curious and sometimes suggestive.

MISS MARIE CORELLI has been protesting against the modernizing of Stratford-on-Avon, by the erection of "a brand new 'Carnegie Free Library' next to Shakespeare's birthplace." Miss Corelli says that "the Stratford townspeople are by no means over-anxious to possess a free library at all," and that if money is to be spent, they would prefer to have it go towards restoring some of their fifteenth century carved house-fronts. We sympathize with Miss Corelli and the Stratford townspeople. Why cannot books be housed simply and unostentatiously? It would seem that florid architecture and reading are coming to be associated in some inexplicable way.

THE first number of Mr. G. R. Sims's comprehensively-named "Men and Women" was issued this week. The paper has a popular air. It opens with personal paragraphs and proceeds to discuss people and topical matters of various kinds. Mr. Sims's "Subject of the Day" is "Are we too sentimental?" On the whole Mr. Sims seems to think that we are, and he ought to know. "The danger is that sentiment may get the better of common sense," he writes. That is a very real danger, and we hope "Men and Women" will be on the right side in the matter.

ONCE more the writer of "Literature and Life" in the "Saturday Review" of the "New York American" delights us. We read:—

Watteau captivates London entirely. His paintings shown at Hertford House make him actual. There is nothing ancient. Everything that exists is modern—a statue by Phidias, as well as a dispatch by Marconi, Homer more than Stephen Phillips. What is news in London? Watteau.

We who live in London like to hear the latest news of our city when it comes by way of New York.

THE Chicago "Goose-Quill" has a manner of its own. This is how its reviewing is done:—

Mrs. Grace Duffie Boylan, a Chicago newspaper-woman who once wrote a fearful and wonderful jingle, in which the reader was invoked "to shake hands with Old Glory" [how the deuce does one "shake hands with Old Glory"?] has just perpetrated a slushmushgush novelette entitled "The Kiss of Glory." Concerning it Miss Dorothy Dix, a lutescent she-writer who most unblushingly filches George Ade's "thunder," comments thusly: "The Kiss of Glory" has fancy, poetry, blood and passion in it, and, compared with the recent crop of domestic fiction, it is like a strange, vivid, tropical bird, fluttered down in the midst of barnyard fowls." Dorothy should practice until she is a mistress of—the gentle art of holding on to her tongue with both hands. "The Kiss of Glory" does not in the least resemble "a strange, vivid, tropical bird." It does, however, resemble a dead dog in an alley, or a pussy-cat (with a stone tied round its neck) lying in a pool of stagnant water.

THE Philadelphia "Conservator" prints a collect each month which runs to about five columns of that journal. The latest that we have seen is all about progress, and it opens thus:—

You cry progress, progress. But what do you mean by progress? Early and late the modern voice chants the praise of progress. Colleges are professed for progress. Churches are priested for progress. The state legislates for progress. We murder for progress. We imperialise for progress. We vaccinate for progress. We vivisect for progress. Whatever we do we do for progress. And that which we fail to do we fail to do for progress. Nothing is too good for progress. Nothing is too bad for progress. You take everything you have and give it to the poor. That you do for progress. You seize everything in sight and salt it down in good securities. That you do for progress. You sing for two thousand a night for progress. You paint for so many dollars a square inch for progress. You pull my leg for progress. You are holy as God for progress.

Five columns of this staccato writing is too much for us. Even the modern collect should have its limitations.

THE "Atlantic Monthly" prints a buoyant article on "The Literary Pilgrimage." Authors, says the writer, will for ever go a-pilgriming:—

An eternal type is this roadster of letters, successively reincarnated and with such singular persistence that thence comes a far from incurious question: to find out what aim bids the sensitive author run hazards so dire. I note many aims, each good in itself,—or if not good, then at least serviceable and worthy of sympathetic consideration. See: they are these,—the love of truth, the love of art, the love of right, the love of men, the love of self. And however glib the scribe's plea that he serves but one lord, I must answer he serves all five; however distinctly he announces himself as this or that and none other, I nevertheless declare him five fellows at once. He is scientist, poet, preacher, philanthropist, and blatant self-trumpeter.

Thus, with his staff in hand, the literary pilgrim takes the road; he sees villages, towns, the broad country, the intricate alleys, and in all circumstances he observes men and things. Yet his life is not all joyous:—

The life is the life of the vagrant. For a thousand friends you have not one intimate. In a hundred cities men shout at you cheerily. "Why, man alive! where ever did you drop from?"—and then suggest birds and bottles, yes and pay for them! but the old friends,—the tried, faithful, time-tested, long-loved comrades and yoke-fellows,—these the literary seven-league-booter doesn't have and can't get. Nobody calls him by his first name. There are no babies named for him, and if he wanted to borrow fifty dollars, I don't know whose door he'd knock at.

And at the end comes weariness; the "world-strangeness wears dull." Yet it was worth while, for at the end the pilgrim says:—

"I have fought a good joust, said my say, tried with what grace there was in me to interpret the world movement, and so to accelerate it." And when the din of the fray is stilled forever, and the last weapons laid down, and the troopers themselves put to rest and he with them, there will yet remain his testimony of whatever he saw and heard in the world,—a record of which history will one day make use; for he in his time did portray with candid, fearless truth the life men lived, the thoughts they thought, and the works they laid hand to.

A WRITER in "The Oxford Point of View" has discovered in Mr. Barrie "our English Molière." "We believe," he says, "that Britain has again found a native genius suited par excellence to her peculiar temperament." Mr. Barrie will no doubt feel complimented, and perhaps a little embarrassed. We had not thought of him in connection with Molière.

WE have received a circular concerning a certain book whose author is doing his own publishing. He is not at all modest about his work, which describes certain things, we are told, "in a style more fascinating than a novel, and certainly more enduring." Subscribers are warned that the bookseller will not have anything to do with this work, and that no free copies will be issued. Then we have a story about Lowell and the lady who reproached him for not sending her a copy of his last book. "I could not afford it," said Lowell. "If my friends do not buy my books, who, pray tell me, will buy them?" If the book in question is as good as the author seems to think it, the address which he obligingly furnishes should soon be besieged by postal orders.

THE eighth volume of the beautiful "Edinburgh" edition of Lockhart's "Life of Scott" has just reached us. Glancing through the familiar pages we chance upon this from Sir Walter's Diary:—

We are ingenious self-tormentors. This journey annoys me more than anything of the kind in my life. My wife's figure seems to stand before me, and her voice is in my ears—"Scott, do not go." It half frightens me . . . I cannot daub it farther. I get incapable of arranging my papers, too. I will go out for half-an-hour. God relieve me!

In May of that year, 1826, Lady Scott had died.

Bibliographical.

So far, I have not seen in any of the obituary notices of Miss Edna Lyall any reference to what was, I believe, her solitary excursion into literary criticism. In 1897, Messrs. Hurst and Blackett brought out a volume called "Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign," and to that work Miss Lyall contributed a paper on Mrs. Gaskell. The subject, I believe, was of her own choosing, and how much she was interested in it is shown by her opening sentence: "Of all the novelists of Queen Victoria's reign there is not one to whom the present writer turns with such a sense of love and gratitude as to Mrs. Gaskell." The article is in several passages self-revelatory, as where, discussing "Mary Barton," the writer says: "Most books of that sort fail to arrest our attention. Why? Because they are written as mere 'goody' books for parish libraries, and are carefully watered down lest they should prove too sensational and enthralling; or because they are written by people who have only a surface knowledge of the characters they describe and the life they would fain depict. . . . Brilliant trash may succeed for two or three seasons, but unless there is in it some germ of real truth which appeals to the heart and conscience it will not live."

Here and there in the essay we get glimpses of the author's views about other novelists than Mrs. Gaskell. Thus, "David Copperfield," we are told, "is probably the most popular book Dickens ever wrote, and is likely to outlive his other works, just because he himself knew so thoroughly well all that his hero had to pass through, and could draw from real knowledge the characters in the background. And at the present time," Miss Lyall goes on to say, "we are able to understand the Indian Mutiny in a way that had never been possible before, because Mrs. Steel, in her wonderful novel, 'On the Face of the Waters,' has, through her knowledge of native life, given us a real insight into the heart of a great nation." Later on, talking of "Wives and Daughters," Miss Lyall remarks that "Molly Gibson, with her loyal heart and sweet sunshiny nature, will, we venture to think, better represent the majority of English girls than the happily abnormal Dodos and Millicent Chynes of present-day fashion."

The stories by which Miss Lyall made her name and fame were published by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett, who, in 1900, issued the whole set of seven in a case. Most of the later tales have been issued by Messrs. Longmans, though Messrs. Methuen have brought out one, and some lesser brochures have borne the imprimatur of Messrs. Chambers, J. Clarke & Co., and Simpkin.

Miss Lyall adventured once into the theatrical field. With the aid of a practical collaborator, she produced a play called "In Spite of All," which was received with some favour when produced at the Comedy Theatre, London, just three years ago. This piece formed the basis of her story, also named "In Spite of All," which was issued by Hurst and Blackett in 1901. Her romance, "In the Golden Days," was adapted to the stage by another hand.

A correspondent asks me whether copies of Mrs. Austin's translation of Carové's "Das Märchen Ohne Ende" ("The Story without End") are now obtainable. I should think so, for an edition of it (with illustrations) was issued so recently as 1899, and is probably still in print. Just ten years earlier there was a reprint of the "Story" in Cassell's "National Library," and that may also be in the market. First published in 1834, Mrs. Austin's translation was reprinted in 1856, in 1864 (with illustrations by W. Harvey), and in 1868 (with coloured drawings by "E. V. B."). The original text of "Das Märchen" was reproduced in 1852, with notes in English. A sequel to the "Story" was undertaken by a certain "C. M." and brought out in 1840, or thereabouts, under the title of "The Child and the Hermit." It would seem that no other work by Carové has been "Englished" save "The Story of Gottfried and Beata," which came out in 1844.

Only now and then did the late Sir C. G. Duffy's publications infringe upon literature—as, for instance, in his "Lays of the Red Branch" (1901), in his contribution to the volume on "The Revival of Irish Literature" (1894), and his "Conversations with Carlyle" (1892 and 1896). The last-named appears to be less known than it deserves to be. His autobiography, "My Life in Two Hemispheres," which Mr. Unwin is about to re-issue, came out five years ago in two volumes. There were new editions of his "Young Ireland" so recently as 1896. This has proved more popular than the sequel to it—"Four Years of Irish History, 1845-9." It is to 1896 that Sir Charles's "Short Life of Thomas Davis" (New Irish Library) belongs.

Very welcome will be Mr. Henry James's biography of W. W. Story, an interesting man, to whose literary ability and achievement, full justice, perhaps, has not yet been done. Mr. James's work will necessarily be much more elaborate and authoritative than the volume published by Mary E. Phillips in Chicago and London in 1898—"Reminiscences of W. W. Story: Incidents and Anecdotes Chronologically Arranged, with Some Account of his Associations with Famous People." Mr. Story's latest publication was "A Poet's Portfolio: Later Readings" (1894)—a sequel to his "He and She, or A Poet's Portfolio," issued ten years earlier. His "Conversations in a Studio" came out in 1890 in two volumes, and his collected "Poems," also in two volumes, in 1885.

The announcement of a book by Mr. John Coleman, to be entitled "Charles Reade: By One who Knew Him," reminds one of the fact that a biography of Reade, in two volumes, by his relatives C. L. and C. Reade, was published in 1887. Mr. Coleman has himself already dealt with the subject in his "Players and Playwrights I have Known" (1888).

A Full Life.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE FRIEDRICH MAX MÜLLER. Edited by his Wife. (Longmans, Green. 2 Vols. 32s. net.)

THIS record cannot in any sense be called a biography. There is matter for a biography, but not the biography itself. It is the usual substitute for a genuine life which we are now accustomed to receive, with what thanks we may, when an eminent man dies; and is doubtless better than an attempt at the real thing by an inadequate biographer. That is to say, it is a voluminous collection of letters, chronologically arranged, and connected by a thin thread of narrative. In saying this we do not wish to disparage Mrs. Max Müller, who has done her work simply and directly, without pretensions to make it anything but what it is. Of course, from the hands of a wife, the narrative can have but one character. It is Max Müller from the standpoint of all the domesticities. And to this, also, we are now well accustomed. A study of a man, a life such as Lockhart's Scott, or even a Johnsonian life, much less a Boswellian biography, we must nowadays renounce hope to see.

It cannot be said that Max Müller exhibits himself strongly in his letters, save on the side of his favourite studies. One gets generally the impression of a cheerful, cultivated, energetic man, on the whole thoroughly enjoying a career of hard work and all but undisturbed prosperity. That, no doubt, is the main thing there is to learn about him. There are no subtle recesses of psychology to be explored in this eminently sane, open, unembarrassed Teutonic nature, certain of himself, his work, and the world. Such a nature makes for the happiness of its owner, but there is nothing salient or picturesque which the reader's interest can lay hold of. And Max Müller's life was uneventful apart from his scientific successes and the record of successive honours. There are plenty of meetings with illustrious persons, and intercourse with celebrated men; but they throw no light on these illustrious persons, and not very much on Max Müller himself. A casual remark at the outset that his frank enjoyment of successes and dignities caused him unjustly to be accused of vanity is the most revealing thing, on the side of recognisable human personality, to be found in these two thick volumes. Afterwards the record flows on in an undiluted tide of cordiality, strenuousness, good-fellowship and high-mindedness, till one wishes the professor would do or say something a little unforgivable. It would spice the monotony of excellence.

The most really interesting part of the book (it is apt to be the case with successful men) is the narrative of his early struggles. Unfortunately for the reader's interest, if happily for the professor, those struggles end at a very early point of his career; afterwards he is abominably fortunate. He was born in the little German nook of Anhalt-Dessau, notable to readers of Carlyle's "Friedrich" as the principality of the "Old Dessauer," Frederick's general. His father was a poet, Wilhelm Müller; his mother a well-born lady, little, beautiful, fiery, energetic, clever, and inclined to severity of discipline—also a most thrifty and self-denying manager of her poor family, for she was early left a widow. Young Friedrich Max soon developed a decided taste for music; and a musician who was a neighbour taught him the piano by way of a surprise to his mother. To the last, in after days, Max Müller's piano-playing was a delight to his friends and a passport to society which might have taken small delight in the mere Sanskrit scholar. Mendelssohn was a friend of his family, and took early notice of the boy.

When Max was only six years old, Mendelssohn visited Dessau, and taking the child into the large church set him on his lap at the organ and made him play the keys, whilst he himself managed the pedals, which the little boy could not reach.

Not only was he a musician, but we are told that "he was an inborn poet," and once told a friend that "he had all his life tried not to be a poet." With regard to which one can only say that a poet cannot help being a poet, and the life-long suppression of the gift, if it exist, is a sheer impossibility. A native feeling for poetry, and a penchant for private verses, do not make a poet, and are common as blackberries in men without a spark of poetic genius. But of this the outsider will never be convinced. As for Max Müller's poetic capacity, only a German could judge it; though one may suspect it was not overwhelmingly remarkable, from the mere fact of its successful repression. At the Nikolai School of Leipzig he not only received his early education, but seems already to have acquired a decisive taste for philology. On this important point the biography has nothing to tell us: we find him, when he was about to leave the school, expressing his desire for a philological career, but daunted by the precarious prospects of securing a living in such a career. Going to the Leipzig University, he speedily developed the taste for Sanskrit which determined his whole future life; and before he left had not only taken his Doctor's degree, but published a translation of the "Hitopadesa," the oldest Hindu collection of fables. Then he went to Berlin to pursue his favourite Sanskrit under Bopp, and philosophy under Schelling. He had begun already the habits of spare living and high thinking which alone brought him through his early difficulties. "At home," he writes, "I have only bread and butter. I drink coffee without milk or sugar." There he made the acquaintance of Humboldt, and of Hagedorn, who offered him his house in Paris, and urged him to go there to complete his Sanskrit studies. He accepted the offer, and his fate was decided.

The frugal living to which his boyhood had accustomed him he carried in Paris to an extreme. If the thinking was high, the living was something more than plain. He describes his life in a letter to his mother. "I get up early, have breakfast, i.e., bread and butter, no coffee. I stay at home and work till seven, go out and have dinner, come back in an hour, and stay at home and work till I go to bed." One is not surprised that he developed head-aches and toothache, which continued to harass him periodically till a much later period of his career. But his Sanskrit studies proceeded under every disadvantage; and at last he conceived the great project which finally brought him name and fame, occupying many years of his life. We mean, of course, the edition of the Rig-Veda, with Sāyana's commentary—a more difficult matter than the Veda itself. Happily for him, he had won in Paris the warm friendship of the illustrious Sanskrit scholar Burnouf, which ended only with the death of the elder man. There was great difficulty in finding a publisher, and but for Burnouf he might have been tempted by an offer from Russia, which would have been fatal to his subsequent career. Finally he decided for England, where he hoped to secure for his book the patronage of the East India Company, though the actual publishing was to be done by a Berlin firm. He reached London, intending a stay of weeks: he was to stay in England all his life.

His good fortune in friendship followed him here. Bunsen's untiring aid and advocacy not only enabled him to wait out the period of probation (also a period of privation, even with his rigid economy), but ultimately persuaded the East India Company to take over the entire publication of the Rig-Veda, and make a yearly payment to the editor for his labours. This was really the end of Max Müller's early struggles. He never looked back. Not only did the issue of his first volume establish his fame; but his residence at Oxford in connection with its preparation brought him into contact with the University, paving the way for his Professorship of Modern Languages, and in the long run (after some disappointment) an assured position as Sanskrit Professor.

Thenceforth the great and important feature of his life is the apostolate he carried on in favour of increased study of the Indian languages. In a letter to the "Times" he brought forward the neglect of these as a predisposing cause of the Mutiny then raging. Italian, he said, was given as many marks in the examinations for the Indian Civil Service as Arabic or Persian. If less ignorance on these points prevails among Indian officials to-day, to Max Müller it is largely due. India was with him a passion; and nothing Indian found him indifferent. It might be the Brahmo-Somaj—that singular movement for Hinduising Christianity or Christianising Hinduism; it might even be the Theosophical Society, though towards that his attitude was more hostile than friendly. Besides his beloved music, another interest of which he might scarce be suspected was the writings of the Mystics. To Mr. W. Lilly he wrote: "I am deep in the Mystics just now: they are my premier amour, and I expect they will be my dernier amour. I only wish people would not call them Mystics; they are as clear as daylight." One of the latest events in his life was a visit from a celebrated Indian Yogin, or ascetic (who was much disconcerted, by the way, that no admiring crowd met him at the London station). "My life is nearly over," said Max Müller at parting from him; "I shall never be able to do any more work." The Yogin placed a hand on either shoulder, and looking with long, earnest gaze in his face, replied: "Yes, I see death has come near you, friend; he has looked you in the face." It was indeed the approach of the end. But Müller's work was done, and thoroughly done. It is in that work, not in these letters and this slender narrative, that his true life must be found. A German, he had worked in England; a Western, he had worked for the East. And if he intermittently longed to end his days in his own land, he had yet loved England with a second and acquired patriotism, which makes him, like Handel, almost more ours than Germany's.

A Veteran's Recollections.

MEMORIES OF A HUNDRED YEARS. By Edward Everett Hale. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)

MR. HALE'S two volumes cannot be classed among brilliant reminiscences. To do them justice, they nowise aim at brilliance: they are gentle, sober talk about an old man's recollection of people and things—mostly people. He has not the gift (for it can scarce be that he has not had the opportunity) of remembering anything very striking, pointed, pictorial, or characteristic. As is apt to be the way with eminent men of long life, it largely amounts to the fact that he remembers people. What he does remember, also, is naturally of more general interest on the other side of the water than on this, where American history, even in comparatively recent years, is discreditably unknown, or little known. Yet with all allowance there is much to interest even Englishmen. The mere range and venerableness of Mr. Hale's memories have a patriarchal impressiveness. "I have seen all the Presidents since Monroe," he is able to say. He saw General Jackson; and "since that time I have spoken with John Quincy Adams, with Tyler, Polk, Lincoln, Grant, Garfield I think, Arthur, Hayes, Benjamin Harrison, McKinley, and Roosevelt." That is impressive enough; but it is almost with a ghostly sense that one realises Mr. Hale has spoken with men who knew Washington. By his recollections he stands but at one remove from the foundation of the American Republic! Nay, as a child he saw Lafayette "with the eye of the flesh." He had seen Major Melville, who was one of the party which threw the tea into Boston Harbour, and so brought on the war with England and the Revolution:—

One knows that he really was of the Tea Party, because he never said he was. . . . If, in the last century, any man said he was of the Tea Party, you knew that strictly he was not. If, on the other hand, when the subject was alluded to with an old Boston man, he smiled and winked and perhaps said nothing; . . . you were almost sure that he was one of the two parties which were organized to throw the tea overboard. . . . They placed sentries at the head of the wharf, to prevent interference from anyone. Their faces in some instances, and I think in all, were blackened, that they might not be recognised. And they went to work as stevedores would do, in a systematic way, to haul up the tea from the vessels, to break open the chests, and to throw the tea into the water. All these men had sworn with a masonic oath that they would never implicate anyone in the transaction.

Charles Sprague, the poet, told Mr. Hale of his father's participation, as a boy, in the same famous act of revolt:—

His father struggled through because his master, who was at work in the Tea Party, recognised him. He blackened the boy's face with soot from a blacksmith's shop, as the rest were blackened, and permitted him to join in the work.

Mrs. Nancy Brown, "a nice old lady," told Mr. Hale that, as a Boston child, she remembered the Battle of Bunker Hill:—

The cannon on Copp's Hill were . . . firing across at Charlestown; the children must have seen Charlestown burning, though I do not remember that she spoke of that. But she did tell me that when the carts began to come up from the ferry with the wounded English soldiers, the children ran after the carts as they went up Lynde Street and Staniford Street; and they could see the gout of blood running out from the tails of the carts as they stood upon the roadway.

That is a horrible little illumination of cold and abstract eighteenth-century history. The few items Mr. Hale has gathered about Washington confirm the impression one already has, and which one gets from his portraits—a clear-headed man of strong eighteenth-century sense and iron will, with nothing of genius or the ardour of genius about him. "A clear-headed, sensible man, whose opinion was worth having, and who was well worth consulting in farming matters or on common business"—so his neighbours thought him, and no doubt they were very right. Josiah Quincy told Mr. Hale that when Washington used to come to Boston, though he had then very wide experience in life—

There appeared, mixed in with the manners of a perfect gentleman, a certain shyness, such as you might see in any man who lived a good deal without the society of other people.

As for the stern will, visible enough in the rigid mouth and firm chin of the portraits; when General Lee retreated at Monmouth, Washington galloped down on him:—

Washington asked him why such a column was retiring, and Lee said that the American troops would not stand the British bayonets. Washington replied: "You damned poltroon, you have never tried them!"

At the Battle of Princeton, when Cornwallis was hurrying to pursue the Americans, Washington ordered the Massachusetts Captain Varnum to take a file of men and destroy the bridge:—

The captain touched his hat and said, "Are there enough men?" and Washington said, "Enough to be cut to pieces." This gentlemen told Dr. Sparks afterwards that as he went back to his men he pinched his cheeks for fear they should see that he was pale.

But the bridge was destroyed, and Washington's retreat secured. One can see the relentless words in his face.

The autograph which Mr. Hale prints, small, regular, precise, firm, meticulous, thin, corresponds with one's notion of his character. A man not great, but adequate and confident, opposed to men inadequate, character equalled him with a great situation. Character, by the way, is not Mr. Hale's strong point. He says, for instance, that Lafayette was despised only by those, like Carlyle, who did not know him. But this proves only Lafayette's personal charm. The evidence of his acts is final; and bears out the evidence of his face (given here) with its receding forehead, prominent nose, and feminine chin—so frequent in the French aristocracy of the time.

Of Emerson, also, Mr. Hale tells a characteristic story. He congratulated Emerson on the success of the latter's cousin George in a college oration at Cambridge. "Yes," answered Emerson, "I did not know I had so fine a young cousin. And now, if something will fall out amiss—if he should be unpopular with his class, or if his father should fail, or if some other misfortune can befall him—all will be well." It was only in the lapse of years that Mr. Hale realised the utterance was wisdom, not cynicism. But his memories of Emerson, Longfellow, Lowell, and others of the illustrious band, are disappointing. Perhaps the cream of them have appeared elsewhere. More attractive are some of his war-memories. They paint in strong colours the miserable constitution of the Northern army which Stonewall beat, during the early period of the struggle between North and South. The variety of Mr. Hale's recollections will be surmised from our quotations. But we end as we began; the most impressive circumstance in these two volumes is the antiquity of a venerable and respected life to which they stretch back.

Essays in Biography.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. By G. W. E. Russell. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)

THIS book is a reprint of a number of essays, mostly biographical. The subjects are almost exclusively prominent members of the Church of England, with many of whom Mr. Russell has been in personal contact; and his sketches of these good men are generally founded on a published Life. The greater number belong to that section of Anglicanism of which Mr. Russell is known as a champion; and in the treatment of the rest he makes no secret of his personal predilections (indeed, why should he?) in matters theological. If his studies are not particularly profound, he must be allowed at least to possess the reviewer's knack of tearing the heart out of a book. Probably the constancy and conviction with which he regards all matters from a single point of view have made this easy for him. In the half-dozen strictly controversial essays Mr. Russell (it must be allowed that he has a difficult and complicated case to present) is less happy. They treat of such subjects as "Catholic Continuity in the Church of England," "The Mass: Primitive and Protestant," and "Ritualism and Disestablishment." In the handling of such matters he finds himself in such a tangle of conflicting opinions among those who, in his own section of the "household," accept the same formularies and claim an equal right to interpret them, that he may readily be excused if in his uphill fight he at moments displays a fury of contempt and impatience that not even his liberal dips into Dickens can effectually quench.

But, returning to earlier papers, we may say that Mr. Russell has here presented to us a notable group of men. Gladstone, Pusey, Tait, Burgon, Magee, Manning, Benson, Westcott, King, Mackonochie, Dolling—these are the most notable. These are sons of whom any Communion in Christendom might be proud. They are men formed in Anglican traditions, educated in Anglican schools and universities; scholars (with two or three exceptions) saturated with the sense of the English Bible, vibrating with its music; blinded, illuminated, intoxicated, inspired with the historic career, the imperial possibility of the Church that was their mother. They had their littlenesses. You see Benson posturing before the mirror for the length of his hair and the shade of his cassock; Magee crying out for advancement and more money; Tait tumbling head over heels in obeisance before the throne; but, in their place and in their age, they were great men. And they were God-fearing men; not less than those others who, like Mackonochie and Dolling and Ion-Falconer, sold all they had and gave to the poor; than Westcott who counselled "a firm faith in criticism, and a firm faith in God"; than Burgon, who thought that all criticism came from the devil.

Mr. Russell gathers indeed still more widely; the variety of his "house" includes Zachary Macaulay and his friends, the founders of that strange sect of enthusiasts known as Plymouth Brethren, and the gentlemen who presented themselves at the Vatican to claim the Pope's adhesion to the new apostolate popularly associated with the name and eccentric genius of Edward Irving.

Mr. Russell's concluding chapter is concerned with the future of Christendom, and the prospect of reunion among those who believe Christianity to be a Divine revelation—those, that is, who believe in the Incarnation of the Son of God. Upon this subject it must be confessed he has little that is helpful to say; though he does bring to the aid of the well-worn "Branch" theory of the visible Church an analogy that strikes one as sufficiently daring:—

After five years' experience and reflection, I say again that, if by unity is meant organic unity under a human head, I neither expect it nor desire it. Unity in that sense does not seem to me to be the unity for which our Lord prayed. Natural reverence shrinks from pressing the analogy contained in his Divine prayer. And yet there is food for profound reflection in its terms: "That they may be one, even as We are One." The Divine Unity has been manifested to man in the Three Holy Persons. A real and essential unity of believers, manifested under the forms of external distinctness, may be the analogous unity which our Lord desires.

This "profound reflection," when we consider the character of the differences which sunder Christendom, leaves us, we confess, rather breathless.

Mr. Platitude's Brother.

PROVERB LORE. By F. Edward Hulme. (Stock.)

PROVERB and Platitude are twins. They are recognised, even apart however, because Proverb is sometimes naughty and generally clever, whereas Platitude is only not stupid because he is invariably so good. The study of proverbs—to drop personalities—leads to the detection of nations in the unguarded privacy of their not-at-home days, if the quip be conceded us. Thus bathos is exposed as the Saxon's refuge from sentimentality in the simile, "Out of the frying-pan into the fire," and the Arab's natural poetry comes out in his parallel phrase, "Flying from the sword to hide in the scabbard." The Scotch honesty that observes its own weakness shines in "Ne'er let your gear o'ergang you." Chinese suspiciousness is eloquent in the advice, "In melon patch tie not shoe, under plum tree touch not cap." Old Roman practicality is expressed in "carpe diem," which Skelton (we remember) gained praise for translating as "crop the day." As a general criticism of the badness of human nature, proverb is invaluable. "Fish and guests stink in three days"; "The weakest go to the wall"; "A slice off a cut loaf will not be missed";

"One must howl with the wolves," state cases with a simple precision of immorality not without charm.

So much by way of introduction to our review of Mr. Hulme's book, which is in truth of a lounging desultoriness that convicts reviewing of pedagogy, to use perhaps the ugliest word in the English language. One fault: it has that tempts us to manufacture a proverb—the absence of an index. We resist the temptation, because the Oji say, "When a poor man makes a proverb it does not spread."

Mr. Hulme has explored a number of quaint collections of proverbs, and his treatment of such gentry as Heywood, who packed as many proverbs as they could into shameless but docile doggerel, is amusing. Worse than Heywood were those, including the renowned Bacon—miscalled "Lord" Bacon—who commented on proverbs with a tedious solemnity. We would not of course be without Ben Jonson's exquisite advice, "Boldly nominate a spade a spade." The pomposity evidently in that case had to come in somewhere.

The typical proverb being "the wisdom of many and the wit of one," the chief drawback to reading proverbs is the truism lying behind the wit which calls attention to that which it is seasonable to ignore. When truism is forsaken the proverb is not always the better, however. "Make a crutch of your cross" seems to Mr. Hulme "excellent advice." To us it is the last word of smugness to affliction which it does not propose to alleviate. "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb" is another instance of proverbial perversity. It is untrue; it is simply a bad kind of poetry, the art to which we owe perhaps more falsifications of life than even to the novel.

Mr. Hulme is instructive on the subject of misunderstood phrases. He reminds us of the phrase "that's the cheese." Du Maurier, we remember, in 1880 made his Lord Plantagenet Cadbury sing "Ain't I the Cheese?" to the Cimabue Browns. But "cheese" is good Anglo-Saxon for choice, and Lord Plantagenet Cadbury was unconsciously reverting to the language of Piers Plowman. "Raining cats and dogs," again, is, in respect of the animals, an ill-caught echo of Catadupa, a place of the Ethiopians where was a waterfall mentioned by Pliny.

Such information shows that Mr. Hulme, although he has entered into an elaborate discussion of the nature of the proverb, has in his work confused the popular apothegm with the colloquial phrase or metaphor. He thus chaps away his book's one chance of unity.

Little, however, does that matter since he brings many gems into the light which seldom drop from English lips, but sparkle none the less for infrequent falling in the dust. From Robert Codrington's collection he got this: "A young man old maketh an old man young." There is fine grim psychology there; the young man and the old man respectively are worth whole flocks of "shorn lambs" and gregarious "birds of a feather." It seems to us worth all the Japanese proverbs which we are asked to "ponder on." "A famous sword may be made from an iron scraper"; "the mouth is the door of mischief"; "if you handle cinnabar you will become red": these are Japanese sayings, and when we "ponder on" them we find them merely true. There is a gleam as of local colour from the "cinnabar," but the Bengali shames the triteness of the proverb which emits it, and expresses the beautiful and unadvertised side of the truth it vulgarises, by the saying, "The sandal tree perfumes the axe that fells it."

On the whole it seems clear, as Mr. Hulme suggests, that proverbs are less popular than they were. Many are quite new to-day. We would offer as a reason the increased popularity of concrete facts. As a result we have a growing impatience with figurative speech.

A Point of View.

SAMOA 'UMA. WHERE LIFE IS DIFFERENT. By Llewella Pierce Churchill. (Sampson Low. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Some natures," says Mrs. Churchill, "are so constituted that there is to them a charm in free savagery as shown among the islanders of Polynesia. It may be hard to see in what this charm consists, but it is certain that it has existed even for men to whom the best of culture was open." That charm, one would have thought, was not difficult to analyse; it consists in precisely those elements which would appeal to a man of culture who was also something more. For Mrs. Churchill, as wife of the American Consul at Apia, the life in Samoa was an involuntary exile, and her high-spirited attempt to make the best of it has resulted in a very entertaining book. The entertainment lies chiefly in the accounts of her shooting and fishing expeditions, which are full of life and humour; her records of the native character and customs, however, do not add greatly to our knowledge. The idleness of the Samoan is too much insisted on, for in a country where food is procured in sufficiency almost without cultivation, and dress is a mere matter of ornament, the Anglo-Saxon ideal of the dignity of labour is as ridiculously out of place as the starched shirt of civilization, which the Samoan blade wears as an overall when he goes to church. Yet by her own showing the islanders have accomplishments which could be acquired only by industry and intelligence. They build excellent boats, and manage them superbly. Men and women are expert fishers. Patience and some artistic tradition are needed for the making of their fine mats. The art of tattooing is no child's play; and even the elaborate ceremonial which is part of the Samoan's daily life implies memory and method. They are clean in their houses and their persons, swim before they can walk, and are fond of all athletic exercises. They have also a system of massage of which Mrs. Churchill experienced the benefit.

One had always supposed that kava was a more or less intoxicating beverage. Mrs. Churchill states that it is not so, that it is neither stimulating nor narcotic, and has no appreciable effect whatever. Its taste can hardly be so disagreeable as she thinks it, or white people would not "use the kava as regularly as their native neighbours." Perhaps there is nothing else to drink, for the water is not good, milk is hardly procurable, and "civilized" beverages are no doubt expensive and inferior. At the same time it is curious to note that, in spite of the importation of spirituous liquors by traders, and the example of the white riff-raff of the beach, drunkenness has never become a familiar vice among the Samoans.

The population of Samoa is nominally Christian, yet pagan beliefs and practices survive, though the latter begin to lose or to change their original significance. We have here going on under the observation of enlightened people a process well worthy of study. In the remoter parts of our own islands are to be found customs and traditions of most obscure meaning and origin. Their source may be lost in the pagan worship of our far-off ancestors, and light might be thrown upon these interesting survivals by a scientific study of the changes now taking place among the lately Christianized peoples of Polynesia.

Samoa to English readers means Stevenson, and all Mrs. Churchill's contempt for "the dream tissue which has been woven out of South Sea moonshine" will not alter this. His accounts may be read by the side of hers and no untruth be detected. There is a difference in the point of view, and that is everything.

The Romance of the Highlands.

SCOTTISH LIFE AND HISTORY. Edited by James Paton, F.L.S.
(Glasgow University Press.)

THIS handsome book comes forth with no profession that it meets either a long-felt or a modern want. It is merely incidental to the International Exhibition at Glasgow in 1901. To that splendid show the King, many peers, the Universities of Scotland, and the Society of Antiquaries contributed interesting relics of ancient times. It was discovered that the Historical Loan Collection "provided materials for representing the history of the Scottish nation by means of extant memorials and remains." Why, that was to say, should not literature be spun round reproductions from photographs of 331 interesting things in the Loan Collection?

Well, here are the pictures and the essays "written up" to them. Together, these form a volume which, although it is heavy to the hand, we have read with interest. The first four chapters deal with pre-historic remains, sculptured stones, early history, and mediæval history. They do not add much to what one learned at school; but the illustrations are refreshing to the memory. It is when Chapter IV. is opened that one's interest is thoroughly aroused and even prepared to become critical. That chapter deals with Mary Queen of Scots; it is followed by chapters on James VI. and "Kirk, King, and Covenant"; and these three writings are by Mr. D. Hay Fleming, whom one seems to remember as being a stern and unbending partisan. Sure enough, they do not shed upon their subjects either sweetness or light. Mr. Fleming is a laborious student; but his essays read like the pleadings of a country solicitor before a sheriff-substitute. Every little fact that can be made to tell against the Stuarts is painstakingly set forth, and there is not a single sentence to indicate that the Stuarts had any case at all. Sir Walter Scott was prejudiced against the Covenanters; but, even so, a much ampler and much fairer notion of the civil strifes is to be gleaned from the "Waverley Novels" than any to be derived from Mr. Fleming's pages. They are a blot upon this entertaining work. Happily, Mr. Henry Grey Graham, who follows immediately, writes in another vein. He is a man of catholic sympathy, and, as we had the pleasure of noting in reviews of his recent works, a real historian gifted with a brilliant style. His subjects are "Before the Union," the Union, the Jacobite Risings, and "After the Rebellion." To him, therefore, in the composition of this work, there fell the most thrilling periods in Scotland's history; and from out of a profound erudition he presents them with singular impartiality.

In the second half of "Scottish Life and History," which deals with sociology, literature, and sports, to ourselves the most engaging chapter is Sir Herbert Maxwell's, on deer-stalking, fishing, and falconry. Not long ago there was a good deal of political discontent with what was called "the displacement of the crofters to make way for deer and grouse." The agitation concealed more than half of the facts which had to be considered; but who could have imagined that, in as far as there had been a change in the social conditions of the Highlands, the change was directly attributable to the economic polity of which the Party of Reform were themselves the authors and are still the uncompromising champions? In 1838, when Mr. William Scrope wrote "The Art of Deer-Stalking," forests were small and the deer were few; most of the mountainous regions were devoted to the rearing of sheep. Nowadays, there are not nearly so many sheep; there are 132 forests, which cover more than 2,000,000 acres; and every autumn no fewer than 5,000 stags fall to the sportsmen's rifles. This, says Sir Herbert Maxwell, "is the result of the action of economic laws under the system of free imports. The extension of deer forests had no connection with the dislodgement of the crofters, who disappeared to make room for pastoral industry on a large scale. But for Free Trade, the Legislature would undoubtedly have maintained or imposed such duties on imported wool or mutton as would have protected the home industry of sheep farming. Foreign competition has reduced the price of mutton and wool to a point which renders sheep farming unremunerative. The utmost that has been done is to replace (sic) the shepherds who were originally imported from the Lowlands, and whose occupation ceases with the disappearance of sheep, by well-paid stalkers, gillies, and their families." Replace, in that sentence, is a slip of language; but, inadvertently, it states a reassuring consideration. In many cases the shepherds, their original occupation gone, have been kept on to tend the game and attend the sportsmen; and the social state of the Highlands has vastly improved since what are inconsiderately called "the good old times." The stags alone produce £250,000 yearly, which is more than twice the revenue of the whole of Scotland at the time when eager spirits sought to make the country prosperous by the ill-fated Darien Scheme; and at this day there are more happy homes in the glens and on the hill-sides of the Highlands than ever there were before. In these comforting facts lies our apology for having mentioned Free Trade. We name such affairs only when there is a ray of happiness or of hope in the drear lexicon of the gentlemen whom Lord Beaconsfield, in "Coningsby," called statesmongers.

The Sportsman as Writer.

FISHING AND SHOOTING. By Sydney Buxton. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

SUPPORTING himself on an ancient authority, Mr. Buxton avows a theory which we ourselves have cherished in secret. He approves the precept of Markham that "a skilful angler ought to be a general Scollar, and lern'd in all the Liberal Sciences, as a Grammarian, to know how either to write or discourse of his art, in true and fitting terms, either without affectation, or rudeness." We should like to explain and justify that proposition, and even to expand it into a theory that he who is skilful in angling is likely to be a master of high intellectual arts; but, as space enough is lacking, we must at present rest content with an expression of sorrow that Mr. Buxton has in certain respects been unfaithful to the doctrine which he accepted. When he raised a trout he says the fish was "risen." Unrelated participles in amazing abundance are scattered throughout his pages. For a whole chapter he writes in this way:—

You hurry through breakfast, and are soon ready, and by 9.30 o'clock you are down at the river. You are, you find, the only rod on the river that day, which, selfishly, gives you some pleasure, for there is a charm in the feeling that you can go where the whim takes you.

Seven "yous" in as many lines are at least six too many. They make us tired, and vicariously ashamed. Still, one must not deal harshly with Mr. Buxton. He is anxious to be a grammarian, and we take the will for the deed. Certainly he seems to be a good fisherman. He has cast angle into many waters, most notably into the chalk-streams of Hampshire; and he has a gift of reflecting on his sport entertainingly. To be sure, his reflections are not always convincing. "Dry-fly fishing," he writes, "has only been in general use for some ten or fifteen years; but if the Darwinian theory is good for anything, will it be only a matter of time before the southern trout cease to rise? The freest risers will be killed off; the tailers, the bulgers, the feeders on minnow and shrimp will survive. Has the principle of natural selection already begun to work?" One would think not. Tailers, bulgers, and feeders on minnow and shrimp are not distinct classes of trout. They are only trout in certain moods. When the fish are not tailing or bulging or grubbing, they are either resting at the bottom of the stream or taking insects on or slightly below the surface. In short, Mr. Buxton's words about "the Darwinian theory" and "the principle of natural selection," as possibly applicable to trout in relation to the sportsman, are absurd. If they were not so, they would afford serious reason for disapproving the dry-fly, upon which, like a good many other writers about angling, Mr. Buxton bestows much unscientific praise. Trout have risen at flies, natural and artificial, for centuries; and they will continue to do so. The menace to sport in the streams lies much less in the increasing wariness of the fish than in the dwindling of the waters. Agricultural drainage and the modern system of supplying large towns with water, which, as Sir Charles Dilke recently remarked in the House of Commons, have tended to make the Thames "an exhausted river," are affecting very many trout-streams similarly. That is a misfortune which we must endure in deference to the progress of civilisation. We had marked a good many other passages in Mr. Buxton's book, but have left ourselves with little more than space enough to say that we have read the whole of it with interest and as a rule with pleasure. The chapters on Shooting are by the author himself regarded as less serious than those on Angling; but, oddly, they are fresher. Perhaps that is because they were written with less effort and therefore with less artifice, greater naturalness. The pictorial illustrations by Mr. Archibald Thorburn are extremely good.

Mr. Canton's Poems.

THE COMRADES: POEMS OLD AND NEW. By William Canton. (Isbister. 5s.)

MR. WILLIAM CANTON'S name is already known and beloved by numbers for his books on the child whom he made the child of so many households—"W. V." As a poet he is also known, in a tender and quiet way, if to a less degree. "The Comrades" is a collection of poems with varying proportion of merit, in which strict selection, seemingly, has not been intended. Mr. Canton has rather poured out what had come to him, in a wild-wood fashion, content to leave selection with the reader. Art is not his note, indeed; and none of these poems bears the least sign of "composition." They appear obviously produced as they welled in the writer's mind, without heed to compacting, research of diction, or solicitude for perfect form. They have the advantages and disadvantages of this method. Their excellence is unequal: some are too diffuse, and carry too little weight of metal, to be more than fair occasional verse. But that the artless and unstudied manner is necessary to Mr. Canton is evident from the fact that he succeeds least in the longer and more formally shapen poems, as (for instance) "Pearls and Simples," which has the metrical form beloved by Matthew Arnold in his elegies. Here the diction is often too prosaic, too much of every day, for the grave and dignified metrical mould. It is in the briefer pieces, brought off in a beat or two of the wing (so to speak), that Mr. Canton finds himself. Nearly always these have a thought, an un-borrowed and individual thought, to give them value. It is, indeed, in the last lines or stanza that the poem often makes its effect, and with excellent result. The diction is simple and unsought, but admirably adequate, at the best, in its simple spontaneity of feeling. It is not in diction, however, as a whole that these poems excel. They scarcely attain the magic of expression which belongs to the perfect poet, but their simple tenderness of feeling, with that quality of personal thought which we have mentioned, at happy moments gives them a true and individual charm. "The Comrades" (the title-poem) has an effect of clinging regret which is enhanced by the haunting and unusual metre. Quotation wrongs its pathos; yet we must quote:—

In solitary rooms, when dusk is falling,
I hear from fields beyond the haunted mountains,
Beyond the unrepentable forests,—
I hear the voices of my comrades calling,
Home! home! home!

Strange ghostly voices, when the dust is falling,
Come from the ancient years; and I remember
The schoolboy shout, from plain and wood and river.
The signal-cry of scattered comrades, calling,
Home! home! home!

Many, it is probable, will not at first detect the all-but complete absence of rhyme, so well is the measure handled. But of Mr. Canton's more usual and personal style, here is a charming example, called "Any Mother":—

So sweet, so strange—so strange, so sweet
Beyond expression,
O little Blossom!
To sit and feel my bosom beat
With glad possession;
For you are ours, our very own,
None other's, ours;
God made you of our two hearts alone,
As God makes flowers
Of earth and sunshine,
O little Blossom!

That is a very sweet and rounded little lyric. Other poems are musing on that child-world which Mr. Canton loves well; so simply domestic in language that they seem intermediate between poems for children and poems on children. Of such is "The Great World"—the journey of a daring young explorer to the village-green. In these lovingly handled themes his readers of old will especially recognise Mr. Canton. Had we space, we would quote "The Stone Age," which shows him at his best—a tender piece of half-humorous musing. But this and other happy things, such as "Life and Death," we must leave to the reader's research.

STUART TRACTS, 1603-1693. With Introduction by C. H. Firth. (Constable. 4s. net.)

THE texts contained in this volume are reprinted from the "English Garner," published in eight volumes a quarter of a century ago by Prof. Arber. A note explains that the contents have been rearranged and classified under the supervision of Mr. Thomas Seccombe. The introductions are new.

The volume opens with Sir Robert Carey's account of the Death of Queen Elizabeth. Upon this follow three accounts of James' progress from the North to London. Two of the tracts illustrate the rise of the discontent out of which sprang the Civil War. Three, of which the first is from the hand of Sir Francis Vere, are narratives of campaigns and battles. The second is Lord Fairfax's posthumous Short Memorials of some things to be cleared during my Command in the Army, and A Short Memorial of the Northern Actions; a remarkable contrast to which, in tone and temper, is supplied by the boastful narrative of Major-General Morgan, one of his colonels, "a little man short and peremptory," who "spake with a very exile tone, and did cry out to the soldiers when angry with them, 'Sirrah, I'll cleave your skull,' as if the words had been prolated by a eunuch."

The narratives to which most readers will turn first are by sailors; not by admirals, but by unknown merchant seamen; and these furnish remarkable examples of the temper of seventeenth-century Englishmen. Robert Lyde is a lusty young man of twenty-three, but partly bald, who before starting upon his attempt to recover, with only the aid of a boy, the "Friend's Adventure" from the French prize crew of seven hands, throws away his cap that a blow, if he should be struck there, might kill, not stun, him; for he had had experience of the inside of a French prison. His account of the death struggle in the little low cabin is grimly precise; and he has a horribly vivid touch in the description of the wounded man, with the blood streaming from his forehead, "beating his hands upon the deck to make a noise, that the man at the pump might hear: for he could not cry nor speak." Of the two narratives of men unfortunate enough to be engaged in Monmouth's rebellion that by Henry Pitman, a surgeon, exiled to Barbadoes, manifestly furnished points to Defoe.

Mr. Firth's Introduction supplies an excellent appreciation of these human documents.

THE NEVER-ENDING WRONG: And Other Renderings of the Chinese from the Prose Translations of Prof. Herbert A. Giles. By L. Cranmer-Byng. (Richards. 5s. net.)

MR. CRANMER-BYNG has proved himself in his earlier work to be something of a poet, and this volume sustains, though it will hardly increase, his reputation. The author has feeling, some music, and a distinct sense of the elusive beauty and sadness of the world, but he has at the same time a certain vagueness of expression, a tenuity of ideas, which tend to give his work remoteness and obscurity. There is, also, rather too much straining. In his dedication to Prof. Giles, Mr. Cranmer-Bying says: "The purity of Your Excellency's prose will remain undimmed when this poor setting of rhyme is crumbled about its facets, and only the lustres of the gems remains. This is my one excuse—the excuse of him who seeing the golden lily feet of the beloved desires above all to encase them in rhyme of his own weaving." To talk of encasing "golden lily feet" in rhyme is to come very near talking nonsense.

Of the Chinese renderings we like least "The Never-Ending Wrong"; it is a poem well enough in idea, but full of the vagueness to which we have referred. Vagueness of sorts may, of course, be the highest art, as in "Khubla Khan," but it is not art in Mr. Cranmer-Byng's work. Yet some art he has, as the following lines entitled "A World Apart" will demonstrate:—

The lady moon is my lover,
My friends are the oceans four,
The heavens have roofed me over,
And the dawn is my golden door.
I would liefer follow the condor,
Or the seagull soaring from ken,
Than bury my godhead yonder
In the dust of the whirl of men.

This, too, is impressive of an autumn wind :—

then it swelled
 Into the roaring of great waves that smite
 The broken vanguard of the cliff: the rage
 Of storm-black tigers in the startled night
 Among the jackals of the wind and ruin.

In the section of the volume devoted to "English Poems" Mr. Cranmer-Byng returns to the note with which his earlier verse made us familiar; it is mainly a note of melancholy, of disillusion, of a mild paganism. This set of a sonnet, entitled "As in a Trance," suggests the tone:—

Give me the penance of an autumn gloom,
And hot September rains to sear desire,
And winds to shake the portals of that tomb
Where lies the idyll of a broken lyre ;
Then haply through the cloisters of my pain
The blind shall see the dead arise again.

We have had too much already of that kind of thing, and Mr. Cramner-Byng would do well to devote his undoubted talent to more masculine subjects.

AROUND THE WORLD THROUGH JAPAN. By Walter del Mar.
(A. and C. Black. 18s.)

THE book is largely of Japan, not the Japan of the enthusiast, but Japan westernised and top-hatted as seen by the observant globe-trotter who can enjoy the beauty and novelty of the land, and at the same time take note of eastern odours and imported decadence. The author has not the licensed flight of the poet nor the biased vision of the missionary; on the other hand, he does not wander wildly into discursive politics, and the result is a matter-of-fact book, a trifle judicial perhaps, but always acceptable. The material is arranged on a broad plan divided into convenient headings. The problems of the Far East, the Navy, the credit of Japan, and missionary work are dealt with briefly, but the general reader will grapple rather with the author's reflections on the eternal feminine. He describes the whole social system in detail, and enlarges upon the point of view of the Japanese and of the traveller of enquiring mind. All of which makes good reading, and a useful commentary is found in the statistics of the divorce court, the registrar, and the coroner. For instance, 124,000 divorces, 107,000 illegitimate children, and nearly 9,000 suicides might give the thoughtful Japanese food for reflection; but the Japanese has not a mathematical mind, and no appreciation of statistics. Moreover, he sees no reason for adopting the elastic moral code of the West. The concluding pages give hints to travellers, but the volume as a whole, provided with excellent photographs, affords ample compensation to the stay-at-home.

Fiction.

The Romance of Commerce.

THE PIT. By Frank Norris. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

MR. FRANK NORRIS had planned out a big scheme, and died after accomplishing but two-thirds of it. His idea was to write the epic of wheat, to trace its growing in the American West, its manipulation in Chicago, and its distribution in Europe. For he saw that commerce has its romance no less than warfare, and that the financial fighter is the modern equivalent to the knight in armour. Moreover, if man does not live by bread alone, bread is necessary, and its passage from the soil to the eater crosses innumerable interests. "The Octopus" was the first of the series, and dealt with the struggle between the farmer and the Railway Trust. This, "The Pit," is the second. On its way from grower to consumer the wheat has to pass through the Chicago Wheat Pit, where speculators gamble on the future price. Small material for romance, you may think, in the turn of the hand on the dial at the Chicago Board of Trade. But Laura, sitting in the Opera House, and listening to occasional scraps of talk over the Helmick failure, caught the romance underlying the market reports—and abruptly, midway between two phases of that music drama, of passion and romance, there came to Laura the swift and vivid impression of that other drama that simultaneously—even at that very moment—was working itself out close at hand, equally picturesque, equally romantic, equally passionate; but more than that, real, actual, modern, a thing in the very heart of the life in which she moved. And here he sat, this Jadwin, quiet, in evening dress, listening good-naturedly to this beautiful music, for which he did not care, to this rant and fustian, watching quietly all this posing and attitudinising. How small and petty it must all seem to him!

And how American is the attitude of the girl, of Jadwin, of the writer! For it takes an American to see the romance that underlies the business operation. Laura had three lovers, an artist, a broker's clerk, and Jadwin—a capitalist. She chose Jadwin. And it was Jadwin who was caught in the swirl of the gamble on futures; Jadwin, who beat time with a hymn book to the singing of his Sunday school. For the story is of an attempted corner in wheat. In the Wheat Pit—and Mr. Norris draws a really wonderful picture of a morning on that central floor of the cereal world—they do not see the wheat, they would not know what to do with it if they had to store the wheat they buy. But they bet what wheat will cost a week or a month hence. And Jadwin saw his way to buying up all the visible supply. It was not the want of money, for he had enough; it was the gambler's passion; and Jadwin for a short spell had the world's loaves in his hands. Now there is a situation for a novelist. Jadwin, for a moment, is a Napoleon, an Alexander, a Providence with the instincts of a devil. But Cressler, the dealer, was right when he maintained that wheat cannot be cornered by any means:—

First, for the reason that there is a great harvest of wheat somewhere in the world for every month in the year; and second, because the smart man who runs the corner has every other smart man in the world against him. And, besides, it's wrong; the world's food should not be at the mercy of the Chicago wheat pit.

It's wrong, and it's impossible. Mr. Norris brings these two points home in the manipulation of his story. The impossibility and the wrongness both rest on the limitations of the individual. No man can keep an eye on every grain of corn that comes into the market. And the man who tries to corner the world's supply of wheat is in danger of sacrificing what is more valuable to himself. What shall a man profit if he gain the whole world's wheat supply and lose his own Laura?

We have read this story with great interest, for it is one of the few that hit the balance of a man's life, which wavers ever between the world of action and the world of sentiment. We have read it, too, with a keen sense of regret that Mr. Norris did not live to complete his scheme. He was one of the very few novelists who have seen the romance underlying the market reports.

LORD LEONARD THE LUCKLESS. By W. E. NORRIS. (Methuen. 6s.)

MR. NORRIS' latest novel, skilled writer though he is, proves somewhat dull reading. As a story the end is from the beginning too unmistakable to arouse any great interest, and as a piece of psychology none of the characters repay the minute attention given to them. The virtuous heroine Juliet is shallow, stupid, and insensitive to a degree that renders the refinement of her upbringing almost a surprise. The girl whom "Leonard the Luckless" can never bring himself to treat as his daughter, though she is believed by the world to be so, is equally lacking in delicacy or refinement of temperament. The villainess—at one time Lady Leonard—is so outrageous in her offences against rudimentary good breeding, that credulity totters at the husband's tranquil indifference to it.

Lord Leonard is, of course, the central and important person of the book. He kept a diary, into which with characteristic coolness he would pour a deeply analytical and unflattering criticism of the lady who was the one woman in the world to him. Here, we venture to think, Mr. Norris' psychology is at least contestable. Lord Leonard, it is true, might easily have loved the lady without being necessarily blind to her deficiencies of character, but to sit down and at great length to enumerate them for mere personal gratification was a form of disloyalty that under the circumstances is difficult to credit. The writing is, of course, above reproach, and is always restrained and in places even polished, but it is at the writing, nevertheless, more than at the plot that the reader is inclined to cavil, for the style never for a moment uplifts and transfigures the essentially turpid and trivial theme it handles. Through an excessive avoidance of sentimentality, of anything in fact but a philosophic calm of manner, the aspect of life is here belittled; shorn of any redeeming graciousness, of even a rag of its essential pathos and dignity.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A CASTLE IN SPAIN.

By BERNARD CAFER.

Historical, dedicated to Mr. Henley "in token of some drastic kindness, some stimulating approval." The subtitle of this, Mr. Cape's tenth book, is "Certain Memoirs of Robin Lois, Ex-Major of His Majesty's 109th Regiment of Foot." It begins characteristically: "Light, for the little flunkey of demigods, dawned in old Provence. It did not augment itself by the flashes of cannon, as, a hundred and thirty leagues away in Royal Versailles, was the case with it on this same 27th of March in the year 1785." (Smith, Elder.)

WORLD'S PEOPLE.

By JULIEN GORDON.

A collection of thirteen stories, including a play, the scene being a drawing-room in New York, and the characters, Helen, "fifty-two, black stuff gown," and Isolt, "her married daughter, twenty-eight, elegant, striking street costume." The following explains the title: "As we turned our horses' heads from Lebanon, we asked a lad, who swung across a gate, the name of a distant village nestled among the hills. 'How can I tell,' drawled the young hypocrite, 'they're world's people.'" (Methuen.)

THE SQUIREEN.

By SHAN F. BULLOCK.

The story of a self-indulgent young Irishman, who, finding himself in difficulties, throws over his true love and marries for money; of the unhappy result and his tragic death. The Rector preached over him a sermon of pure eulogy. "Let the words stand," but could Martin have heard, maybe he had liked more the simpler tribute of his friends: "A bold lad, and he died like a man." (Methuen.)

CROPPIES LIE DOWN.

By W. BUCKLEY.

Historical, dealing with the Irish Rebellion of '98. Mr. Buckley has taken his title "Croppies Lie Down" from the famous song which did for Protestant Ireland what "The Wearing o' the Green" did for the Irish Catholics. The book begins: "The shimmering Slaney waters were radiant with many blended tints of sunset splendour as a cloudless day in May came to a fitting and most perfect close. The murmuring of bees in wayside gardens" &c. (Duckworth.)

FERELITH.

By LORD KILMARNOCK.

A tragic story with a reasonably happy ending, told by one of the chief actors—a woman. "It may seem unnatural that a woman, born in so lowly a station of life as was I, should have attained to any considerable facility with her pen, or had opportunity to discover and cultivate a taste for letters, or an appreciation of style." The plot of the story is on familiar lines, but it is treated with some distinction. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

Novelist Poets.

WE are reminded, by the recent publication of "Songs from the Novels of Thomas Love Peacock," of the time when a novelist, who was also a verse-writer, might introduce into his work his own efforts in the more exclusive medium. But that period seems to have passed; the novelist nowadays may write verse, but he does not star his prose with its finer radiance; rather he keeps it for the expression of his personal and most concentrated experience, and gives it to the world with no great hope that the world will take it at its true value. Exceptions there are, of course; Mr. Kipling's verse in point of popularity stands well up to the level of his prose; indeed, its appeal is popular. It exploits no fine philosophy, it reaches, as a rule, to none of those inner chambers of the house of life in which a man's soul broods over the incomprehensible, striving to transfuse dust with immortality, or with the fire of faith or hope. Mr. Kipling's genius is essentially personal and dramatic; he touches life profoundly, but he touches it rather as an observer than a participator; one cannot often lay one's finger on a passage and say: "Here speaks to us the individual out of the travail of his own soul." But certain novelist-poets of our own day have so spoken; two are happily with us now, the third has passed into silence: we mean Mr. Meredith, Mr. Hardy, and Robert Louis Stevenson. These three are essentially poets, but poets with qualities of their age and environment which set them upon the wider track of the novel. It is possible that if, say, Keats and Shelley had been of this or the last two generations they, too, might have endeavoured to express themselves in the form of romance; it would not, we think, have been good romance, but it is probable that the current might have swept them in. It is always something of a wonder to us that Browning never wrote a novel—that so acute a mind, so keen and probing an intelligence, should not have attempted expression in the broad fields of fiction. Tennyson, on the other hand, we cannot conceive as a writer of the story in prose, and the same applies to certain of our younger living writers. We do not look to Mr. Davidson or to Mr. Watson or to Mr. Thompson for novels; within very narrow limits it is possible that each might succeed, but the result, we suspect, would be considerable and unequal. Mr. Le Gallienne, with more adaptability, has written a certain kind of romance, but it has been romance without virility, a mere embroidery of sentiment. In "An Old Country House," the latest of his prose ventures, we have sentiment, sentiment, and again sentiment. It is all very pretty, very graceful, very superficial, and there's an end.

But with the poetry of the three men we have named, as with their prose, we touch entirely different ground. Mr. Meredith's philosophy, it is true, has matured, but it has never changed. Always he has insisted upon nature not only as the inspirer, but also as the universal mother, healer, and friend. His is the optimism of renewal, of growth, of endeavour. Nature never yet betrayed her true and striving children. For the inert, the stubbornly foolish, the craven, she has no pity; participation in her scheme, in her real joy of life, are not for these; she overrides their littleness with the calm indifference of true greatness. To the timid terrors lurk in every shadow, and the worst of all timidity is the timidity of the soul. Such is the lesson of the "Woods of Westermain," with its terrific and sinister conclusion; such, too, is the lesson of all that packed and sometimes laboured achievement in verse which is Mr. Meredith's evangel. And the meaning of the novels is equally clear; not that Mr. Meredith drives home his reading of life with the wearying insistence of a preacher; his method is to amplify by illustration drawn from every phase of existence, from every experience of the spirit. And always he has at heart that corrective spirit of comedy which checks the too aspiring soul and brings it back to the wholesome facts of earth and our humanity. "Love born of Knowledge" is the test of all:—

And why the sons of Strength have been
Her cherished offspring ever; how
The Spirit served by her is seen
Through Law; perusing love will show.

Love born of Knowledge, love that gains
Vitality as Earth it mates,
The meaning of the Pleasures, Pains,
The Life, the Death, illuminates.

For love we Earth, then serve we all;
Her mystic secret then is ours:
We fall, or view our treasures fall,
Uncloaked, as beholds her flowers

Earth, from a night of frosty wreck,
Enrobed in morning's mounted fire,
When lowly, with a broken neck,
The crocus lays her cheek to mire.

In the case of Mr. Meredith the poet is always present, so that we may turn from the pure lyricism of "Love in the Valley" to certain passages in "Beauchamp's Career" or in "Vittoria" without a change of mood. The concluding pages of "Vittoria" reach a height of reserved and penetrative beauty which we find it impossible to read at any time without profound emotion. They are pages which purify and exalt.

To pass from Mr. Meredith to Mr. Hardy is completely to change the outlook; it is to pass from an optimism checked by knowledge to a pessimism which appears equally founded upon knowledge. Yet the experience of the world is with Mr. Meredith rather than with Mr. Hardy,—else, we might suppose, the world would hardly have had the heart to continue an unequal and entirely inglorious fight. Mr. Hardy's gloom, at any rate as expressed in his novels, has grown upon him; there were hints of it in "Far from the Madding Crowd" and "The Woodlanders," but those hints have grown in the later books to be statements of a kind of unmitigated despair. In Mr. Hardy's verse the misery was always present: poems dated 1866 have the note of "Jude the Obscure." As a poet Mr. Hardy will hardly stand comparison with Mr. Meredith or Stevenson; he does not move freely in bonds; indeed, even in prose, he never seems to use his material as a material infinitely plastic, and capable of both wide and subtle gradations. Yet few writers have produced more vital effects, effects all the more powerful because of their uncompromising reality. Glamour Mr. Hardy undoubtedly has, but it is a glamour penetrated by a personality which seems instinctively to disbelieve in the beauty which it is impelled to express. Mr. Hardy's gospel is the gospel of endurance, an endurance without hope and scarcely capable of any happy amelioration. His outlook seems to be as much towards the abyss as that of James Thomson in "The City of Dreadful Night." He is environed, as it were, by the barriers of personality,—which is true of all of us, but certain barriers may be over-leaped. In "The Impercipient (at a Cathedral Service)" we read :—

That from this bright believing band
An outcast I should be,
That faiths by which my comrades stand
Seem fantasies to me,
And mirage-mists their Shining Land,
Is a drear destiny.

Why thus my soul should be consigned
To infelicity,
Why always I must feel as blind
To sights my brethren see,
Why joys they've found I cannot find,
Abides a mystery.

Yet I would bear my shortcomings
With meet tranquillity,
But for the charge that blessed things
I'd liefer have unhe,
O, doth a bird deprived of wings
Go earth-bound wilfully!

Enough. As yet disquiet clings
About us. Rest shall we.

What do those poignant verses lack? The answer must be, sympathetic imagination. And it is in that lack of personal sympathetic imagination that Mr. Hardy's limitations mainly consist. Of dramatic imagination he has no lack at all; yet often he leaves us cold, with a sense of aching misery, as in the conclusion of "I Look Into My Glass":—

But Time, to make me grieve,
Part steals, lets part abide;
And shakes this fragile frame at eve
With throbbings of noontide.

In that condition there should be no sadness, but rather a sense of kingdoms conquered and joy in still unextinguished fire.

Stevenson as a poet has hardly yet come into his own. His extraordinary success as a writer of stirring and brilliant romance has, for the moment, overshadowed his claim to be fully recognised as a poet of rare art and captivating personality. No braver, more human verse has been printed in our time. In a way its philosophy is Mr. Meredith's philosophy, yet it has more of the adventurous in action in it, of "the open road and the bright eyes of danger." Much, perhaps too much, has been written of Stevenson's indomitable courage; we have been told that it is a man's business to be brave, and that in that Stevenson was no greater than other men. And with that statement, no doubt, Stevenson would have been the first to agree. Yet to think of that long list of vivid and alert romances, and then to turn to the three slim volumes of verse, is to be assured that here was a man whose spirit was moulded to the finest issues by fires hardly less scarring than penitential flames :—

God, if this were enough,
That I see things bare to the buff
And up to the buttocks in mire;
That I ask nor hope nor hire,
Nut in the husk,
Nor dawn beyond the dusk,
Nor life beyond death:
God, if this were faith?

Yet he still accepted the "iniquitous" lists

With joy, and joy to endure and to be withstood
And still to battle and perish for a dream of good;

and he could also write, in words which carry absolute conviction :—

The breeze from the embalmed land
Blows sudden toward the shore,
And claps my cottage door.
I hear the signal, Lord—I understand.
The night at Thy command
Comes. I will eat and sleep and will not question more.

We have been able to do no more than touch upon certain points in the tendencies of three modern writers, who have chosen to express themselves in the novel form, yet have at the same time given to verse some of their best thoughts and most perfect art. The tendency of all exalted expression is towards poetry, and in an age when the novel reigns it is sometimes well to remember the fact. If the novels of the three writers whom we have particularly considered were suddenly and irrevocably lost to us, we should still find in their verse the essence of all that they had to say.

Books Too Little Known.

The Cuchullin Saga.

A book that is little spoken of, a book that does not make too many concessions to the ordinary reader, and one that is placed among the score of books the present writer would least willingly part with, is that fine piecemeal translation of the Irish Iliad, "The Cuchullin Saga," compiled and edited by Miss Eleanor Hull for Mr. David Nutt's "Grimm Library" (1898). A good deal of attention has been bestowed lately on Lady Gregory's "Cuchulain of Muirthemne," a popular recension which takes the reader over much the same ground of early Irish romance that Miss Hull's compilation had previously covered. We are by no means ungrateful to Lady Gregory for her enthusiastic labours, and if in point of style and of fidelity to the spirit of the great Irish epic we adjudge her translation inferior to Miss Hull's collected version, let the reader understand that it is not because we rank her book low, but because we place Miss Hull's very high. Lady Gregory has undoubtedly succeeded in the difficult task of boiling and dressing the pagan roast meats to suit a modern table, and her skill has justly earned for her the praise of many hundreds of people who do not demand that the translation shall be absolutely faithful to the spirit of these old Irish pagan Sagas. We therefore hasten to say that nobody can lay an indictment at Lady Gregory's door in asking: What is this spirit of the Irish Iliad that a translator may be true to? Some men will say one thing and some men will say another, and if we venture here to give some reasons why we set Miss Hull's book first and Lady Gregory's second, we do it knowing that Lady Gregory has many skilful champions ranged on her side, such as Mr. Yeats, Mr. Stephen Gwynn, and Mr. Arthur Symonds, champions with whom it is an honour to break a lance.

Mr. Stephen Gwynn in his essay, "Celtic Sagas Retold," has stated the main issue with his usual admirable clearness :—

I had previously essayed it [the story of Cuchulain] several times in the best versions I could come at, and got no pleasure except from the single lay which tells the fate of Deirdre. . . . I owe to Lady Gregory's skill—and thousands will probably acknowledge the same debt—the vision of Cuchulain in his beauty, his terror, his charm. . . . Those who are connoisseurs in literature rather than simply lovers of poetry will prefer the literal version which keeps the quaintness, the crude savour of primitive literature—though for my own part I think that barbarisms, which in the original even of Homer fall naturally into their place, acquire a disturbing salience in translation.

This is excellently put, and it suggests a further question. If Lady Gregory's version does not keep the quaintness, the crude savour of primitive literature, what does it put in its place? Must not the Cuchullin Saga become transformed in its barbaric spirit under the influence of a modern taste that rejects its "crude savour"? We think this is the answer we must arrive at. Mr. Stephen Gwynn argues that Lady Gregory in her "task of conciliation" has done for the Irish epic what the Welsh bards under Norman influence did for the Mabinogion—but is not the analogy rather stretched? The chasm between our modern civilised society and that ancient Irish society to which the blood-stained tribal forays of the Cuchullin Saga appeared as realities of daily life, is so profound that it may be doubted whether a Victorian can possibly make a "recension" of the sagas of Beowulf's day without destroying their tone. And this is what we think Lady Gregory has done. Admirable her adaptation may indeed be in respect to modern literary taste, admirable in retaining so much of the original beauty and poetry of these early Irish romances, but we must not be surprised if the price we have to pay for appeasing or conciliating thousands of modern readers is simply that the very spirit of this barbaric literature has mysteriously and gently transformed itself to please modern requirements. It is not merely that Lady Gregory has omitted "certain amplifications of description," "clumsy iterations of incident," artistic "blunders" (in Mr. Stephen Gwynn's phrase), it is not merely that she has (to quote her preface) "left out a good deal that I thought you would not care about for one reason or another"; it is rather that in part by her omissions and condensations, and in part by her adoption of Irish peasant forms of speech, she has actually modernised the original. If we find, then, in her versions generally a certain levelling softness of tone, an affection for colloquialisms in her characters' language, a strong disposition to retain all that goes to make a beautiful picture and a disposition to reject or to modify all that is grimmest, wildest, and most uncompromising, we shall be able to see how this mysterious, and to many readers welcome transformation in the character of the Cuchullin Saga has come about. Let us give a passage from Miss Hull's version which Lady Gregory's passes over almost entirely:—

"THE APPEARANCE OF THE MORRIGU."

MISS HULL'S VERSION, pp. 103, 104.

When Cuchullin lay in sleep in Dún Imrid he heard a cry sounding out of the north, a cry terrible and fearful to his ears. Out of a deep slumber he was aroused by it so suddenly, that he fell out of his bed upon the ground like a sack, in the east wing of the house.

He rushed forth without weapons, until he gained the open air, his wife following him with his armour and his garments. He perceived Laegh in his harnessed chariot coming towards him from Festa Laig in the north. "What brings thee here?" said Cuchullin. "A cry that I heard sounding across the plain," said Laegh. "From which direction?" said Cuchullin. "From the north-west," said Laegh, "across the great highway leading to Caill Cuan." "Let us follow the sound," said Cuchullin.

(We have only space here to give one of the three pages of Cuchullin's conversation with the Morrighu.)

" . . . " said the hero—

"I shall strike down their warriors.
I shall fight their battles.
I shall survive the Tain!"

"How wilt thou manage that?" said the woman, "for when thou art engaged in a combat with a man as dexterous, as terrible, as untiring, as noble, as brave, as great as thyself, I will become an eel, and I will throw a noose round thy feet in the ford, so that heavy odds will be against thee." "I swear by the God by whom the Ultonians swear," said Cuchullin. "that I will bruise thee against a green stone of the ford; and thou never shall have any remedy from me if thou leavest me not." "I shall also become a grey wolf for thee, and I will take (. . . ?) from thy right hand, as far as thy left arm." "I will encounter thee with my spear," said he. "until thy left or right eye is forced out; and thou shall never have help from me if thou leavest me not." "I will become a white, red-eared cow," said she, "and I will go into the pond beside the ford, in which thou art in deadly combat with a man as skilful in feats as thyself, and a hundred white, red-eared cows behind me," &c. &c.

Now, when Mr. Yeats says (and I must here own to be an old friend of Mr. Yeats and an admirer of his work) in his preface to Lady Gregory's book:—

Lady Gregory has done her work of compression and selection so firmly and reverently that I cannot believe that anybody, except for a scientific purpose, will need another text than this, or than the version of it the Gaelic League has begun to publish in modern Irish—

I must beg leave to differ from his conclusions with a reverent and a humble firmness. The force, the meaning, the quality, the very essence and genius of the Irish original, "The Appearance of the Morrighu," is done away with in Lady Gregory's adaptation. The wild, fierce, free spirit of Irish paganism is attenuated, and something that is prudently English has taken its place. Lest anybody should infer that we are judging Lady Gregory on the evidence of a single passage we invite our readers to turn to others, such as—

The Death of Deirdré. Miss Hull, p. 53. Lady Gregory, p. 139. The Wooing of Emer. Miss Hull, p. 62. Lady Gregory, p. 22. Mesgegra's Combat with Conall. Miss Hull, pp. 92, 93. Lady Gregory (no version given). Calatin's Children. Miss Hull, pp. 240, 251. Lady Gregory, p. 330.

And they will find that for the racy flavour of the original version a somewhat tame, over-refined, and semi-modern abbreviation has been substituted. We do not blame Lady Gregory for these abbreviations. She herself says in her preface "I have left out a good deal that I thought that you would not care about for one reason or another," and if she has not rendered faithfully the savage fierceness of the Morrighu and has passed over entirely the wonderful combat between Mesgegra and Conall cernach, it is only fair to say that Miss Hull has also had a moment of weakness, and in "The Wooing of Emer" has thought it fit "to omit a few passages that might wound modern susceptibilities." Really, these modern susceptibilities! how beautiful they are, and how unnecessary! What an extraordinary thing it is that an age which delights in the "Visits of Elizabeth" should find it necessary to blush, and turn away its innocent head from the chaste severity of thirty lines in a barbaric saga! Miss Hull has, however, had the great good sense to see that the racy version of Dr. Whitley Stokes' "Siege of Howth" must be retained, and as we consider that the combat of Mesgegra with Conall cernach is one of the finest things in the whole Cuchullin cycle, so free, wild, savage is it, yet recounted with a strange delicacy, we extract the episode which Lady Gregory omits:—

Now as he went out of the ford, westwards, Conall cernach "the Victorious" entered it from the east. "Art thou there, O Mesgegra?" said Conall. "I am here," said the King; "I claim my brothers from thee," said Conall. "I do not carry them (i.e. their skulls) in my girdle," said Mesgegra. "That is a pity," said Conall. "It were not champion-like," said Mesgegra, "to fight with me, who have but one hand." "My hand shall be tied to my side," said Conall. Triply was Conall cernach's hand tied to his side. And each smote the other till the river was red with their blood. But the sword-play of Conall prevailed. "I perceive that thou wilt not go, O Conall," said Mesgegra, "till thou takest my head with thee. Put thou my head above thy head, and add my glory to thy glory." . . . Then Conall got alone into his chariot, and his charioteer into Mesgegra's chariot. They go forward then into Nachtar Fine till they meet fifty women, namely Buan, Mesgegra's wife, with her maidens, coming southwards from the border. "Whose art thou, O woman?" said Conall. "I am the wife of Mesgegra, the King." "It hath been enjoined on thee to come with me," said Conall. "Who hath enjoined me?" said the woman. "Mesgegra," said Conall. "Hast thou brought a token with thee?" said she. "Behold his chariot and his horses," said Conall. "Many are they on whom he bestows treasures," said the woman. "Behold then his head," said Conall. "Now am I lost to him!" she said, &c.

For the superb ending we must refer the reader to Miss Hull's book.

Now this is as characteristic of the aristocratic pagan Irish in its quality as the chapter "Skarphedinn's Death" in "The Story of Burnt Njal" is characteristically Norse. It is both fierce and tender, wild and refined in its feeling. Note how the bardic narrator, unlike the Scandinavian scalds, is on the side of the conquered man, and how Buan, Mesgregra's wife, is not allowed to fall into the conqueror's hand. How subtle and noble is Mesgregra's acknowledgment of his defeat: "I perceive that thou wilt not go, O Conall, till thou takest my head with thee. Put thou my head above thy head, and add my glory to thy glory." That touch of the King allowing his gillie to sleep first, the proud response of Buan to Conall, "Many are they on whom he bestows treasures," the incisive artistic shaping of this tragic episode, so savagely strong yet so delicate—all this suggests that any touch of superadded nineteenth century softening culture on the translator's part would be precisely its artistic destruction. Now this translation we owe to Dr. Whitley Stokes, and it is the translation of a master. The most superb passage in Lady Gregory's and in Miss Hull's compilations is undoubtedly the Death of Cuchullin, and on comparing them closely, though we own to a preference for Miss Hull's, we find that both ladies have followed Dr. Whitley Stokes so closely that the glory of the achievement is his and no other's. After some little experience of the translations of Irish romances put forward by the little band of learned scholars, we have no hesitation in saying that Dr. Whitley Stokes' and Dr. Kuno Meyer's versions seem to us to set a standard which surpasses all others. Dr. Joyce and Dr. Hyde and Mr. Standish Hayes O'Grady have done most excellent work, each in their separate departments, but we can find nothing in "Old Celtic Romances," "A Literary History of Ireland," or in "Silva Gadelica" to touch Dr. Whitley Stokes and Dr. Kuno Meyer's specimen tales from "The Cuchullin Saga," or the last mentioned scholar's "The Vision of MacConglinne." If the reader really wants to taste the wild flavour, the free charm of early and mediæval Irish literature, he must turn to the Cuchullin saga and to MacConglinne vision. If he wants to understand the charm of Irish peasant poetry he must turn to Dr. Hyde's Connacht Love Songs (the prose versions); if he wishes to understand how the old Celtic romances lived on as an abiding tradition in the rougher peasant minds of the Gaelic-speaking population he must turn to "Waifs and Strays of Celtic Tradition."

To conclude, "The Cuchullin Saga," though it can be examined and enjoyed in Miss Hull's compilation, exists there only in piecemeal and skeleton form. What we want most is the translation of the central tale, "The Tain Bo Cuailgne," promised by the German scholar, Dr. Windisch; and next what we want is a translation of many of those romances marked in Miss Hull's chart of the Cuchullin Saga as extant but untranslated. How many years are we to wait? It is melancholy to think that the noblest and the greatest literature Ireland has produced is in the earliest, the most pagan cycle. Therefore it is that we fear any modernisation of its spirit. "Amplifications of description," "clumsy iterations of incident," can be cleared away from the context along with genealogical catalogues and mere topographical information; but the tone, the tone of the Irish Iliad ought to be no less sacred than the tone of the great classics. And the Cuchullin Saga is to Ireland what the Edda is to Iceland, or the Nibelungen Lied is to Germany. You cannot improve on the tone of the Irish bards of the eleventh century. You can adapt them for the use of people who cannot assimilate the spirit of the original, and it is this feat that Lady Gregory has skilfully performed. We repeat we are not ungrateful to Lady Gregory, we feel sure that her adaptations will open the eyes of many thousands of people who would never have heard of Cuchullin but for her aid; but we hope that her readers will make further explorations, and journey on till they can appreciate Dr. Whitley Stokes' and Dr. Kuno Meyer's incomparable versions. Meanwhile we ask for an expanded edition of Miss Hull's "Cuchullin Saga." Let Mr. Nutt see to it, and let those who want fine literature not rest till they have read and made acquaintance with "The Cuchullin Saga" and with "The Vision of MacConglinne." EDWARD GARNETT.

Impressions.

XIX.—Progress.

It was long since I had seen the old man. How had the winter served him? If, as I feared, rheumatism had held him to his cottage through the wet weeks, then my news would cheer. For as I walked through the woods I had met the first signs of spring—here a crocus just pushing through the earth, there a primrose, and in a cottage garden a splash of yellow aconite. Spring was coming. That was something to tell him.

But the cottage was empty, so I climbed the hill, sure that I knew where to find him. He was sitting on a log, but there was that in his face that checked speech. In truth it was an ill-pleasing sight that met my eyes. Trees littered the ground on every side: some lay undisturbed where they fell, on others the saw had already been at work, and in the midst of the clearing a great excavation was being dug for the new reservoir. The men had ceased work for the day, but their paraphernalia for digging was scattered about, and everything was smirched with the oozy yellow clay. That clearing in the wood was like a battlefield with fallen trees instead of men, and Jonathan, who had known those trees all his life, felt their death as if they had been comrades. Time, of course, would make all seemly. Far below I could see other reservoirs, three of them, that had been finished many years, and already new trees were growing about their banks. Very beautiful, from that height, looked the still blue water that filled those old reservoirs. This I hinted to Jonathan, but he was too old to permit the future to atone for the present. "I've known them trees," he said, "for seventy years, and to see them now lying there, and the saw going at them, why—it's cruel. Water, more water, what do simple folk want with a constant supply? I've drawn all the water I want from the well since I was a boy, and I've sat under them trees all my life. Now they're being cut up into planks; and folk will forget that there were ever any trees here. There was a piece of poetry you once read to me about asking the earth not to forget." I humoured him:—

Forget not, Earth, thy disappointed Dead!
Forget not, Earth, thy disinherited!
Forget not the forgotten!

"Go on," he said—

Imperial Future, when in countless train
The generations lead thee to thy throne,
Forget not the Forgotten and Unknown.

He rose and led the way through the wood where here we saw a primrose, and there a crocus, but the old man was not in the mood to welcome spring. On he strode making for the Father of the Forest, and I knew whither he was going. He paused before the old oak, and gazed mutely at the great trunk. "You can't tell how old this tree be. Five hundred years growing, five hundred years standing still, and five hundred years decay. This one's waiting. He hasn't growed for a hundred years." The old man looked up at the branches, then said quietly—"He endured as seeing Him who is invisible."

Drama.

The Dislike of Tragedy.

THE theme of "The Light that Failed," if I understand it correctly, is one which Mr. Kipling has used elsewhere, and which lends itself eminently to dramatic treatment. It is a theme of conflict, the conflict upon the stage of the human soul, limited by its "here" and "now," of two assertive and aggressive instincts, which may be conveniently named the pride of work and the pride of life. It is perhaps in the artist type, although by no means in that alone, as "The Story of the Gadsbys," not to speak of a much greater achievement, Mr. Meredith's "Modern Love," shows, that this conflict is most clearly defined. Dick Helder and Maisie, who in childhood have wandered the sea-shore and dreamed their dreams together, are both artists. The formative years have separated them. But Dick at least has not forgotten, and when, after the strenuous life of a special correspondent and painter of battle-pictures, he meets Maisie again, the memory flames into a passion. Dick has a big soul. There is room within it for the pride of life and the pride of work to coexist. He can paint and love at once; and the service of his lady spurs him on to his masterpiece, the picture of Melancholia. But Maisie is made of smaller stuff. She, too, would have fame, and is painting a rival Melancholia. She is exquisite, but her nature is essentially a hard and narrow one, and the artistic ambition wholly occupies it, leaving no margin for the play of the human forces. She accepts all Dick's services and devotion, and gives nothing in return but thanks and the sweetest of smiles. The stresses are in equilibrium, until a new impulse brings about a crisis. Dick becomes the sport of one of those grim jests of destiny, whose activity is sufficiently normal in human affairs not to be out of place in a typical picture. An Arab sword-cut received in the Soudan brings upon him, first the horror of blindness, staved off temporarily by alcohol while he finishes the Melancholia, and then, at a blow, blindness itself. The artist is broken. Dick is thrown back upon the man, and the man means inevitably Maisie. Does Maisie respond? Obviously not: Maisie is what she is. The stroke of destiny, which has shattered Dick's being to the foundations, has left her unscathed. Her art, which, as irony will have it, is actually worth nothing at all, is still everything to her; and from the studio near Paris, to which she has retired, she makes no sign. There is no choice for Dick but to creep into the darkness, alone, as best he may. In Mr. Kipling's original version of the story, if I remember aright, he does not, strictly speaking, creep, but gallops, with the lust of blood before his eyes, on a camel, in the Soudan.

Well, the motive is not unfit to move the heart with that grave and composed terror which is the end of tragedy. How then does it bear transplantation into the conditions of a popular play by George Fleming, with "sympathetic" parts for Mr. Forbes Robertson and Miss Gertrude Elliott, at the Lyric? The piece is not without its merits, even apart from those which are merely a matter of mimicry. Unfortunately they are almost all of an episodic character. All the part concerning Bessie Broke, the girl whom Dick picks off the streets and who destroys his Melancholia by way of revenge because he has kept his friend Torpenhow out of her arms, is excellently done. But the destruction of the picture does not affect the issues of the play one whit. Torpenhow is good, too, and the red-haired girl, Maisie's friend, who does love Dick, hopelessly. These, too, are comparatively unessential, and I cannot persuade myself that what really matters is well done at all. The first act, which ought to make it clear what a fine fellow, potentially, Dick was, actually only shows him already suffering from the effects of the Arab sword cut and calling out for Maisie and the glory of the world in a delirium. For the rest, it is devoted to a miscellaneous all-round-the-shop conversation by a number of war-correspondents at the door of a tent, which suggests itself as a rather ridiculous parody of many similar conversations by white-shirt-fronted gentlemen over the cigarettes and wine in the plays of Mr. Pinero and Mr. Oscar Wilde. The passage about Dick's struggle to keep body and soul together in London and achieve success upon a diet of sausage and mashed potatoes, which helps in the book to show the grit he is made of, is left out of the play. The result is that he has hardly captured one's sympathies before they are called upon to grapple with the big scene in which his eyesight goes. The effectiveness of this is further spoilt by the fact that he is represented as under the influence of drink throughout, a device which is rarely successful on the stage, and by which more is certainly lost in the present case than is gained. I have, however, hitherto concealed the great and crowning crime—il gran rifiuto—of the whole performance. The tragedy is not allowed to be a tragedy at all. The inevitable and holy sequence of cause and effect is suspended. Maisie's conduct is deflected from the straight line which her character inexorably prescribes for her. At the news of Dick's blindness, brought by the faithful Torpenhow, she throws up her art, hurries back to London, flings herself into his arms, confesses her past naughtiness, and undertakes to make amends with the devotion of her future. And so we file into the street, those at least of us, the great majority, who have no fear of truth before our eyes, with the tear of pathos still wet upon our cheeks and a glow of satisfied sentimentality in our hearts.

Now, it is of no use for me to point out to Mr. Kipling and to Miss Fletcher that, Maisie being what she was, this end cannot really be the end, and that the sudden softening of her hard and selfish little heart can only operate to defer Dick's tragedy, not to annul it. Of course they know that as well as I do, and they only pervert the truth out of a belief, whether well or ill-founded, that the London public will not stand tragedy. On Mr. Kipling's part in the matter I do not wish to dwell. He has Sir Pandarus of Troy become. It is contemptible, and there is an end of it. But what I do want to say is, that if this estimate of the taste of the public is the true one (and about that I am not at all sure), if even the prestige of two such attractive players as Mr. Forbes Robertson and Miss Elliott will not induce the average Londoner to subdue his soul to the purifying and chastening influences of tragedy for a couple of hours now and again, then what is one to do but despair of the salvation of the drama through the commercial theatre, and throw in one's lot with those who aspire to work out that salvation upon some other basis than that of the cash nexus and the haggle of the market? What that basis is to be is a difficult question enough. The deadening influences and inevitable classical bias of State endowment hardly commend themselves, and such experiments as the Stage Society seem generally to perish of a surfeit of Mr. Bernard Shaw. Perhaps the Guild of Letters, which Mr. Herbert Trench so manfully advocates in the columns of "The Author," will come to the rescue, and provide us with a stage which is at once reverent, modern, and sincere.

Leonardo the Persistent.

"THAT vast dark continent called Leonardo." I do not know who originated this expressive phrase, but it came back to me on reading that the items at the sale of the late Lionel Johnson's library included a series of first editions of Walter Pater's works, notably "Studies in the History of the Renaissance." It may be due to early associations, but there has always seemed to be a subtle bond of sympathy between Leonardo da Vinci and Pater. His essay is but thirty odd pages, but how it shines across "that dark, vast continent called Leonardo," lighting the tracks, and illuminating facets, if not revealing all the personality of that strange genius. Certain phrases linger in the memory—"he was smitten with a love of the impossible—the perforation of mountains, changing the course of rivers, raising great buildings"; or "curiosity and the desire of beauty—these are the two elementary forces of Leonardo's genius"; or perhaps that magical page interpreting the meaning of "Mona Lisa": "It is a beauty wrought out from within upon the flesh, the deposit, little cell by cell, of strange thoughts and fantastic reveries and exquisite passions. . . . She is older than the rocks among which she sits; like the vampire, she has been dead many times, and learned the secrets of the grave; and has been a diver in deep seas, and keeps their fallen day about her . . . ;" or perhaps that last page of the essay where Pater pauses, just for a moment, to consider the precise form of Leonardo's religion, and to ask whether Francis the First was present at his death, and straightway forgets these questions in speculating "how one who had been always so desirous of beauty, but desired it always in such definite and precise forms, as hands or flowers or hair, looked forward now into the vague land, and experienced the last curiosity."

Leonardo's life, says Pater, in a sudden facing of facts, has three divisions—thirty years at Florence, nearly twenty years at Milan, then nineteen years of wandering. His sojourn at Milan is fixed in the memory of every visitor to that city. All go out to the Church of Saint Mary of the Graces and gaze at what is left of the "Last Supper" painted on the damp wall of the refectory, oozing with mineral salts. Perhaps some still have the curiosity to read Goethe's elaborate description and criticism of this picture, which is certainly Leonardo's own, as is the "Mona Lisa" at the Louvre; but the higher criticism looks askance at "Our Lady of the Rocks" in the National Gallery. Curious it is how this man who was painter, poet, sculptor, architect, mechanist, mathematician, philosopher and explorer, crosses the path of the modern. I pick up a book on "The Early Mountaineers": I open it at random and find the well-known portrait of Leonardo reproduced from the drawing by himself. It faces a chapter containing an account of Leonardo as a mountaineer, based on certain fragmentary passages from his literary works which give an account of his ascent of "Monboso, a peak of the Alps which divide France from Italy." Numerous articles have been written endeavouring to identify "Monboso," and numerous articles are now being written on a delightful book, just published, which attempts a fresh exploration of "that vast dark continent called Leonardo." That book is Mr. Theodore A. Cook's "Spirals in Nature and Art" published by Mr. Murray.

The sub-title of this volume has ten lines to itself, but let not the lay reader be deterred by those seventy odd words, or by the title. Or by Mr. Cook's too modest statement that he knows "little history, less architecture, scarcely any mathematics, and no morphology or botany whatever." He knows a good deal of all these subjects: he also has enthusiasm, and the power to stimulate the imagination of the reader. The gravest charge that can be brought against him is that he has attempted to prove what can be neither proved nor disproved. Architecture is his hobby: the study of its beauty and wonder has filled many of his days: from sheer love and interest in the art he has trespassed on the lands that the professional architect regards as his own tillage. Had Mr. Cook been content just to write a text-book upon Spiral Formations in Nature and Art he would have produced a reliable handbook on a fascinating subject, and his reward would have been a few lines of criticism in small type in half-a-dozen journals. But he also has imagination, there is something of the poet in him; these qualities, although vastly to the advantage of the unprofessional reader, have brought down on him the reproofs of the pedants who, while peering earnestly into undergrowth, are apt to forget to look up at the sky above the trees.

The structure of the book is best explained by relating an anecdote. One day at a dinner of biologists at Oxford Mr. Cook produced for inspection an engraving of the beautiful spiral staircase in the wing of Francois the First, Château de Blois, Touraine. A member of the party, after looking closely at the engraving, announced that the curves upon the central column of the staircase were, what do you think? identical with those of Voluta resperitilo. Most guests would have nodded, smiled intelligently, and been content to forget this scrap of learning. Not so Mr. Cook: he desired to know more, and dared to hint at his "ignorance of what Voluta might be." A specimen of the shell was procured, a longitudinal incision was made, and the four-fold spiral upon the columella was revealed. This chance discovery made an indelible impression on the mind of "the unlearned guest." The conversation flitted away from shells and staircases, but the connection between shells and staircases remained with him. The possibility that the staircase at Blois had been originally suggested by a shell turned his thoughts to other spiral staircases and other shells. Thus the germ of the book: soon it was to grow from within to without as a book should.

Then Leonardo the persistent flashed his personality across the author's vision in this wise. The man who owned this shell and made the staircase was surely an architect of powerful originality and an artist of extraordinary imagination—"a student of biology who collected natural objects with a determination to penetrate the secret of their beauty," and who used them as models for his designs. He must have been a student of nature, who went straight to the source instead of dipping his cup into the river muddied by the paddling and splashing of other men, and, above all, he must have been a man in whom the instinct, and the desire, for beauty was paramount. Such a man was Leonardo da Vinci who died in exile at Amboise, some twenty miles from Blois, a year or two after this very staircase was begun.

Having decided that Leonardo designed the Blois staircase, Mr. Cook set out, if not actually to prove his hypothesis, at least to produce such a weight of ingenious evidence as might convince imaginative minds. He examined the Leonardo manuscripts and proceeded to show in this volume how profoundly Leonardo had studied the spiral in the growth of flowers, the eddying of water, the flight of birds, and the forms of smoke and dust. But that is not all. The staircase at Blois is a left-handed spiral, a formation rare both in architecture and nature. Leonardo was a left-handed man who wrote all his manuscripts from right to left, and ninety per cent. of the screws and spirals contained in his manuscripts are left-handed spirals. But it may be urged that the spiral in the Voluta resperitilo is right-handed. True, but in one case in a million the spiral in the Voluta resperitilo is left-handed. Nobody would take the trouble to preserve or carry about with him one of the ordinary shells, but a specimen with the rare sinistral helix would be a possession that any man would value, particularly Leonardo who delighted in the rare and the strange. One of these rare examples, Mr. Cook suggests, Leonardo may have brought with him from the seaboard of Italy where it is found. And he may have used it as a model for the Blois staircase.

If Mr. Cook's voyage into "that vast dark continent called Leonardo" is in some respects imaginative rather than scientific, he has written a book that, if it actually proves nothing, arouses in the reader's mind a rich train of thought. It may also suggest to some craftsmen the wisdom and the advantage of studying nature herself instead of taking her at fourth or four-hundredth hand. At any rate, it turns our minds again to Leonardo, of whom Prof. Ray Lancaster says: "Never has so much talent been united in one man."

Science.

Fratricide Fore-ordained.

It would be an intelligible position to assert that a writer upon influenza, under the heading of "Science," was utilizing a convenient pseudonym. And certainly we are here embarked upon deep and uncertain waters. No furthest extension of a nice exactitude is possible in discussing, even from the academic standpoint, a battle waged between the highest and the lowest forms of living matter. Such is this; man, the highest representative of animal life, fights with a unicellular plant of the simplest and most elemental form; and, with an eye to the combatant with whom are our sympathies, we call the conflict influenza. The issue, however, rests more directly with the influence of the animal upon the invading plant, than with the influence of the plant upon the animal, though to anyone but the bacteriologist such a statement may appear to be hardly so much a paradox as an actual absurdity.

Perhaps one may demonstrate that science recognises this domestic fray, by giving its weapons the semblance, at least, of mathematical form. Thirty years ago there was not a printed page upon bacteriology in the British Museum. To-day there are upon its shelves four hundred volumes dealing exclusively with that vastly important science. Of these almost the very latest contains an equation which concerns influenza, and every other bacterial disease. It runs thus:—

$$D = \frac{MVN}{R}.$$

Now, it would be idle to pretend that a science which deals with the inter-action of hostile forms of life, forms, too, so mutually remote in structure and activity, can ever become exact. Yet this equation represents some approximation to theoretical exactness. D, the disease, equals M, the micro-organism (or "germ"), multiplied by V, its virulence, multiplied by N, its number: the product being divided by R, the resistance of the individual attached. The analogy is obvious, of course, to Ohm's familiar law, represented by the equation—

$$C = \frac{E}{R}$$

—the current equals the electro-motive force divided by the resistance. If one realizes the plane of complexity with which the bacteriological "equation" deals, one will recognize how valuable is an expression of the case which represents any parallel, however distant, to such a simple affair of physics as the law of Ohm.

All this may well appear unrelated to the silly nonsense of current print about influenza. Nor is my right to deal with influenza in this series in any way supported by popular parley. Such absurd phrases as "a touch of influenza," "an influenza cold," and the like, are so far from having any relation to science or "systematized knowledge" as to appear rather to form part of some too superfluous scheme for systematizing ignorance. Furthermore, it is supposed that a real grasp of the subject of influenza is obtainable from such a source as the history of its name. To know that the Italians called it "influenza" in allusion to some supposed malign supernatural influence, and that the French called it "la grippe" in a spirit of more immediate metaphor, and that its titular patronymic is "Russian influenza"—all this is, we imagine, to be quite remarkably well-informed upon the subject. So, perhaps, I may make venture with a fact or two.

The disease known as influenza is due to, or, rather, consists in, the invasion of the human body by a minute plant, which was discovered several years ago by a German bacteriologist named Pfeiffer, and was named by him the bacillus influenzae. It follows that one either has influenza or has it not. The bacillus is either there or it is not. Surely that is plain enough. "Bacillus" is, of course, simply the Latin word meaning a "little rod": and the bacillus influenzae is a rod-shaped cell somewhere about one eight-thousandth of an inch long. It has no visible nucleus. In other words, its visible structure is so lowly as not even to comprise the first differentiation of living matter into nuclear and non-nuclear protoplasm. It multiplies by simple splitting, initiated, no doubt, by the nuclear matter which we must believe to be spread throughout its substance. So far the thing is simple enough, and it would be natural to conclude that if this creature multiplies in you or me we shall, ipso facto, suffer from influenza. Such an assumption would ignore the first principle that life depends upon chemical processes. Similarly influenza depends upon the peculiarities of the vital chemistry of the bacillus of Pfeiffer. And since by these we suffer, we call the bacillary products poisons or, to use the Greek, toxins. These toxins are organic compounds of great complexity, probably varying in different generations of the bacillus. This difference of toxicity is expressed in the V (virulence) of the equation. Influenza is the result upon the patient, as a whole, of the interference with his normal chemistry produced by the interaction of the chemical products of his cells and the chemical products of the invading cells. In some peculiar subtlety of this struggle is to be sought the explanation of the familiar fact that influenza may take so many forms. It is, indeed, the type of a Protean disease.

What follows is simple enough to relate, though its details are beyond our ken. The toxin has its brief day, and then, fittingly enough, the very cells of the patient (whichever, in the particular case, they happen to be) that suffered most by its ravages, have their revenge. They produce a new substance, which arrests the multiplication of the bacillus, deprives it, somehow, of its fuel or its oxygen, and ultimately kills it outright. This substance we very naturally call the antitoxin. One point further. Influenza never directly caused a death yet. In other words, uncomplicated influenza is a non-fatal disease. In yet other words (for there are many ways of phrasing such problems as these), the antitoxin is always produced in time. But the disturbance of cell-chemistry is so profound that if another invader enter at this moment, as, for example, the germ of pneumonia, this time the besieged cells, weariedly facing an unexhausted foe, fail, only too often, to supply the second antitoxin in time.

Let us recall, for a moment, the equation: D, the disease influenza, consists in M, the micro-organism or bacillus of Pfeiffer; V, its virulence, or the variety of influenza toxin it can produce—allied, I may note, to the ptomaines of meat—and N, its number or the dose of that poison; all these divided by R, the resistance, or power of producing antitoxin, possessed by the body cells of the individual attacked.

Yet, after all this prosaic detail, we return to the real question underlying influenza. And what is that? Well, it depends on your point of view. If there is influenza in your house or mine, the real question for us is, how shall we bring into the house so much poison as shall kill this little vegetable, lest haply it kill us. Poison I call it, for so it is to the bacillus. Antiseptic and disinfectant we call it. Nor do we nicely debate our right to slay and spare not.

So the real question, as I take it, is this: Here we all are, we cells or societies of cells, held to our common Mother by a force, a law absolute, eternal, immutable. We are all in the same boat upon the universal ocean, the germs and we. Our origin is common; from the circum-polar sea, the first to cool and render life supportable—we are told. Yet not born perchance; assuredly, not perchance are we. And if not to an end, and a common end, then the sun, our common need, is a goblin, and not only Rossetti's type, but we all make him so, we, men and microbes, and the rest of the living race. With the very breath of our nostrils enters the influenza bacillus, and if it can flourish and multiply, why should it not? It must fight or die; and why should it die? Did not our Maker give it life? And yet if it survive, what of us? Are we to die, and now? And so it is war without mercy, and the battlefield is our Mother's bosom, now become our "Isle of Terror." Well may the poet say:—

So go the town's lives on the breeze,
Bosom nor barn is filled with these.

And I write under a word which suggests that I "know," and flaunt my clumsy pompous polysyllables, and jeer at those whose words have four letters where mine claim five; and treat, with a would-be pretty wit, of influenza as a combat; and "explain" forsooth, the unknown in terms of the unknowable; and leave the real question unanswered. Why, why this accursed slaughter? Thus, science to-day leads the human mind so far and leaves it faint, sick with the smell of blood. Faint, do I say? This rather. Faint, yet pursuing.

SIR,—The point which you somehow miss of my last letter was that there is no ground for supposing the Cretan scripts to be more alphabetical than the cuneiform. As the tablets on which they appear have not yet been deciphered, one cannot speak with certainty, but their likeness to the Cypriote signs suggests that, like them, the Cretan forms a syllabary and not an alphabet. Their discoverer, Dr. Arthur Evans, did not, I think, go further in his recent lectures than to suggest that the Cretan pictographs were the source whence the forms, and perhaps the names, of certain hitherto unexplained signs in the Phœnician alphabet were derived. Hence Phœnicia rather than Crete was the birthplace of the alphabet. But the Phœnicians on their own showing were an Assyrian colony, and everything, therefore, points to Babylonia as the first home of writing, and perhaps of all the other elements of culture as well. This is the view that I have repeatedly advocated in your columns, which must be my apology for troubling you with this correspondence.—

Matthew Arnold and Bishop Wilson.

SIR,—May I point out to "The Bookworm" that it was the "Maxims of Piety and Christianity," not the "Sacra Privata," which Matthew Arnold (in his Preface to "Culture and Anarchy") so strongly recommended—regretting that they were not, like the "Sacra Privata," in circulation. In consequence, apparently, of that appeal the S.P.C.K. republished the "Maxims" in 1869. "Some of the best things from the 'Maxims'" (Matthew Arnold wrote) "have passed into the 'Sacra Privata,' still in the 'Maxims' we have them as they arose. . . . I am not saying a word against the 'Sacra Privata,' for which I have the highest respect; only the 'Maxims' seem to be a better and more edifying book still." In view of a judgment which ranks it in some respects above the "Imitation," and of its scarcity, I hope we may have a reprint of the "Maxims" as well as of the "Sacra Privata."—Yours, &c.,

"Wanted a Word."

SIR,—May it not be considered somewhat in the nature of a "wild-goose chase" to hunt a generic term for the various antecedents to "sequel"—all extremely tenacious of appropriate appellation! For instance, it were scarcely in the fitness of things to speak of a man's poverty as the prelude to his suicide. Moreover, by the way, does prelude necessarily imply consequence? Shakespeare speaks of Cassio's intoxication as being "evermore the prologue to his sleep," wherein it is curious to observe the dramatist betraying the "dyer's hand," when here, prelude might have better served, for the propriety of prologue is obviously dependent upon the articulatory condition of Cassio's "cups"—cases having been known to which the term "speechless" applied. Again, if for a moment it be permissible to suppose the dramatist—"in his cups" or otherwise—stumbling upon "cause to his sleep," then assuredly, apart from scansion, "equivocation" had "undone" him. "We must speak by the card!" The question, however, remains of the "Sequel" family being bifurcated—propter and non-propter branches, resulting in further ramifications!

"When is a sequel not a sequel?" Might not that prove an interesting and profitable subject of enquiry?—I am, Sir, yours consequentially,

"The Famous Scene."

SIR,—In the review of d'Annunzio's "Francesca da Rimini" in the ACADEMY of the 17th of January, the following sentence appears: "The famous scene of the fatal kiss and declaration between the lovers is treated with a classic simplicity and reserve which, powerfully acted, should make it the most effective in the play."

It might be interesting to your reviewer to learn that this scene as acted by Duse in New York was, to a young but not infrequent playgoer, the sweetest and most genuinely poetic interpretation of a love passage that it has ever been his pleasure to see on many stage.—Yours, &c.,

Result of No. 177 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best imaginary criticism by a deceased author on a book by any living author. We award the prize to the Rev. R. F. McCausland, Hawsker Vicarage, Whitby, for the following:—

JOHN BUNYAN ON LORD WILLIAM NEVILL'S "PENAL SERVITUDE."

So a Lordling hath had experience of the Den! But methinks he fared well, and hath but little cause of Complaint. His unwholesome Food, now and then, was but a Fly in the Ointment of his gentle imprisonment. Tainted Food was my frequent Portion, albeit I recked it not, having manna and to spare that such as he boot not of. Will this Book make a Traveller of any Wight? Shall the Slothful be active thereby, or the Blind see delightful things therein? I trow not. This Nobleman seems to have had no Dreams but those of Escape betimes, from his deserved Penance. He longeth only to join again those whose Paradise is this naughty World. It was with Qualms that I published the Adventures of my Pilgrim. Was this my lord ever in that Quandary?

"Some said, John, print it; others said not so;
Some said it might do good; others said, No."

Hath he brought out these Memoirs for the Carnal Declaration of Mr. Badman and his sort? My Old-Honest would rate them at the value of a Broadsheet printed with the vapourings of a peevish Malefactor. What hath he done, but rake into a Book the Straw, small Sticks, and Dust of the Floor of his late Dungeon?

Other replies follow:—

MRS. SHERWOOD'S ON "ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN."

It seems to me strange that the taste of the day should be gratified by the portraiture of such a female character as Elizabeth in her German garden. To the mind of a sensitive gentlewoman there is something positively unrefined in her actions and conversation. I must confine my remarks to her alone, for it would be vastly distasteful to dwell upon her friends. The pertness of these young Misses is such that one shrinks from its contemplation. Of Elizabeth herself, I will speak briefly under the following headings:—1. As Wife—This painful theme can be dismissed with few words. Where, I ask, is wifely devotion, wifely submission, wifely care? I find traces of none. By a flippant nickname alone is the husband designated, and his absence from home hailed with positive pleasure that Elizabeth may the better indulge in her strange antics out of doors. Secondly, as housewife her character is little less to be deplored. Surely the most obvious avocations of any notable female are the reception of guests, the ordering of her household, the plenishing of the still-room. Yet this eccentric person neglects them all. She treats her neighbours with sauciness, and her servants (except the gardener) with neglect, while her only household expenditure appears to consist in the purchase of herbaceous stuffs.

In fine, I think this Mrs. Elizabeth would do well to learn that her position as wife and mistress is of vastly more importance than that of posturing as a female Hodge in the garden.

MR. SAMUEL PEPPYS ON THE PLAYS OF IBSEN.

This morning to St. Paul's Churchyard, to my booksellers, where I stayed above an hour reading the play of "The Doll's House," by one Ibsen, a Dutchman, but brought it not away, it costing too dear for my purse. And it do seem to me nothing so fine as the play which I saw lately of "The Silent Woman"; and all the play about a woman who took conceit that in minding of her house she was none better than a doll, and she mighty ill-content thereat, although very civilly used by her husband; a strange play, as I think, and I would not have my wife see it. And in the same book another play of "Ghosts," full of all the roguish things imaginable; and in it a man do fall in love with a serving-wench, and a great to-do about this, his mother being minded how his father once did the like, and she not liking it; and presently, because the wench will not have him he do become spleenetic, and falls to crying for the sun, which do seem to me a poor, silly ending. And all the talk very poor and simple, and not one good line in the whole, so that I hope it will never come to be acted at the Cockpit.

"Attracts by its amusing naïveté. The straightforward handling of the topics which are usually treated with reserve is quite refreshing, and the contrasted clerics, Dr. Grant and Mr. Philip Phinehas, are admirably drawn. The women are good; the daughter of Mr. Grant, who instructs in elementary theology the rascally scapegrace whom the gluttonous and dishonest Bishop has imposed upon her father out of spite, is very clever and quite new, and Mrs. Semple, not quite new, is also amusing."—World.

(3) THE CANON'S DAUGHTER. By W. B. COOKE. With a Frontispiece.

"Mr. W. B. Cooke is a follower of the good old school of Dickens. 'The Canon's Daughter' is quite amusing. We have the out-of-the-way callings and the quaint nomenclature, the blending of humour and pathos."—St. James's Gazette.

"There is a vein of humour which adds much to the interest of the narrative, and the writer is a keen observer of human nature."—Literary World.

"An excellent story, well told, full of light and shade, humour and pathos, and exhibiting some careful character drawing."—Warwick Standard.

SWAN SONNENSCHN and Co., Limited, London.

accounted blameless, it occasions no surprise that she should presently betray a secret. The author is right in this particular, although wrong in all others. No woman, unless indeed she be a queen, can be properly entrusted with affairs of State. Diana is a fool, if she is not a knave, and the less knavish you make her, so much the more is she a fool. By what I can gather from the author's philosophic comments, I perceive him to be inwardly supporting her throughout, for he joins her in marriage with the best man in the story; a good man, but a fool like herself. The universe has no need for such upholdings, and Providence disowns them. . . . The style of this amazing volume is on a level with its purport: the first offends the ear, and hinders the understanding; the second revolts a man's sense of rectitude, and his belief in the justice of Heaven. No polite author desirous to convey his ideas to the world, sets about doing it in such incomprehensible fashion. Conceits and fantasies do not illuminate, but obscure, the sense of every page. The conversation of the wits with whom the heroine consorts, is proclaimed as brilliant; but since the first duty of a wit is to be plain, and the speakers in these colloquies are seldom so, their talk is as like as not a cloak for the nakedness of fools. . . . Sir, an author may employ imagery, and yet be plain; he may write of sinners and at the same time give them their dues; he may pity, and he may pardon, but, in the interests of morality, he may not condone. Sir, in this monstrous record of unfeminine adventure such is not the case.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The first two volumes in Messrs. Bell's "Library of Noble Writers" will be Landor's "Pericles and Aspasia" and More's "Utopia," Ralph Robinson's translation. Other volumes will be announced shortly. The intention of this series is to make books which shall be read, and not merely treasured as curiosities. By noble writers is meant those authors who have had a noble influence on the thought of their own and succeeding ages.

The "Life and Works of John Hoppner, R.A.," are to form the subject of an exhaustive monograph by Mr. William McKay and Mr. W. Roberts. This work, which has been in preparation for some time, is the first attempt to represent Hoppner and his work adequately, and it will contain a great deal of new material. It will be illustrated with about sixty large photogravure plates, and will be published jointly by Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi and Co. and George Bell and Sons.

Under the title of "Art Prices Current," Messrs. Bell announce a new publication designed to afford the same assistance to collectors of pictures and prints as "Book-Prices Current" has for many years past given to book collectors. The sub-title, "A Descriptive Survey of Sales by Auction of Paintings, Drawings and Prints," shows the aim and scope of the work, a special feature of which will be the copious notes following each entry, which will describe the works sold in such a way that they cannot be mistaken. The editor is Mr. J. H. Slater.

A popular edition of the late Sir Charles Gavan Duffy's autobiography, "My Life in Two Hemispheres," will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin next week. This new edition will be in two volumes and will be issued in "The Reformer's Bookshelf."

Next week Mr. Fisher Unwin will bring out a small volume by Mr. Barry Pain, entitled "Little Entertainments." The book is a collection of short stories and sketches. The subjects of the sketches are varied, ranging from "Shakespeare's Ciphers" to "The Prohibited Pipe."

Mr. Edward Arnold announces the publication of a book by Major H. H. Austin, entitled "With Macdonald in Uganda." It describes the expedition under Major (now Colonel) J. R. L. Macdonald, which was confronted with, and successfully overcame, the mutiny on the part of the Sudanese troops.

J. NISBET & Co.'s LIST.

A GREAT JACOBITE NOVEL.

POOR SONS OF A DAY. By ALLAN MCAULAY, Author of

"The Rhymer," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"For a lively and unaffected presentation of the '45 in its strength and its weakness, its madness and its misery, we have read nothing by any living novelist to compare with the vivid and fascinating narrative of Mr. McAulay."—Spectator.

POOR SONS OF A DAY. By ALLAN MCAULAY.

"A remarkably vivid picture . . . original and valuable work."—The Times.

"A really good book . . . a singularly fascinating novel."—Spectator.

POOR SONS OF A DAY. By the Author of "THE RHYMER."

"A beautiful and convincing story . . . the author reveals a power of interpretation seldom observed in equal measure anywhere out of the pages of Scott."—Dundee Advertiser.

LETTERS OF E. R. GURNEY (Mrs. Russell Gurney). Edited by her Niece. With Portraits in Photogravure. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

"The most delightful reading . . . It is impossible to speak too highly of these letters, or of the beautiful life and character which they display."—Speaker.

"We cannot too warmly recommend this book."—Spectator.

NEW AND CHEAP EDITIONS NOW READY.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, 6s.

THE NOBLE EIGHTFOLD PATH. By the Rev. W. ST. CLAIR TISDALL, M.A.

Being the James Long Lectures on Buddhism, 1900-1902.

"The book is admirable alike for its scholarship, its temper, and its assistance to the student in the way of references."—Dundee Advertiser.

In royal 16mo, parchment cover, 1s.

A BOOKLET OF VISIONS. By SEIMMAL EISROCH.

The Visions described in this booklet are not only a record of visions which have at different times appeared to the inner eyes of the author; but are—judging by many of the writings and public utterances of the present day—a small part of the Visions which are, day by day, lighting the inner sight of many, and are a foretaste of the living realities which must soon be externalised upon this earth.

In crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE VISION OF NEHEMIAH SINTRAM. By J. WILKIE.

Nehemiah Sintram is in a vision shown a universe where vice and not virtue is the ruling motive. The predominance of evil under those circumstances, emanating from a tyrant who rules upon the principles of the wrong, is exhibited. Incidentally the grasping of all wealth by the State is described and the consequences. The end is Revolution.

"An interesting little study, well written."—Navy and Army Illustrated.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, 2s. 6d.

WHAT A PIECE OF WORK IS MAN. By FREDERICK JAMES GANT, F.R.C.S., Consulting Surgeon of the Royal Free Hospital.

Set of verses on Spring	183

The Literary Week.

THE tendency of publishing during the week has been in the direction of military biography and autobiography, and exploration. Two books more or less connected with the Boer War have been issued, one a novel by a Swede, the other a series of letters written by an Uitlander to Sir Bartle Frere between the years 1899-1902. The first two of these letters were written in Greek characters, as the writer believed that no letter was safe from inspection. Novels have been numerous, and include Mr. Ollivant's "Danny," entirely revised and rewritten since it appeared in the "Monthly Review." The author acknowledges his indebtedness to the criticism of "two ladies, Mr. Henry Newbolt, and Mr. John Murray." Among other new books of the week we note the following:—

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS FORERUNNERS. By Sidney Lanier.

"Studies in Elizabethan Poetry and its Development from Early English." Sidney Lanier was a poet of real distinction, though of very unequal performance. That he was also a genuine critic and appreciator these volumes show. The work consists of two sets of lectures delivered in Baltimore during the winter of 1879-80. Mr. H. W. Lanier says in his preface: "What he set himself to accomplish was to picture the Master Poet as the culmination of that marvellous Elizabethan age which came flaming upon a world just beginning to guess at its own true self." The two handsome volumes are well illustrated.

MEMOIRS OF COUNT GRAMMONT. By Count Anthony Hamilton. Edited by Gordon Goodwin.

The present translation is that edited by Sir Walter Scott in 1811. Scott wrote of the memoirs that they were "pleasantry throughout, and pleasantry of the best sort, unforced, graceful, and engaging." Gibbon thought highly of Hamilton's style, and Voltaire said that he was the first to discover the essential genius of the French language. The Memoirs cover the years 1662-64; "such occurrences as the great plague and the fire of London find no place in a narrative which tells of the Olympians only." The two volumes are excellently illustrated with portraits in photogravure.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË, GEORGE ELIOT, JANE AUSTEN. By Henry H. Bonnell.

A series of studies, literary and temperamental. The sections read: "Charlotte Brontë: Her Realism; Her Attitude Towards Nature; Her Passion." "George Eliot: Her Religion and Philosophy; Her Art; Her Sympathy: Further Considered." "Jane Austen: Her Place; Her Wonderful Charm." Mr. Bonnell has enthusiasm and an intimate knowledge of the work of his authors. His style, however, is sometimes rather irritating: "Certain it is that we shall never have anything like the Brontës again until like genius mates with like innocence and like loneliness—such intensity of genius yoked with such immensity of loneliness, in the virgin forest of innocence."

LETTERS TO AN UNKNOWN. By Prosper Mérimée.

A translation by Henri Pène du Bois. "If I knew the name of the Unknown," says the translator, "I would not tell it; but I do not know it." Commenting on an entry in Goncourt's journal, November 1, 1865, M. du Bois says: "Mérimée's dryness was only apparent. He was extremely sensitive, and he exaggerated indifference to make of it an armour. He has written in his 'Letters to an Unknown' tender, loyal, deeply pathetic confessions of a temperament which imposes profound affection."

MR. R. F. CHOLMELEY has an article in the "Library" on "Boys' Libraries." We agree with much that the author says, but he sometimes goes wrong. For instance: "It must be admitted that with the boy who resolutely prefers a bad translation of Dumas to 'Treasure Island,' or 'Three Men in a Boat' to 'Pickwick,' there is not much to be done." Why? Boys are not critics of style. Again: "The reference library is the obvious place for nearly all poetry, except that it is equally true that nearly all poetry should be in the circulating library as well; for boys cannot be too much encouraged to read poetry, and without much encouragement they will not do it." Our experience of boys is that those to whom poetry is likely to be of the least account go to it by instinct and temperament. Encouragement to read poetry, we imagine, never did any good either to the reader or the poet.

IN the New York "Reader" for last month, we find an unusually interesting article on Schopenhauer. The writer, Mr. R. V. Risley, secured the information which he sets down from a man who knew Schopenhauer intimately for some months in Frankfort. Schopenhauer's mother was a sentimentalist, his father a grim and passionate man who voluntarily ended his life in a "black canal between two gloomy warehouses." After that, the boy sat on a stool in the office of a Jew money-changer. When he grew up he went to Weimar to see his foolish mother, who had taken to writing mystical novels, "now," says Mr. Risley, "worthily forgotten." But an inevitable estrangement ensued, and as inevitably Schopenhauer fell in love; "it was characteristic of his whimsical and piteous bitterness that he should wilfully love below him." The woman's name is unknown—she was an actress; but from that point Schopenhauer's real career began. Yet for twenty years he remained unknown:—

Stumping along the narrow streets with his stick, a disordered sheaf of papers under his arm, he became a gibe with the cellar cheese-mongers and corner beer-sellers of the neighbourhood. With the delicate yellow of the afternoon sunlight patching the bowed and shiny back of his black coat in wavering squares of canary—through the blowing drifts of winter—with the flame-coloured autumn leaves fallen from trees overhead lying unnoticed on his shoulders—he walked unknown.

It was only when the universities had begun to recognise Schopenhauer that the friend whom Mr. Risley names, Dr. Alan Read, first met the philosopher who "felt his thoughts." From the verbatim sayings of Schopenhauer, given by Mr. Risley, we quote the following:—

No man loves the woman—only his dream.

Fame? I prefer money.

It is less contemptible.

O, yes! I am perfectly willing to do anything which your morality decries—but even to be recalcitrant no longer especially interests me—save that it gives me my only amusement, the wonder of those who do not understand.

I am too tired to care for anything.

I have made one now unalterable mistake in my life—I have not been a fool. I wish to God I could be!

Laugh! Few things are worthy of seriousness—least of all an old man who sneers at the things of his youth begged for in silence.

Besides—the years flow over me like a wave—I am smothered. My brain is stunned with repetitious detonations. The drums of memory are slack-headed as they beat the funeral farce-didge of what I have never had—and from the land of to-morrow I hear the echo of a sunset-gun.

Life is only an old coat, by the casting off of which I would be eased—but I lack the bravery of cowardice—which requires less vanity than mine in order to be simple enough to put an end to existence.

Self-realisation kills laughter.

Besides—I am too tired.

The object of life? Having eliminated its joys and its reasons, could I find any object? Why, this glass of Moselle does more to tempt me to remain in life than do all my hopes—for I have so few—I am perhaps the only man in the world who has more expectations than hopes.

A year after the conversations recorded Schopenhauer died in his solitary lodgings. He was found sitting in his big chair, dead. Perhaps, as he himself suggested, he was not young enough to live.

IN the same journal for February a writer has been discussing the eternal subject, "The Question of Maupassant." Towards the end of the article we read:—

Maupassant had a growing admiration for the work of the Russian authors: he thinks warmly of Dostoevsky and Tolstoi, but his special literary faith centres in Turgenev, whose friendship he highly values. Flaubert taught him to write well; these men taught him to write fearlessly. They gave him grasp, they fed him with raw food straight from the soil, they made possible "Une Vie" and "L'Histoire d'une Fille de Ferme"; they bade him drop from mind even the attenuated romance that hangs about the realism of Balzac.

We are tired of this kind of writing concerning Maupassant. One might suppose that he was no more than an "assiduous ape." As a matter of fact he was himself, influenced, no doubt, by a hundred things and writers appealing to his personality, but primarily and always himself. What the writer of the article means by "even the attenuated romance that hangs about the realism of Balzac" we do not know. Balzac was not essentially a realist at all. His realism, such as it was, was subject to his romance.

Mr. JOHN MURRAY, in a letter to the "Spectator," refers to the practice, which appears to be growing, of manufacturing verbs out of "nouns, adjectives, and anything else which happens to come to hand." Says Mr. Murray:—

In MSS. which I have read during the past few weeks I have found scores, I might almost say hundreds, of instances of this practice, which appears to have a special fascination for some novelists and poets. Here are a few examples: "he hoarsed," "he husked," "she shrilled," "she tip-toed," "she glimpsed him," "he parroted," "to supreme," "to camorning," and last but not least, "yells of joy artesianed up his throat."

The editor of the "Spectator" says, somewhat mildly, "we cannot see that our speech gains much by the verbal atrocities quoted by Mr. Murray." It is very certain that our speech would soon become a nerve-shaking terror if such words became current, but there is no practical fear of it. "She tip-toed," however, may be passed without scruple; the verb "to tip-toe" has been used by many self-respecting writers. The fact is that the best writers do not coin words in our day; all that the utmost art can require exist already. There is no reason why other than scientific and technical additions should be made to our language. The weakest writers nowadays are those who strive to attain distinction by the use of startling, and generally silly, new words. It was not always so; but even the greatest enrichers of our vocabulary moved with caution and had warrant for their innovations.

PROF. BRANDER MATTHEWS has been writing in the "North American Review" on "The Art of the Dramatist." A good deal of what Prof. Matthews has to say seems, at first sight, too obvious to be worth setting down. For instance: "As a drama is intended to be performed by actors, in a theatre, and before an audience, the dramatist, as he composes, must always bear in mind the players, the play-house, and the play-goers." Yet, after all, that needs repeating, for a considerable number of the plays which we are annually invited to see appear to have been written mainly for the actors. A little later Prof. Matthews says:—

Desiring to please the audience as a whole, the dramatists are always ready to accept its verdict as final. There is no immediate appeal from this judgment, rendered in the theatre itself, whether it is favourable or adverse. As Regnard makes the comedian say, "It is the public which determines the fate of works of wit—and our fate; and when we see it come in crowds to a new play we judge that the piece is good, and we do not care for any other assurance." And here the comedian was indisputably right; the approval of the public is the first proof of worthy success, for there are no good plays save those which have been applauded in the play-house.

The dramatist accepts the verdict of the audience as final only because he must, and as to the statement that "there are no good plays save those which have been applauded in the play-house,"—well, we can only say that we think Prof. Matthews is entirely wrong.

THE other day there was dedicated in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral a memorial to the late Lord Lytton. The concluding words of the memorial inscription are these :—

A poet of many styles, each the expression of his habitual thoughts. A man of superior faculties highly cultivated by literature, ardent in his affections, tender and generous in all the circumstances of life, lavish in his commendations of others, and humble in his estimate of himself.

It would be interesting to know how many people nowadays associate with the name of the Viceroy his literary pseudonym of "Owen Meredith." Does anyone nowadays read "Clytemnestra," "Lucile," "The Ring of Amasis," "Glenaveril," and "King Poppy." Yet these books should be read, if only as representative of one side of a great personality.

THE eighth and concluding volume of Mr. Gough's "The Bible True from the Beginning" lies before us. Into the value of the work we cannot enter here, but the sincerity of it may be judged from the following passages. The first is the conclusion of the introduction, the second the conclusion of the book :—

A Demosthenic saying tells us that it is needful to bear nobly whatever God gives. With a strength of Christian faith, and with a hope in God that pass beyond resignation, the writer sends forth his work to do the will of Him who prompted and ruled in the writing of it, and who will both sustain it and give it wings.

May we all come to a firmer faith in the precious fact that God's Word is true from the beginning. Some may impugn the wisdom of the writer's efforts to show this fact. Others may speak in condemnation of his motives. From all such causes of trouble, he turns to the refuge of those whose hearts condemn them not. He turns to Thee, my Saviour, whom my heart loves, from whom my life has received its constant sunshine, and at whose dear feet I would humbly lay my offering down.

WITH its current issue the New York "Book Buyer" becomes "The Lamp." The field of "The Lamp," we are told, is in nowise enlarged, "but this field, the importance of which in our own land is vastly more significant now than ever before, offers it a fertile soil for sound growth." In an article on Mr. Barrie as a dramatist we find the following :—

"The Admirable Crichton," to my mind, is the greatest thing Mr. Barrie has ever done in the art of creation. Indeed, it is so essentially brainy, a thing that a man of intellect can genuinely congratulate himself upon, that I greatly admire the courage of Mr. Frohman in producing it. If Mr. Barrie had been less well known, or if his manager had been less audacious, I have little hesitation in saying that "The Admirable Crichton" would not have got a chance.

It is extraordinary that when a successful play is produced the same thing is always said. Mr. Barrie knows his public quite as well as any smaller writers; he has learned not to make serious mistakes.

A CLEVER piece of fooling reaches us from Birmingham. It is called "Everyman's Education: A Morality Play," and its authors are C. W. Mathews and W. C. Mathews. The characters are Knowledge, Various Universities, the Board of Education, and an Out-porter. Sir John Gorst represents (without permission) the Board of Education. Sir John has rather a bad time of it. When the Universities have had their say Learning speaks :—

They've gone.

Perhaps you've had enough of it, Sir John?

SIR JOHN (in despair)

I've had enough of it to turn my brain,
My head is simply splitting with the strain.
I think I'd better cut the matter short,
And go and worry out a draft report.
So while they're out of sight I'll slip away
And make my exit.

LEARNING.

Au revoir.

SIR JOHN.

Good-day.

After which the Universities returns and Learning leads them across the stage :—

They follow her, as nearly in the attitude of Mr. Byam Shaw's "Love's Baubles" as the circumstances of the case, and the licenser of plays, permit. They all disappear through the door leading to Chaos—Oxford stooping to pick up a bauble on the way. The lights are low; the shrill triumphal laughter of Learning alone is now audible.

Is Birmingham, then, coming to the rescue?

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York "Nation," commenting on Mr. Stopford Brooke's reference to Browning's neglect of English scenery, points out that Mr. Brooke has omitted to take account of the following passage in "The Inn Album" :—

So much describes the stuffy little room—
Vulgar, flat, smooth respectability :
Not so the burst of landscape surging in,
Sunrise and all, as he who of the pair
Is, plain enough, the younger personage
Draws sharp the shrieking curtain, sends aloft
The sash, spreads wide and fastens back to wall
Shutter and shutter, shows you England's best.
He leans into a living glory-bath
Of air and light where seems to float and move
The wooded watered country, hill and dale
And steel-bright thread of stream, a-smoke with mist,
A-sparkle with May morning, diamond drift
O' the sun-touched dew. Except the red-roofed patch
Of half a dozen dwellings that, crept close
For hill-side shelter, make the village clump
This inn is perched above to dominate—
Except such sign of human neighbourhood
(And this surmised rather than sensible),
There's nothing to disturb absolute peace,
The reign of English nature.

That is English enough, certainly. But there are many other passages that are distinctly English, or at least inspired by memories of England?

IN answer to the "Daily Chronicle's" birthday question to Mr. George Meredith: "What reform do you consider the most needed at present?" Mr. Meredith replied :—

Reform is needed in many directions; there seems to be no present demand for a special one. What I should wish to see is a general encouragement to those who would stimulate the growth of Englishmen's minds. Whether they are at present in a condition to master the accumulation of material forces is debatable.

As typical of his own views Mr. Meredith selected the suggestive sentence, "Monarchy has its chance of extension only in the spiritual appeal to us."

FROM the "Varsity" we extract the following "Maxims for the Young, or the Undergraduate's Only Copy Book":—

Even a Dean will turn if syphoned upon.
The burnt Dean dreads the bonfire.
A Dean in the quad is worth two in a room.
Too many Deans spoil the cloth.
People who live on the Dean's staircase shouldn't throw stones.
He laughs best who laughs at the Dean.
All are not Deans who titter.
It is a wise Dean who knows his own place.
Once fined, shy something at the Dean twice.

THE original of the much questioning "George" of Mrs. Markham's "England"—that classic of our childhood—was Mr. F. C. Penrose, who died a few days ago. Mr. Penrose was an honorary member of the Royal Academy, and was for six years Antiquary to that institution.

A CURIOUS handbill has reached us from a northern town, setting forth that there is now on view "'The Scarborough Crucifixion,' and other rare masterpieces, by the great Sir Peter Paul Rubens"; also "Marvellous lost pictures by the best of Spanish Painters, Velasquez, a lost picture by Gainsborough, and the only Life Portraits ever painted in the World of the immortal William Shakespeare and his favourite daughter, Susanna." All this may be seen for sixpence, and "dissensious sceptics can have every satisfaction." Of what kind, we wonder?

Bibliographical.

THE sale by action the other day of an (uncut) copy of Thomas Amory's "John Bunce" may perhaps suggest to a publisher more than usually enterprising a reprint of that curious and not unentertaining book. It is not very clear whether Amory's work, which was published between 1756 and 1766, is to be regarded as wholly fiction or partly autobiography. It is autobiographical in form, and extremely discursive in manner. The sub-title describes it truthfully enough as "containing various Observations and Reflections made in various parts of the world, and many extraordinary Relations." Very similar, both in scheme and in treatment, is Amory's "Memoirs containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain," which came out a year before "John Bunce," but is not so well known by name. Only by name, I should fancy, is "John Bunce" known at all, save to the more serious and persistent students of English literature. Two lyrics from the work were included in "Songs from the Novelists" (1885). That Amory's muse was in full sympathy with the tastes of the time will be gathered from these lines:—

Tell me, I charge you, O ye sylvan swains,
Who range the mazy grove, or flow'ry plains,
Beside what fountain, in what breezy bower,
Reclines my charmer in the noon-tide hour?
Soft, I adjure you, by the skipping fawns,
By the fleet roes, that bound along the lawns;
Soft tread, ye virgin daughters of the grove,
Nor with your dances wake my sleeping love.

The forthcoming edition of the poems of John Dyer will at least not be a superfluity. I do not know that the world is any the worse for not having "Grongar Hill," and "The Fleece," and "The Ruins of Rome," very ready to its hand; but, should it want them at any time, the promised reprint will be justified. The three poems named came out originally in one volume in 1761, and were reproduced in 1765 and 1770. Since then they have figured only in "collections" of the English Poets—

e.g., Johnson's (1779), Bell's (1782), Anderson's (1793), Park's (1808), Chalmers's (1810), Sanford's (1819), and so forth. I do not forget that Wordsworth addressed a sonnet to John Dyer, in which he spoke of his "skilful genius," and deplored the obscurity into which his works had fallen. Though "hasty fame" had left Dyer's head ungraced "in the pensive shade of cold neglect," yet, declared Wordsworth:—

Pure and powerful minds, hearts meek and still,
A grateful few, shall love thy modest Lay
Long as the thrush shall pipe on Grongar Hill!

And this, obviously, is a testimonial not to be ignored or slighted.

The new translation of the "moral characters" of Theophrastus is the latest of a tolerably long line. There was a version by J. Healy in 1616, and there was another just a century later. Then in 1714 came Eustage Budgell's, which must have been successful, for it was reprinted in 1718, 1743, and 1751. Meanwhile there was yet another translation in 1725, followed by a fifth (W. Rayer's) in 1797. The most modern version, till now, has been that of Isaac Taylor (1836), which was accompanied by "physiognomical sketches and hints on individual varieties in human nature."

The lady who is going to bring out a Life of "Rehearsal" Buckingham starts without a rival. An adequate biography of that worthy does not at present exist. All that we have in that direction are a couple of memoirs prefixed to editions of the works published respectively in 1754 and 1775. Though "The Rehearsal" is still read and quoted, Buckingham really lives as the Zimri of "Absalom and Achitophel." No one confers immortality so certainly as your first-class satirist.

John Hoppner, R.A., of whom a biography is to be published, touched literature at one point at least. He was the author of certain "Oriental Tales" told in English verse and published in 1805. His "Select Series of [Engraved] Portraits of Ladies of Rank and Fashion" came out in 1803, and was reproduced just eighty years after by the late Mr. Andrew Tuer, who re-christened the work "Bygone Beauties" and furnished the necessary annotations.

Lovers of the literary drama are doubtless glad to know that Tolstoy's three plays—Englished under the titles of "The Powers of Darkness," "The Fruits of Culture," and "The First Distiller"—will shortly be available in a single volume. To the best of my belief, the original of "The First Distiller" has not been Englished before. On the other hand, the other two plays have already appeared in our tongue. A translation of "The Fruits of Culture" was published at Boston, U.S.A., in 1891, and was also placed on the English market. In the same year Mr. Heinemann brought out a version of the same comedy under the title of "The Fruits of Enlightenment," and this was reproduced in cheaper forms in 1900, with an introductory essay by Mr. Pinero. "The Dominion of Darkness," a five-act drama, was published by Messrs. Vizetelly in 1888. It is a pity that the titles of the English versions of these two plays vary as they do.

Mr. Henry van Dyke, who, it is said, is to write the volume on J. R. Lowell for the "English Men of Letters" series, is best known in this country as the author of a book, now practically superseded, on "The Poetry of Tennyson." This, brought out in 1890, was re-issued in 1891, 1893, and 1896. Next to it in popularity over here I should place Mr. Van Dyke's volume of "Essays in Profitable Idleness," entitled "Little Rivers" (1895 and 1896). His book, "The Builders and Other Poems" came out here in 1897; his "Christ-Child in Art" in 1893.

The Infinite Illusion.

OBERMANN. By Etienne Pivert De S  nancour. With Biographical and Critical Introductions by Arthur Edward Waite. (Wellby. 6s.)

THE "Obermann" of S  nancour fills a curious place in literature and a quite exceptional place in the literature of France. Here is a man who does not aim at creating a masterpiece in order to satisfy the craving within him, nor yet at unburdening himself of the secrets by which he is tortured. He has nothing of the flame of Victor Hugo, the most self-conscious, perhaps, of all the creators, nor has he, apparently, the mordant desire of laying bare the soul as Rousseau had. For both of these the terrible applause of countless unknown human beings was as their very life blood. For S  nancour, that is for Obermann, the only verdict rested with his own soul.

Heine, whose nature was at least a third part that of a Frenchman, has commented upon the intensity with which the French live in the here and now of the actual. That, indeed, is a racial instinct which has made of the philosophe something quite other than a philosopher. George Sand, who understood both, who lived and at the same time dreamed, who drew with her eye on the object and at the same time saw what was not and could never be, who caught at once the petulant call from the boulevards and the strange muffled whisper that lay deeper than Paris—George Sand understood something of the pain of Obermann. But for her it was Chateaubriand rather than S  nancour who could make this detached searching of the soul really luminous. "Ren  ," she says, "signifie le g  nie sans volont  : Obermann signifie l'  l  vation morale sans g  nie, la sensibilit   malade monstreusement isol  e en l'absence d'une volont   avide d'action. Ren   dit: si je pouvais vouloir, je pourrais faire; Obermann dit: a quoi bon vouloir? je ne pourrais pas."

Genius will eventually assert itself, but this terrible detachment from the desire of action ends in itself. Ren   will plunge again into life; for Obermann there can be only death. And because of this the hero of S  nancour has in reality nothing at all to do with Werther and Ren   and Manfred. For these are children of earth who shed hot rebel tears, or, as little Titans, assail uselessly the implacable barriers. Still less is the comparison with Hamlet a just one. Turgenev has opposed to the conception of Goethe a profoundly intelligent study of Hamlet, in which he points out that he was not only capable of sudden action, but also of swift cruelty and treachery. Be this as it may, Hamlet was the incarnation of intellectuality which shrinks from the shock of actual contact with a ruder world. He shrinks from action, but he never for one instant denies its necessity. Obermann is always reflective, always a commentator, brooding about the remote world from which he would preserve his soul untarnished.

Matthew Arnold upheld the innate charm of S  nancour's prose against M. Paul Bourget's panegyric of Amiel. He waived the question of the deeper philosophy of Amiel, he set aside the matter of erudition and the matter of critical judgment, he found   sthetic satisfaction in S  nancour's prose, and that was all. That, indeed, seems to us to be exactly what Obermann has to give, that and no more.

For this questioner of all things neither asks nor responds to the personal question. He who writes down the most intimate broodings of his soul is yet eternally aloof from the men and women who may seek to share them. One is never en rapport with Obermann. He tells us everything and yet he tells us nothing. He speaks as it were before us, but never to us. Rousseau throws his tremulous secrets to the winds, and we recognise that they are also the secrets of mankind. Obermann's voice comes to us as a far-off echo, for ever remote from the pleadings of the human heart. But if this voice is to be compared with any other, it is with that of Amiel and not with that of Ren   or Manfred.

But even here the question is one of contrast rather than of comparison. Amiel, "bedazzled by totality," sought consciously to merge himself in that totality, sought, living, to catch the sensation of being one with the all that was to him more real than any concrete human experience. He saw too much, felt too much, to be ever really articulate. Paralyzed by thought, he struggled to express himself in a language which, as M. Bourget has somewhat too complacently pointed out, is singularly alien from certain needs of the soul. It became almost impossible for him to write at all. At the best he was only able to stammer out some fragments of the message which haunted him. With him there was always the dumb protest against the conditions which bind men to a lower plane of vision.

Obermann examines life coldly and without personal protest. What he thinks he is able to utter fluently. What he sees can fill him with that mysterious melancholy which is one of the most subtle phases of pleasure. His very mournfulness has in it, like that of Virgil, a detachment from personal sorrow. Like Euripides, he questions whether indeed the gods rule or chance, but, like Euripides, he suggests no guiding principle of life. Tout est loterie, man lives and dies by chance, and the one solace in life is to be found in dreams.

But S  nancour resembles Amiel in this—he saw life as a whole. He put from him the petty sequence of concrete details which blind men to the real mystery of being. His wife, his children, his Parisian journalism, the bitter conflict for mere subsistence—all these went for nothing in this strange inner life. Men and cities, the glamour of the far-off, the prestige of success—Obermann turned from these things as from obscuring trifles. He lived to accept, by some curious irony of destiny, the Legion of Honour, but there was no honour in France or in Europe which could have spurred him from the inner dream. But let us turn to the charm of his prose through which that dream found occasional utterance.

Here is a fragment of a passage in which Matthew Arnold found that charm at its best. It is a fragment equally significant of Obermann's attitude towards life:—

Indicible sensibilit  , charme et tourment de nos vaines ann  es; vaste conscience d'une nature partout accablante et partout imp  n  trable, passion universelle, sagesse avanc  e, voluptueux abandon; tout ce qu'un c  ur mortel peut contenir de besoins et d'ennuis profonds, j'ai tout senti, tout   prouv   dans cette nuit m  morable. J'ai fait un pas sinistre vers l'  ge d'affaiblissement; j'ai d  vor   dix ann  es de ma vie. Heureux l'homme simple dont le c  ur est toujours jeune.

And here is Matthew Arnold's translation:—

Sensibility beyond utterance, charm and torment of our vain years; vast consciousness of a nature everywhere greater than we are, and everywhere impenetrable; all-embracing passion, ripened wisdom, delicious self-abandonment—everything that a mortal heart can contain of life—weariness and yearning. I felt it all. I experienced it all, in this memorable night. I have made a grave step towards the age of decline. I have swallowed up ten years of life at once. Happy the simple, whose heart is always young.

Here again is Mr. Waite's translation of the same passage:—

Indescribable tenderness, charm and torture of our empty days; vast consciousness of a nature which is everywhere overwhelming and everywhere inscrutable; universal passion, advanced wisdom, voluptuous abandonment: all that a mortal heart can hold of deep needs and deep weariness, all these did I feel, all pass through on that ineffaceable night. I took an ominous stride towards the age of decadence; I consumed ten years of my life. Happy is the simple man whose heart is for ever young!

It is a severe test to Mr. Waite's rendering to put it side by side with that of Matthew Arnold, but it is only by such a test that a certain want in this otherwise admirable translation can be made clear. Had Matthew Arnold translated "Obermann" these letters would have held a place in English as well as in French literature. As it is, we are indebted to Mr. Waite for a faithful and sympathetic rendering, carefully annotated, as well as for a biographical sketch of a personality too long ignored in his own country as in ours. We shall conclude with the final comment of Obermann's philosophy:—

If I should reach old age, if, on a day, still thought-haunted, but ceasing from speech with men, there should be a friend at my side to receive my farewell to earth, let my chair be set down on the short grass, may there be peaceful daisies in front of me, beneath the sun, under the vast sky, that in relinquishing this fleeting life I may recall something of the infinite illusion.

The infinite illusion, there lies the fatal fascination which hovered about his life. He was never used to living. He was always as one who might have hourly repeated those beautiful lines:—

Strange the world about me lies,
Never yet familiar grown—
Still disturbs me with surprise,
Haunts me like a face half known.

A Thinker and Poet.

THE DAWN OF DAY. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Translated by Johanna Volz. (Fisher Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)

FROM a combination of causes, it is extremely unlikely that Nietzsche will ever receive his due in England. To begin with, the practical English mind has little taste and less talent for comprehending philosophic speculations almost wholly unorthodox in their teaching; and, in the second place, Nietzsche's brilliantly biased psychology, aristocratic individualism, and poetic violence confuse and repel grave men of science, letters, religion, law, and all the students of exact research. It is not that Nietzsche's intellect is too great, or too warped; it is rather that the intelligence of most specialists is too positive, and in a sense too narrow for them to take pleasure in daring speculations on life, manners, morals, and history by a brilliantly creative poetic philosopher.

"But if Nietzsche's philosophical conclusions are unsound, and indeed tinged with madness, why should we consider them of importance?" the specialists ask. The answer to this is plain. Nietzsche is to be taken as a great stimulus to the mind, as a highly destructive criticism of most modern assumptions. Nietzsche is to be enjoyed in the same spirit that we enjoy Voltaire, read Juvenal, or go to hear Wagner—his curious distinction being that he, most of all writers, is employing the highly effective methods of the artist in his search for an arbitrary set of truths without troubling himself to create cunning artistic illusions. Now this is what is confusing and irritating to the specialist or the learned person generally. Tell the musicians that "The Case of Wagner" is the most brilliantly intellectual piece of musical criticism ever written, or tell theologians or psychologists that "A Genealogy of Morals," though biased in its investigation, and false, if you like, in its conclusions, lets in more light on the subject than three score of orthodox treatises, and these specialists will turn from you in disgust. Similarly, severe classical scholars no doubt hold that "The Birth of Tragedy," that splendid piece of critical insight, is a most misleading hypothesis. It is no doubt from some such point of view that M. Fouillée has lately written an instructive scientific paper on Nietzsche and Darwinism ("The International Monthly"), in which he points out that Nietzsche's ethical doctrines are a negation of the best established laws of biology and sociology, and that for "true scientific ethics" we must turn to Guyau, the French philosopher. We do not doubt it, and we are surprised to learn that there exists any school of Continental philosophy which has accepted seriously Nietzsche's anti-humanitarian, anti-democratic, anti-Christian systems of ethics. Indeed, we do not believe it. But the error, on the other hand, of ignoring Nietzsche and of passing him over as a negligible quality—an error typical of the English mind—argues in the critic a spirit of parochial as opposed to cosmopolitan culture. Nietzsche as a psychologist and critic of life saw deep into the origins of human morality: as a destructive critic he is the most formidable antagonist that latter-day Christianity has encountered: as a biting satirist of the average man who shelters his own feebleness and inanity with the impressive catchwords of "Progress," "Civilisation," he is simply invaluable in an age of ready-made democratic culture. It is no valid argument against Nietzsche's power to say that his doctrines show the marks of incipient insanity, any more than it is to deny Swift's force because his savage genius showed premonitory symptoms of the brain disease by which it was ultimately overthrown. In both Swift's and Nietzsche's case the very quality of their genius was probably allied to a highly morbid condition of brain. But even if we grant that Nietzsche's unbridled individualism and deification of the "Over-Man" in Zarathustra often plainly injure the effect of his work, whereas Swift's misanthropy and savage indignation rarely pass the line of artistic danger, it is nevertheless true that Nietzsche's acute psychological analysis of the fashion in which human morality has been built up out of man's animal passions and instincts springs largely from a pathological analysis of his own sufferings. That is to say, his brain working at high pressure with attendant morbid developments became like some powerful torch which, blazing rapidly away, casts into strong relief those angles and contours of a subject (and Nietzsche's subject was the human mind itself) which are merged in the whole and tend to escape observation under all ordinary conditions. To see things sanely and see them whole, though an excellent precept for the conduct of life, is by no means the guiding precept for poets, prophets, or even for psychologists. Nietzsche's very extravagance is, therefore, to use another simile, like the needle of an etcher, which gets effects of chiaroscuro into a subject which the learned specialist presents to us in a series of diagrams. Nietzsche's method may be illustrated by a few of his sayings in "The Dawn of Day":—

Classicism indeed! Did we learn any portion of that in which the ancients used to educate their youth? Did we learn to speak or to write as they? Did we unceasingly practise dialectics in rhetorical contests? Did we learn to move as beautifully and proudly as they, to wrestle, to throw, to box as they? Did we learn some of the practical asceticism of all Greek philosophers? Were we trained in a single antique virtue, in the way in which the ancients practised it? Was not all reflection on morals utterly neglected in our education? As years roll by one thing seems to become more and more evident to me: that all Greek and antique nature, however simple and manifest it appears to our eyes, is very difficult to understand, nay, hardly accessible. . . . How we jabber about the Greeks! What do we understand of their art, the soul of which is the passion for naked male beauty? Thus they had a perspective thoroughly different from ours. The case was similar with regard to their love for womankind. Their worship was of a different kind, and so was their contempt.

History. "When we try to examine the mirror in itself, we eventually detect nothing but the things reflected by it."

When we wish to grasp the things reflected, we touch nothing but the mirror. This is the general history of knowledge."

The Ideal Selfishness. "Is there a state more blessed than that of pregnancy? To do everything we do in the silent belief that it must needs benefit that which is generating in us? That it must needs raise its mysterious worth, the thought of which fills us with ecstasy? Then, we refrain from much without having to put ourselves under great restraint; we suppress an angry word, we grasp the hand forgivingly; the child shall spring from all that is mild and good. We shrink from our own harshness and abruptness: as though it might instil a drop of evil into the life-chalice of the beloved unknown. Everything is veiled, mysterious; we know nothing about the process; we wait and try to be ready. Moreover, there prevails in us a pure and purifying feeling of deep irresponsibility, similar to that sensation which a spectator experiences before a drawn curtain: it is growing, it is coming to light; it is not for us to determine either its worth or its hour. We are solely thrown back upon every indirect, blessed, and restraining influence. 'A greater than we are is coming to life,' such is our secret hope: for him we prepare everything, that he may successfully come to light; not only all that is useful, but also the crowning love of our souls. In this blessed anticipation we shall live, and are able to live! Whether that which we expect be a thought, a deed, we have to every essential achievement no other relation but that of pregnancy, and ought to cast the arrogant talk about 'will' and 'shall' into the winds! This is the true ideal selfishness: ever to provide and watch and restrain the soul, that our productiveness may come to a beautiful issue."

This last beautiful passage may come as a surprise to those readers who have been told they will find in Nietzsche's writings only the "gospel of brute force and egomania." Nietzsche, in fact, was a thinker of a singularly pure, noble, and lofty mind, and the misanthropy, egotism, and insane pride of his Zarathustra were in fact but the walls of resistance his indomitable spirit raised to shield itself under the ravages of cruel pain. Those who will not bend must break. Anybody could, however, compile from Nietzsche's writings a body of sayings which would show the delicacy, tenderness, and nobility of his nature, just as Swift's "Journal to Stella" shows what human qualities inspired his savage indignation. Here, then, is the paradox in Nietzsche's work. More, perhaps, than any modern writer he needs to be read with a delicate discrimination of the inner meaning as opposed to the outer and obvious meaning. He is, therefore, not a writer for people who want gospels, text-books, or for "specialists" who are so occupied in tilling their well-ordered fields that they are impatient of raising their eyes to the wide horizon beyond. For Nietzsche, though a thinker of great significance, is above all things a poet.

We cannot here discuss the position "The Dawn of Day" holds in relation to Nietzsche's other works. Sufficient to say, it is a collection of detached thoughts and speculations which contain variations of the favourite ideas Nietzsche has worked out more fully elsewhere.

The Sun, &c.

PROBLEMS IN ASTRO-PHYSICS. By Agnes M. Clerke. (A. & C. Black. 20s. net.)

WRITTEN by a popular and learned writer on astronomical subjects, the present excellent book is yet not of a popular nature. It deals with the physical and chemical side of astronomy, and while it resumes what is actually known of these matters, its main purpose is to point the ways most promising for further discovery. Miss Clerke's writing is clear in the extreme, and would almost render her book popular, were popularity possible to subject-matter so recondite. One cannot even attempt to indicate the crowded range of her survey, covering as it does the most delicate and difficult problems of astronomy. For here we have to deal, not with the discovery and numbering of stars, nor the motions of the stars and stellar systems; but with the outcome of those allied sciences which astronomy has called to her aid: with the spectro-scope, for example, and that science of stellar chemistry which it has rendered possible. One is bewildered in the flight through boundless spaces to which Miss Clerke invites us. Shall we fix our eyes on the rare metals, scarce known on earth, which hang in vapour round the sun? Shall we wonder at the spectacle of dark suns gyrating round the visible suns? Scattered in multitude (for instance) through the Milky Way, it may be are suns yet germinating, which have not yet burst into light. Whatever be their cause or nature, the conception of these huge undoubted orbs swinging darkling through space is arresting to the imagination. But some idea of the book and its subject-matter may be got by fixing our attention even on a single matter; on the most familiar of heavenly sights, our own daily sun.

Blake said that were he asked, regarding the sun, "What! do you not see a round yellow globe, something like a guinea?" he would answer, "Oh, no! no! I see a great company of the heavenly host, praising God, and singing, 'Hosanna in the highest!'" Mr. G. F. Watts has tried to put on canvas that visionary sun—impossible, we take it, though Tintoret were joined with Turner for the attempt. The sun of science is not, indeed, the sun of Blake; yet the scientific vision of the sun is scarcely less different from the "round yellow globe, something like a guinea," which is still what most men see. Of its inner constitution science can say little, save that it is neither solid nor liquid—a huge gaseous globe, she conjectures, at intense heat and pressure. But apart from that, she has found out something. It is not, to her, a compact, homogeneous little rocket or fire-ball, as it is to us. It is rather, so to speak, a vast flaming fruit, belt within belt, swathe within swathe—a peach (shall we say?) of fire. The kernel of the peach, the soul and inmost centre of the sun, lies unknown, unsummarisable, invisible; hidden by its garment of light. For outside that is the "photosphere," a swathing of intense, continuous light, the immediate source of all its light and heat; the temperature scarce conceivable, and only dimly estimable, in its flagrant fierceness. May one call it the juice which surrounds the kernel? About it is a slender veil—the "smoke-veil," though its smoky nature is only, and doubtfully, theoretical—which dims somewhat the intensity of the photosphere. The peach-stone, let us say. Beyond that, for hundreds of miles, stretches a belt of incandescent vapours, the "reversing layer"; as it were the flesh of the peach. Finally, the peach-skin, comes the "chromosphere": a swathe of gases, peach-wise flushed by blazing hydrogen. But this skin is thicker than the pulp it covers, four or five thousand miles deep. Nor, as the peach-skin has its velvety "pile," is the chromosphere without its prominences, as we shall see. "Finally," we said; but indeed without the chromosphere comes the excessively tenuous and far-spreading "corona," so brilliantly visible in eclipses. If we styled it the bloom on the peach, it would have to be a very deep bloom, deep enough for a second skin, though without the density.

The illustration is, of course, arbitrary; but our description itself shows roughly the complex structure of that "yellow guinea" which makes so simple a figure in the heavens. And yet we have got no further in our physiology of the sun than a child who cuts an orange in half—nor as far. The sign-post towards further discovery is what our ancestors considered a blemish in the solar character—or at least his appearance. It has long been notorious that the sun was subject to some kind of cutaneous affection: for our part, we have had our doubts that "golden Phoebus" was really red-haired and freckled. Yet these "spots on the sun" are exercising the farthest reach of astronomical curiosity, and are at the base of a whole series of solar phenomena. They are periodical; they break out every ten or eleven years, and their appearance is conjoined with magnetic disturbances on our earth. That, you perceive, at once brings us into the matter; his solar majesty's complaint, whatever its nature, is clearly infectious. Careful observation of the solar pulse, and a variety of prominent manifestations, show that it is accompanied by strong feverish symptoms. These spots, under the telescope, appear as seeming dark depressions of a varying (often roughly circular) shape, with an irregular fringe of a peculiar form. They tend to groups, and travel along the sun, often in a procession; while the spots themselves appear to have a rotating motion. That really seems the bulk of what is known about them. Speculation about them is legion. They are conjectured, or rather argued, to be of an eruptive and volcanic nature. But their importance is that all manner of solar vagaries seem to have an obscure relation with them.

For solar vagaries are numerous, and signs of some eruptive (we do not say volcanic) force are everywhere visible. This sun is no tranquilly luminous sphere, but—

Is plainly seen to boil and burst
Too horribly for hell;

as Coventry Patmore has it. The light-giving photosphere casts up its burning spouts—immense billows, as it were, from a sea of light—which science calls “faculæ.” The chromosphere jets forth gigantic tongues of carmine fire, or heaves up banks of brooding and quiescent-seeming flame; both called “prominences,” to distinguish them from the “faculæ” of the photosphere. These faculæ are found indifferently in various regions of the photosphere; but are most numerous in the regions where spots are (the “spot-zones”), and always accompany spots. Much the same may be said of prominences. These seldom, however, accompany growing spots, but where dying spots are, prominences most do congregate. The chromosphere itself “has a markedly eruptive aspect,” says Miss Clerke. “It presents no billowy ocean-surface, but resembles rather a Tartarean meadow, planted with stalks and grass-blades of fire, waving under some unimaginable furnace blast.” Why do these fiery jets from either belt of the sun accompany and specially throng near sun-spots? Why do the prominences of the outer belt develop when the spots with which they are associated begin to fade? What is the mysterious bond between spots and the manifestation of these eruptive signs? What is the shock, thrilling from within outwards through all the burning swathes of the sun, which springs into energy, apparently at sight of these travelling spots? Science has no answer beyond the vague surmise contained in that suggestion of a volcanic origin for the sun-spots.

But not here is the end. The corona—that girdle of tenuous flame shooting forth like an aurora which becomes visible during an eclipse—also obeys the same strange influence. At the decennial period when the sun-spots are in full activity, the corona is a uniform serrated girdle as we have described it. But as the sun-spot disturbance declines, the streamers of the corona draw away from the poles of the sun; till (if observed during an eclipse when the disturbance has become feeble) they are seen arranged in four horns above the spot-zones, two on either side of the sun—making it like a four-rayed star. Once more, it is clear that the weakening of energy in the sun-spot disturbance coincides with a slackening of energy in the out-streaming of the corona. In all these facts, when they are grouped together, there is abundant significance, abundant food for thought, and abundant field for future and further scientific research. We would add to them another fact; though the connection may not seem too apparent. Those various belts of the sun, from the corona inward, are of very small density. The sun's force of gravitation is immensely strong. According to all law, its pull should contract these various swathings into about half the space they occupy, drawing them closer to its surface. Yet they remain uncompacted, defying gravitation. Science is bewildered for a reason. Yet one thing it surely points at: that a counter-force to solar gravitation exists. All these things point their fingers in one direction; and in that direction science is hurrying to discovery. That the discovery, when it comes, will be a surprise to the discoverers, we believe. We doubt that present scientific hypotheses in this matter are far from the truth. But enough has been said to show the character and vastness of the problems which Miss Clerke's book opens, and in which she tries to indicate the fruitful lines of research. They have the remoteness and fascination of the stars themselves.

Parasitic Literature.

THIS IS OF AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE. Translated by M. S. Henry and Versified by E. W. Thomson. (Schulze.) OF AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE: A TRANSLATION. Together with Amabel and Amoris. Given for the first time by Laurence Housman. (Murray. 5s. net.)

It was Walter Pater, in one of those fragrant “Studies in the History of the Renaissance,” who first brought “Aucassin and Nicolette” into the ken of the English reader. And since then the Christian lad and the Saracen maid have been gathered, with Lancelot and Guenever, Tristan and Iseult, Abelard and Heloise, Petrarch and Laura, Dante and Beatrice, Paolo and Francesca, Romeo and Juliet, and, latest comers of all, Pelléas and Mélisande, into that great company of immortal lovers, whose stories are for ever dear to mortal lovers and to poets. In many ways their tale stands out uniquely even amongst the rich romance literature of which it forms a part. Mr. Housman speaks of the “old grooves of rhyme and prose” as “once the accepted means to romantic narrative.” Actually, of course, this example of the conte-fable, so far as anything extant is concerned, stands alone, and its alternately chanted and spoken sections probably represent less an established manner than a stage of transition between the earlier minstrelsy of verse and the later minstrelsy of prose. Then, again, although by no means wholly free from the mediæval conventions of phrase and descriptions, “Aucassin and Nicolette” is far more concentrated than the typical examples of romantic literature. The narrative has no longueurs; the exquisite passages come thick and fast. Mr. Pater was interested in the piece as an assertion, in the full stream of the middle ages, of that “liberty of the heart” which one commonly associates with the Renaissance temper. He laid stress on the sincerity and the intensity of its passion, on the strain of antinomianism which here and there peeps through it. The amorist will dwell rather on the exquisite pictures—on the appeals to the senses—with which it is crowded. He will think of Aucassin, slim and curly-haired, spurring his horse wildly through his foes and forgetting his reins for love of the white girl, or lying with his shoulder out of joint and watching the stars through a chink in the lodge of wattled boughs that she had made. He will think of Nicolette listening to the nightingale's song in the garden, or letting herself down on the dewy grass by a rope of her bedclothes and creeping by moonlight through the shadows of the streets of Beaucaire in search of her imprisoned lover. And for the folklorist there is that strange land of Torelore, to which the adventurous pair travel, where men practice the couvade and make battle with roasted crab-apples and cheeses and horse-mushrooms.

Charming as “Aucassin and Nicolette” is, one does not quite see why translators of old French should never venture upon anything else. Mr. F. W. Bourdillon's first edition, containing the text as well as a translation, was published in 1887 and revised in 1897. In 1887 also appeared renderings by Mr. Andrew Lang and Mr. E. J. W. Gibb. Another by Messrs. M. S. Henry and E. W. Thomson was issued in America in 1896, and is now reprinted in sumptuous form, and with elaborate and sometimes beautiful initial letters ornamented with Byzantine or Celtic strap-work designs. Almost simultaneously came a new version, written by Mr. Laurence Housman to woodcuts by Miss Clemence Housman, after drawings by Mr. Paul Woodroffe. Surely there is some wasted labour here. Modern canons of translation do not allow the translator much of a free hand. Chapman and Pope made very different things of Homer. But the writers before us, at any rate as far as the prose is concerned, can only offer the slightest variations on the same theme. Let us take a test passage. It shall be the famous chiaroscuro bit which Mr. Pater included in his essay. Here is the French:—

Et les flors des margerites qu'ele ronpoit as ortex de ses piés, qui li gissoient sor le mennisse du pió par deseure, estoient droites noires avers ses piés et ses ganbes, tant par estoit blance la mescinete.

This is what Mr. Pater made of it:—

The daisies which she crushed in passing, holding her skirt high behind and before, looked dark against her feet; the girl was so white!

Here is Mr. Bourdillon:—

And the blossoms of the daisies which she broke off with the toes of her feet, which lay on the narrow of her feet above, were right black against her feet and her legs, so very white was the maiden.

Here Mr. Lang:—

And the daisy flowers that brake beneath her as she went tip-toe, and that bent above her instep, seemed black against her feet, so white was the maiden.

Here Mr. Henry:—

And the daisy flowers that she bent with the toes of her feet, as they fell back on the instep above, were right black against her feet and her legs, so very white was the maiden.

And here Mr. Housman:—

And the heads of the daisies which she broke with the tips of her feet, and which fell upon her instep above, were dead black against her feet and limbs, so white was the small maiden.

Mr. Pater, of course, is only translating a fragment, and into that introduces a phrase from another part of the passage; and Mr. Bourdillon and Mr. Lang appear to have been working independently and simultaneously. But we should be glad to know what Mr. Henry and Mr. Housman think that they contribute.

It is but fair to say that the verse sections offer a little more scope for comparatively original treatment, and Mr. Housman, in particular, catches the dainty manner of his model well enough. We may find room for a specimen:—

NOW ONE SINGS.

Nicolette, with brow so sweet,
From the herd-boys turned her feet,
And, her path set forth upon,
Deep in leafy woods was gone,
Where the track grew faint and wan;
Till she came upon a place
Where the road by seven ways
Thence through all the country ran,
So to thinking she began
How her lover she might prove
By his word to be her love.
Stems of field-lilies she broke,
And the leafage of the oak,
And with other leaves as well
Shaped thereof a dainty cell;

Ne'er was seen so sweet before.
And by God's own Truth she swore,
Should Aucassin chance that way,
And for love of her not stay,
Nor to rest awhile agree,
Ne'er shall he her lover be,
Nor his love she.

"Amabel and Amoris" is an essay of Mr. Housman's own in the same manner. "My seedling," he says, "stands under the parent tree, naked and unshamed, owning its bright origin." He has introduced an allegorical element in the figure of Father Love, "a fair youth, with his wings folded, and his bow lying at rest beside his quiver; and in his hand was a shepherd's crook made of green willow with the leaves fresh on it." But, for the rest, it is, as the author himself admits, little more than an echo, and in the production of echoes Mr. Housman is certainly showing an alarming facility. An amusing and even fascinating occupation, no doubt, but in the end it becomes (does it not?) a little parasitic. We should be glad to hear Mr. Housman speak out for himself next time.

Intellectual Devotions.

THE DEVOTIONS OF SAINT ANSELM. Edited by Clement C. J. Webb. (Methuen. 2s.)

THE "Devotions" here presented to the English reader will be found by that person, we suspect, rather an unaccustomed, not to say tough, morsel. Devotions, in these days, have come to be regarded by almost everybody as a species and means of pious emotionalism; the more vague, generalised, and effusive, the better. But Anselm was not only an eminent ecclesiastic, he was a philosopher—the parent, indeed, of mediæval metaphysics. These devotions, accordingly, have an amount of substance and downright thought which is likely to be a sore stumbling-block in the way of the loose modern mind; which is no more disposed to fatigue itself over its prayers than over its novels. This is especially true of the opening treatise, the "Proslogion." The editor himself confesses his hesitation to include it. He gives an interesting example of Anselm's strongly philosophic tendency. It happened on his very death-bed:—

Palm Sunday had dawned [says his disciple Eadmer], and we were sitting round him according to our custom; one of us therefore said to him, "Lord and Father, we understand that you are leaving the world and going to your Lord's Easter court." He answered, "If indeed this is His will, I will gladly obey His will. But if He should rather please that I should still remain among you at least long enough to be able to finish the working out of a problem, which I am revolving in my mind, concerning the origin of the soul, I could gratefully accept it, in that I know not whether any will finish it, when I am gone."

It is the thorough spirit of the thinker. The composition of the "Proslogion" is thus related by the same disciple:—

It came into his mind to inquire whether it would be possible to demonstrate by one short argument alone what is believed and taught concerning God, namely, that He is eternal, unchangeable, almighty, everywhere wholly present, incomprehensible, righteous, gracious, merciful, true, truth, goodness, righteousness, and so forth, and how all these attributes are one in Him. And this matter . . . he [Anselm] found one of great difficulty. For the consideration thereof not only robbed him of appetite and of sleep, but . . . distracted the direction of his thoughts to God at matins and at other services of the Church. When therefore he perceived this, and could not fully achieve the discovery of that which he sought, he concluded that this train of thought was a temptation of the devil, and strove to dismiss it from his mind. But the more he laboured to do this, the more did the thought haunt his mind. And all at once one night during the office of nocturne the grace of God shone into his heart, and the thing which he sought became plain to his understanding, and filled all his inward parts with an infinite joy and delight. Considering then to himself that the same reasoning if it were known to others might be pleasing to them also, he did not grudge them this satisfaction, but wrote down his argument on tablets and delivered them to a brother of the monastery.

Of its successive mishaps and rewritings we need not speak. But this account sufficiently indicates the strenuous nature of the "Proslogion." It is here that occurs Anselm's famous declaration, Credo ut intelligam, "I believe that I may understand." The editor rather tries to whittle away its significance; but we think Anselm meant it wholly. The other meditations make less demands on the intellect: none the less, we fancy that even these will scarce find acceptance outside the ranks of thoughtful people.

Other New Books.

RECOLLECTIONS OF FORTY YEARS' SERVICE. By Major-General Sir Alexander Bruce Tulloch, K.C.B., C.M.G. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)

SIR ALEXANDER TULLOCH's first memory of soldiering dates back to 1844, in which year he saw a Queen's birthday parade at Edinburgh Castle. "I have a distinct remembrance," he writes, "of seeing, from where I stood above the Half-moon battery, a solitary artilleryman walking from gun to gun and firing them by means of a red-hot poker." In 1852 the boy was taken to Sandhurst. The following passage is a not unapt comment upon methods still, unfortunately, not wholly superseded:—

Drill only lasted an hour in the middle of the day, but it was of the most severe barrack-square type . . . "Handle cartridge" and "bout" (to bring the musket to the capping position) were words of command in the platoon (firing) exercise. The term "firelock" was in regular use. Biting the cartridge, although flintlocks had been abolished eight years before I went to Sandhurst, was continued for several years after I joined the service.

Sir Alexander Tulloch's experiences in India during the Mutiny were confined to very minor matters; from there he proceeded to Canton. The business of the Taku Forts and the surrender of Peking provide some interesting matter, but it must be said that apart from a certain engaging frankness Sir Alexander Tulloch's narrative has no great vitality. It is best from the anecdotal and sporting points of view. Perhaps the most valuable chapters are those dealing with Tel-el-Kebir, South Africa, and Australia. It may be noted that in South Africa, in 1884, the author had a pamphlet printed, called "How to beat the Boers," which was distributed for the general benefit of the regiment, which pamphlet gave details about shooting and advancing to the attack. When the late South African war broke out Sir Alexander Tulloch applied for any kind of official employment, which was refused on the ground of his rank and retirement. His offer to go as a subaltern was also declined. "Although not so active as I was sixteen years before," he says, "I certainly thought I might have been able to hold my own with the boys again. . . ." We have no doubt of it.

WITH MACDONALD IN UGANDA. By Major Herbert H. Austin. (Arnold. 15s. net.)

THIS volume is described in the sub-title as "A narrative account of the Uganda Mutiny and Macdonald Expedition in the Uganda Protectorate and the Territory to the North." The main object of the book is to give a clear idea of the exploration work achieved by the expedition sent out to East Africa in June, 1897, under the command of Major (now Colonel) Macdonald. The expedition was confronted by a serious situation in the outbreak of hostilities with the Sudanese mutineers. The fighting is dealt with somewhat briefly, and as Major Austin was detached for considerable intervals from his chief, the exploratory work of Colonel Macdonald finds no first-hand place in these pages.

The story of both the military and exploring expeditions is full of interest, and brings home to us once more what may be done by a small force of determined men cast loose in the midst of unknown dangers. Forced marches, fever, the constant nerve-strain of the silent bush, which may at any moment bristle with an attacking force: these are things which only such a sober narrative as this can bring home to the fire-side reader. During the hard fighting at Kabagambi, one of the toughest victories in the campaign, Captain Malony was killed:—

Poor Malony's death was much felt by us all, for never did a more gallant, unselfish, and modest soldier serve the Queen. I had known him for years . . . and whilst I was with him shortly before he breathed his last, he looked up to me and said: "I have an old 'shop' photo of a group with you and me in it."

There we have the real pathos of death and comradeship in a strange land.

FIELD-MARSHAL SIR DONALD STEWART, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., C.I.E. By G. R. Elsmie. (Murray. 15s. net.)

THE name of Sir Donald Stewart is intimately and honourably associated with a long period in the history of India. He came, as Mr. Elsmie points out, of one of the many Scottish families which have found a career for their sons in the East, and he bore, like Allan Breck, a king's name, though with no claim to royal blood. Yet he was of the stock of the Stewarts of Fincastle, which is a good enough descent for any reasonable man. When he was sixteen he was appointed to a cadetship in the Indian Army, and in February of 1841 he landed in Calcutta; a little later he was posted as an ensign in the 9th Bengal Infantry, at Secrole, Benares. His tact, enthusiasm, and capacity were soon recognised, and advancement came. In the introduction by Sir Henry Cunningham and Mr. Elsmie we read:—

He arrived at Calcutta just as Lord Auckland's abortive attempt to solve the Afghan problem was closing in the direst disgrace and disaster that English arms have ever known. He lived to see and take part in another Afghan war, to lead a British force to Cabul by the same route as Nott had followed . . . to despatch one army to a victorious issue, and to march another out of the country without firing a gun or losing a man. He witnessed Dalhousie's magnificent career of energy, conquest, and development—the tremendous re-action of the Mutiny, the gradual process of restoration and reconstruction—the changes which that reconstruction involved, the passing away of the East India Company with its many honourable traditions, the conversion of its Army into an Imperial Force.

The letters and extracts from Sir Donald Stewart's diary here printed give an admirable picture of the man as well as of the work to which he set his hand with such energy and success. He had unflagging spirit, humour, and that profound sense of honour which is happily one of the touchstones of our Army tradition. His was a life in which there was "nothing to conceal, to extenuate, to explain away"; and it is good to think that such men are still in the making,—good, too, to have such records as this to point the straight road to the old end.

The two latest additions to Messrs. Bell's "Miniature Series of Painters" are "Murillo," by Dr. G. C. Williamson, and "Millais," by A. L. Baldrey. In each volume a brief biography of the artist is given, a chapter upon the tendencies and characteristics of his art, and descriptive comments on the examples reproduced. In each case there follows a list of the artist's chief works in public galleries, &c., and to the "Murillo" has been appended a brief bibliography. These little books, well produced as they are, should be of considerable value to young students as well as to amateurs.

In Messrs. Methuen's series of "Little Guides" we have "Cornwall," by Arthur L. Salmon, and "Kent," by George Clinch. Concerning Cornwall Mr. Salmon says: "Cornwall is like no other English county. Its nearest resemblance in England will be found in Devon; parts of Ireland are equally or more similar." "Equally or more similar" is not happy English, but the statement is true enough. Some of Mr. Boulter's illustrations are very pleasant. Mr. Clinch is as enthusiastic about Kent as Mr. Salmon about Cornwall. "Regarded from the point of view of natural scenery," he says, "Kent has little to fear from comparison with any other county in the land." This volume is well illustrated by Mr. Bedford. The general scheme of this series we have indicated before.

NEW EDITIONS: The eleventh and twelfth volumes of the excellent Biographical Edition of Dickens (Chapman and Hall) consist of "David Copperfield" and "Bleak House." The writer of the introductions makes the somewhat hazardous conjecture that if only one book out of the whole Victorian prose-fiction were to be preserved, readers "would stretch out their eager hands" for "David Copperfield" rather than for "Vanity Fair."—From Messrs. Macmillan we have received a reprint of the "Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley," in three volumes, in the "Eversley Series." The first edition was published, in two volumes, in 1900.—From Messrs. Hodges, Figgis, there comes a third edition of Wakeman's "Handbook of Irish Antiquities." Mr. John Cook is the present editor.

Fiction.

The Strident and the Actual.

A CASTLE IN SPAIN. By Bernard Capes. (Smith Elder. 6s.)
CROPPIES LIE DOWN. By William Buckley. (Duckworth. 6s.)

MR. CAPES is always a writer of infinite self-consciousness; you see it in every phrase. And that self-consciousness, which asserts itself conspicuously in the effort to escape the normal, lands Mr. Capes in grotesquenesses which seriously injure his art. We gladly admit that Mr. Capes has art—now and then it shines out unmistakeably; but more often, to our thinking, it is obscured by over-elaboration, by a strain and stridency which set the nerves on edge. In point of plot, "A Castle in Spain" is commonplace enough. It is the story of a noble French-woman who made a slip; of her two sons, the one brave and strong, the other cowardly and weak; and of how Robin Lois, under the spur of the mother's passion for the Royal House, took a commission in the English Army in Spain, in order to cover an attempt to bring to England Louis XVII. who, for the purposes of the story, is supposed not to have died in the Temple, but to have been carried to Spain, and there kept in hiding in a convent. Here is ample opportunity for a certain kind of romance, and romance Mr. Capes gives us; it is full of action, of careful piling up of detail, of terror and slaughter. Yet it all has an air of quite astonishing unreality; its most brilliant effects are marred for us by the author's persistent effort to get the top note out of everything. We can see the writer gnawing his pen, striving for the right word; a word comes, but it is, as often as not, by no means the right one. Take such a passage as this: "We turned presently into, and pulled up, a long reach of water, flanked on either side by shallow slopes of mud, on which the ripples of our progress lipped and slobbered. . . ." The word "slobbered" is arresting, but one instantly perceives that it is not truly descriptive—nay, that it is entirely out of place. Again, Mr. Capes talks of a fire throwing "gasps of light" on panels and morions; the meretricious striving after effect is again apparent. "Gasps of light," to put it plainly, is absurd. And so, too, with the dramatic element in the book; some of the situations are really strong, but Mr. Capes succeeds in so loading them with tinsel and embroidery that our emotions are hardly touched; simple limelight is not enough—Mr. Capes must needs turn on every colour until we become aware of the machinery and are constrained to smile at it. And yet Mr. Capes does not hesitate to use that horrible phrase "to a degree," a phrase which should be eliminated from the vocabulary of every self-respecting writer.

Perhaps we are inclined to take Mr. Capes too seriously, but if it be so it is his own fault. Disappointment, too, comes in, for it is clear that Mr. Capes has qualities worth the most careful cultivation. But it must be a cultivation by the way of simplicity. There are passages in "A Castle in Spain" which are almost satisfying, passages of real vigour and imagination. But these are rare; the general impression is as of a shrilling and irrepressible cornet in an assertive brass band.

In "Croppies Lie Down" we turn to a romance of a very different type. Mr. Buckley has no self-consciousness, nor has he much deliberate art. Yet this story of Ireland in '98 is broadly conceived and humanly treated, and the result is a book which compels, moves, and leaves with us an impression of sinister actuality. The details of that terrible but ill-directed and abortive rebellion are set before us with as little compromise as may be, and the characters fall naturally into a scheme which aims at presenting practically the whole field of the rising. The conventions of Mr. Buckley's plot do not affect us; the love interest is at no time particularly strong, save towards the conclusion of the story, where it flames into somewhat too heroic tragedy, yet the book is a piece of real achievement. We can recall no novel dealing with the '98 which has so successfully gripped the terror, the pluck, the incredible brutality of those devastating weeks. And Mr. Buckley has had no need to draw upon his imagination for horrible facts; they blot so thickly the pages of the history of the rebellion that there is nothing left for fancy to invent. The French Revolution had nothing to show more utterly inhuman than the doings of the men who wore the King's uniform in '98; on the rebel side, of course, there were reprisals, but the undisciplined forces of riot had some respect at least for women. Here is a sample of the talk of certain men on the loyalist side:—

"Give me Rawson of the North Corks," said a bottle-nosed man in scarlet and black, who answered to the name of Smith, "zounds, he can make a cat-o'-nine tails whistle! I saw him once sitting in a circle composed of triangles, and by Heaven he had a croppy howling on each, with another row of wretches kneeling on the ground, waiting their turn. Curse me, 'twas better than an oratorio of Handel!"

"Yes, the Messiah, damn me," grinned Bird. "If the North Cork down at the Hermitage, that's Nicky Plornish's detachment, go on as they began, they'll drive 'em mad. Spiritless boors! Why don't they come into the field and give us a shot at them?"

"Well, of all the ways, the best seems to me to be this—pay a few polite attentions to the ladies," observed a thin pale-faced man in scarlet, who had the habit of perpetually moistening his lips with the tip of his tongue. "Flog, pitch-cap, burn the roof over their lousy heads—they'll stand it all, but just do to one of their potato-pussed jades what no lady in the land would take exception to, and pillaloo! All the fat's in the fire."

We cannot enter here into the question of how far the rising was deliberately fostered by Castlereagh and his tools, or to what extent the Union grew out of misery and blood. Mr. Buckley leaves us in no doubt as to his point of view, but it is expressed temperately, and he does justice to the good on both sides. The book as a whole impresses us as a work of remarkable narrative vigour; in particular, the fighting in New Ross has a reality which is rare in modern fiction—the description reeks of clamour and slaughter. We have only a word of serious criticism—the book is too long. In his desire to omit nothing of importance, Mr. Buckley has included too much. Here and there the story straggles.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

LITTLE ENTERTAINMENTS.

BY BARRY PAIN.

For some years Mr. Barry Pain has shown a surprising power of endurance in producing week by week short sketches or stories, humorous or pathetic. They take five minutes to read, and in whatever mood the reader begins, the reading amuses. Some of them have been collected in this little book: they are, as the title expresses it, just "Little Entertainments," the outlook of a humourist, who has not grown tired, upon life. Mr. Pain comes to the point at once. Here is a beginning: "The desert was plainly, if sparsely, furnished with some sand, a dead camel and a traveller named Smith." (Unwin.)

DANNY.

BY ALFRED OLLIVANT.

Scotch, sad, pretty and pathetic. As with the author's former book "Owd Bob," the hero is a dog—a Dandie Dinmont, beloved by the Laird of Hepburn's young wife, and playing after her death a strange part in the village history. The Laird dies, the dog dies, and "the curlews haunt the sky above him; the feet of fox, and old grey brock, and all the enemies he loved, pass and repass above his grave, and do not wake him now; nor shall cold of snow, nor heat of sun, nor drumming wind, nor rain upon him ever rouse him now." (Murray. 6s.)

A FREE LANCE OF TO-DAY.

BY HUGH CLIFFORD.

Mr. Clifford is well known for his Eastern stories and sketches. The book opens in Kampong Glam, the native quarter of Singapore, and introduces us to an Englishman named Curzon and a Malay. Curzon was one of those whom the East gripped, "as it ever grips boys of strong imagination—the victims it has marked for its own." The scene shifts from Singapore to Acheer, whose inhabitants have been at war with the Dutch for a generation. A strong and vivid story. (Methuen. 6s.)

ABRAHAM'S SACRIFICE.

BY GUSTAF JANSON.

A translation from the Swedish, being a study of the effect of war on the character of fighting men—Boer and Briton. On page 2 we read, "Then the 19th Irish Dragoons swore loudly and long that the cursed Boers should pay dearly for the mischief they had done. The Boers, however, kept discreetly in the background, and the story of the torn-up rails proved to be part of a pack of lies told by some over-imaginative Kaffir." (Methuen. 6s.)

ALAIN TANGER'S WIFE.

BY J. H. YOXALL, M.P.

The hero of Mr. Yoxall's new romance is "an infernal ass and Johnny of a fellow called Alain Tanger," who had been through Marlborough and Peterhouse without achieving anything in particular, and at last found himself with no profession and a bare two hundred a year. The style is marked by a good deal of "glitter." "The long, white cloth was lamplit already, and the lamplight filtered through a fantastic tapestry of leaves to burnish the russet boughs of chestnut that hung over all. Westward, a primrose sky was meshed in purple, and a star, the first white foot-mark of evening, was printed on the East." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE TEMPLARS.

BY E. H. LACON WATSON.

Introduces us to a "red-brick mansion known as the Court," in a Worcestershire village, occupied by Dr. Templar and his family, which included the doctor's second wife, her children, and a daughter by his first marriage. The story is concerned with love of various sorts and a will, to which a match is applied in the last chapter. "It's a felony, I believe," said one of the characters, "but it's no concern of mine." The book concludes with the words, "Valete, my friends, and if you will, Plaudite." (Arnold. 6s.)

THE POWER OF THE PALMIST.

BY VIOLET GUTTENBERG.

By the author of "Neither Jew nor Greek." Begins with an invitation to a wedding, and proceeds to a mysterious stranger, who invaded "Dovesnest" in a thunderstorm and played marvellously on the piano. To his reluctant and unknown hostess he put the startling question: "Do you believe in the transmigration of the soul? Do you remember your previous state of existence?" Then he proceeded to prove that he remembered by imitating a skylark on the piano. A curious and uncanny story. (Chatto. 6s.)

RED-HEADED GILL.

BY RYE OWEN.

Lady Branscombe "in diaphonous and effective black" meets, in the salon of His Excellency H.M.'s Ambassador to the Court of Vienna, the man she had jilted years ago in order to make the more brilliant marriage with Lord Branscombe. Trehanna, still unmarried, and a successful war correspondent, whose permanent address is "Hottest corner of biggest shindy, Servia," has, since his first love episode, formed the conviction that women interfere with a man's work, and that he "can't be bothered." The interest of the story is sustained by the desire to know whether Lady Branscombe was successful in effecting a change in his opinions. (Arrowsmith. 6s.)

THE CRICKLETON CHRONICLES.

BY W. CARTER PLATTS.

The story opens thus: "Chapter XX. So they were married at eleven o'clock this morning, and have lived happily ever since. The End." Then comes an author's note to explain that he puts the last chapter first to please readers who are always anxious to know how a story ends. "The Crickleton Chronicles" are humorous—people say "Jee-rusalem," and things of that sort. The many illustrations are mainly humorous, too. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d.)

THE MAN WITH THE WHITE FACE.

BY MORICE GERARD.

"The feud between the Lassiters of Cheaveley and the Dormers of Chine Grange, their nearest neighbours, was centuries old." Ralph Dormer, who tells the story, was a cousin of Jack, the heir of the Dormers, and a pauper. Ralph and Jack had both loved Patricia Delancour, Geoffrey Lassiter's great niece and probable heiress. The tale is brimming with mystery and intrigue. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

CHANGES AND CHANCES.

BY ANTOINETTE WEBER.

A quiet tale of village life which, if as Dora suggests of Aunt Mildred's early romance, "not quite back in Jane Austen's time," has something of the atmosphere of "Sense and Sensibility." The story moves with refreshing deliberation through some three hundred and sixty pages, and is painstaking and sincere. (Arnold. 6s.)

KARL OF ERBACH.

BY H. C. EATLEY.

A romance of the Thirty Years' War. The story was published in "Longman's Magazine" under the title "Prince Karl." (Longmans. 6s.)

The Black List.

It is really time to compile a Black List of words and phrases that have appeared in Court so often as to suggest their immediate expulsion. Those that appear on the Black List should be unable—for three years at least—to obtain printer's ink at any printing office in the United Kingdom.

The reporter is one of the chief instigators of these offenders whom we propose to put on the Black List. In the last few weeks he has worked his "succulent bivalve" unmercifully, and the bivalve should be sent, with the "London particular," and the "sacred edifice," and the "devouring element," to a Home for Incurables, to enjoy a "well earned rest"—another candidate for the List. Morning by morning as you pick up the paper to see how the University crews are coming on, you read that A. and B. "indulged in" tubbing. Now "tubbing" means this: that two men sit down and tug at the oars in a wind-driven sleet, while a third man sits in the stern and curses them. Indulgence! But the reporter is building with the ready-made phrase, having to work in a hurry. There is a sensational suicide announced. Up comes the reporter "transpiring" at every pore. He finds the doctor who said the man was dead, and he writes that the medical man on being summoned "pronounced life extinct." Finally "no reason can be assigned for the rash act." The suicide has left behind him letters which prove that he had contemplated such a departure from life for months; he had taken the most elaborate precautions to elude interference. Never mind. To the reporter suicide has always been "the rash act," so down it goes. It means nothing—or, rather, any meaning it conveys is the wrong one. But somehow or other it seems to fit.

It is easy enough to see why the ready-made phrase, cut from the forest of words, rough-hewn, sawn, planed, morticed and shipped ready for immediate use is popular with the writer in a hurry. For the reporter is like the contractor who has to run up a suburban street in the shortest possible time and at the smallest possible expense. To this end he obtains all his window frames and doors from some Scandinavian firm which sends them from the virgin forest to the foreman carpenter. When the moment comes the foreman carpenter claps them in. This means a great saving of expense. And what money is to the contractor, brain exhaustion is to the writer. You cannot demand from the suburban builder his individual attention to the special architecture of a twenty-five pound house in Wandsworth. But this method of building does not make for beauty. The ideal house is the one which bears the impress of thought upon material, each detail must be specially fitted to its place, and announce by implication that elsewhere it would be out of place. Now if we carry out the analogy we shall admit that the reporter is under dire temptation to build with ready-made phrases—to think in phrases rather than in words. They are cheaper.

But just as one would gladly shatter suburbia to bits and "mould it nearer to the heart's desire," so one would like to break up the phrases into words, mix them up, and invite the reporter to rearrange them.

Dulness and monotony have some excuse. We should black-list the "well earned rest" and the "scene of her former triumphs," the "young lady of prepossessing appearance," the "ample justice" that is done to the viands beneath which the "tables literally groaned," and the wedding presents that are "numerous and costly"; but we admit their use in a world where time is money and lines are a penny; these habitual offenders might, after some years abstention from ink, be considered to have purged their offence. Much more annoying is the attempt at absurd ornamentation, the struggle against tautology which results only in ridiculous turrets and preposterous pinnacles of language. Here the sporting reporter is supreme. "Trundling the leather" and "negotiating the spheroid" are but two of a hundred candidates for the Black List. These, however, any magistrate would convict at sight. There is no defence possible. But why should it be necessary, when Dr. Johnson has been mentioned twice, to call him at the third allusion "the great Lexicographer"? No one, we suppose, could name the writer who first heard that phrase, and certainly no one could number those who have clapped it into type. It is one of the most persistent offenders, and it should be instantly black-listed. It has no longer any possible relation with Johnson's reputation, which rests now on the careful chatter of Boswell. With the great Lexicographer must pass into obscurity the "Swan of Avon," the "Wizard of the North," and the "Sage of Chelsea." The phrases ring through the papers with the maddening iteration of the latest popular tune that the whistle of the street boy catches from the piano-organ which gets it from heaven knows where. To the list, too, must be added that infuriating beginning of a paragraph: "it is interesting to note." If it were not interesting there would be no excuse for noting it.

The professional writer, whether he be a reporter who talks of a holocaust from which nearly every one escaped, or a wearied leader-writer who skips from one subject to the other with "meanwhile"—is a serious offender. But one can see the reason of his error. It is the amateur—the semi-professional—who is the most surprising. A man knows his subject; he talks about it over the dinner table; talks well; and some one, impressed by his vigorous presentation of a view, says, "Why don't you send that to a newspaper?" The idea appeals to him. He goes home, sits down, spreads his blotting pad, dips his pen—and reflects that he must be literary. "I crave a portion of your valuable space anent a question which is en évidence" he begins. He makes a correction, and proceeds leaving "anent" and en évidence. You may fill up the gaps, for the subject does not matter. "Rush into print"—"comes as something in the nature of a surprise"—"woo the muse"—"the force of (anything you like) could no further go"—"his sable majesty"—"a place not mentioned in polite society"—"save the mark!"—"I have yet to learn"—"gentlemen(?)"—"perish the thought!"—"ye gods and little fishes"—"Apologising for taking up so much of your valuable space." And yet across the dinner table he said none of these things, every one of which we consign at once to the Black List, every one of which sensible men write when they write to the newspapers. For they are determined to be literary. And the unusual medium of the pen paralyses their thought and throws them back on the phrase. That is probably the explanation of the business letter—from the house-agent or the solicitor—which is built out of whole sentences.

By chance, we came across a recently published novel, and glancing at the first page, found the very antithesis to the machine-made phrase, and also some consolation for the present style of architecture. It must be quoted :—

Many years ago—more than I need attempt to recall with any degree of exactitude—when wandering wearily in the fantastic wilderness of sleep, I chanced most unexpectedly upon a valley of indescribable loveliness—a veritable fairyland of beauty and romance. It was the trysting bower of Love and Music, where indolent Rest stood janitor to guard against intrusion, and the Ills of life had no power to disturb the reigning Content. With a pilgrim soul scarred, bruised, and crushed in the unequal battle of life, I naturally hailed the discovery with jubilant rejoicings, and yielded only too willingly to the fascinations it exerted. I threw myself into its inviting arms and gave way to somnolent enjoyment.

“Comment is needless” (and this is the last time that sentence should be written). Here is a writer who honestly tries to build without the aid of ready-made windows and doors, making some attempt to say what he means as he means it to be said. But the man who designs his own house is said invariably to forget the staircase. And there is a point in that extract where one misses that staircase. It is not easy to express a meaning in the clearest way, either in bricks or in print. There are architects in words as there are architects in stone. But the art demands toil, and is not to be learned between whiles. And there may be some sympathy for the writer whom necessity compels to build with phrases that other men have hewn and morticed. Nevertheless, with magisterial tenderness, we put him upon the Black List.

The Sonnet.

THE sonnet is always with us. This is an age when the hurried reader, impatient of the effort required for prolonged attention, demands short poems, which he can read and master in their integrity during a casual hour of leisure. The much less capacity of most modern poets for prolonged and sustained effort (which is an observable fact, explain it how you will), together with their tendency towards lyric rather than narrative or dramatic poetry, renders them very willing to meet this taste of modern readers. Now the sonnet is a ready-made form of brief poem, consecrated by tradition and great example. It is not surprising, therefore, that it should have an unexampled vogue. Collections of sonnets have been beyond number these late years; and Mr. Bowyer Nichol's “Little Book of English Sonnets” (Methuen and Co.), which belongs to the “Little Library,” adds yet another. Though on the whole well selected, it has nothing to distinguish it from other collections but the skilful adaptation to its miniature size, which the editor has secured by limiting it to the poets before Tennyson; about whose time begins the extensive cultivation of the English sonnet. It interests us, nevertheless, by its preface, which is not only well written and judicious, but puts forward at least one view we have long entertained.

The sonnet is, of course, an essentially artificial form, and (so far as we can trace it with certainty) of Italian origin. It is not only artificial, but complexly artificial. Limited to fourteen lines, in its Italian or Petrarchan form (the recognised classical form), those fourteen lines are divided by an intricate arrangement of rhymes. The first eight lines (the octave) are divided into two portions of four lines each; the first and last lines of each quatrain (or four lines) rhyming together, while the middle two lines rhyme with each other. Moreover, there are but two rhymes throughout the octave (or first portion of eight lines); the first and last lines of the two quatrains being all on the one rhyme, while the middle couplets of the two quatrains are all on the same secondary rhyme. Represented by letters, the rhyme-scheme is : a b b a ; a b b a. To correspond with this rhyme-construction, there should be a certain pause or division in the sense between the two quatrains (not necessarily a complete pause, that is, a full-stop); and a complete pause at the end of the octave. Indeed, the octave should exhaust and bring to a close one aspect of the single idea or feeling which forms the subject-matter of every sonnet. A second and closing aspect is taken up in the last six lines (the sestet). This sestet, or last six lines, the poet can rhyme as he pleases; save that the Italians (who should be the best judges) object to their closing with a couplet. It gives too epigrammatic a character to the sonnet; which should rather die gravely and collectedly away, after reaching its climax in the close of the octave.

At the risk of pedantry we make this explanation, because no discussion of the sonnet is possible without understanding its strict Italian form. The English form to which Shakespeare has given his name (though the Earl of Surrey seems to have invented it) is far simpler. It consists of three quatrains (or sets of four lines each) rhyming alternately—a fresh set of rhymes for each quatrain; with a rhyming couplet to conclude the whole (a couplet, need we say, being two lines rhyming together?). Such, in the clearest explanation we can give, are the chief rival forms, the Petrarchan and the Shakespearean. And Mr. Nichol contends that the Shakespearean is the more satisfactory for English use.

Coventry Patmore (the passage is quoted in his “Life”) condemned the Petrarchan or Italian sonnet altogether, largely for reasons connected with its metrical structure. Without entering into questions so subtle, we are disposed to think it over-valued for English purposes—whatever may be said of it for Italian purposes. It is consecrated in men's eyes by Milton and Wordsworth, who employed it exclusively; since when (in the language of Pear's soap) poets have used no other—or seldom any other form. The Miltonic sonnet (as Mr. Nichol remarks, following Mr. Bridges) is an Horatian ode in little, so to speak. Milton attained this majestic and unified quality by neglecting the prescribed pauses, not only between the quatrains, but even between octave and sestet, and making the sense continuous, at pleasure, throughout the sonnet. Wordsworth imitated his licence with greater licence; sometimes adding besides a third rhyme in the middle couplet of the second quatrain. They attained noble effect. But why adopt a structure in form, merely to violate it in essence? Why not adopt a form which shall frankly accord with your design, instead of one you must wrest to your design? The reason of the form being gone, it becomes meaningless; nay, the form means one thing, the internal structure another—they are contradictory. It is like the violation of the pause prescribed by the heroic couplet, so painful in “Endymion.” The defiance of the sonnet-form is no whit more reputable because the intricacy of that form prevents the ear's swift recognition of the defiance.

But, say you, that is past; we can now write true Italian sonnets; there is Rossetti. There is Rossetti. At his best he triumphs, this beef-fed Italian. But at other times, even with him, the rhyme is apt to be unpleasantly prominent. With native-born poets it is often prominent, and one has a general sense of difficulty overcome which one should not have. The English muse does not breathe freely in the form. It has too much whalebone for her large movements. The Shakespearean form, without the Italian's crafty completion for its chosen aims, is simpler, native, capable both of sweetness and majesty; a better instrument, we think, for our English muse. As Mr. Nichol observes, Keats ended by using it, though he began with the Petrarchan model; and Keats had instinct.

Throughout the greater portion of her career, indeed (until, that is, the Victorian period), the English muse has not taken kindly to the sonnet. That is the reflection which comes to one in glancing through this little book.

There is a disappointingly small proportion of first-rate merit, apart from its interest as experiment in an originally foreign form. A selection of lyric, or narrative, or any other manner of poems, during the like period would pan out far richer in pure gold. Wyatt (speaking always from the austere poetic standpoint) Wyatt is nothing, and Surrey not much; Raleigh's sonnet is somewhat overrated; Spenser never so little found himself as in this medium; we cannot share Mr. Nichol's admiration for most of Henry Constable's sacred sonnets; Daniel is surely an ambler with fine lines (though it be treason to say so); vigorous Drayton has yet (like Daniel) but one quite fine sonnet, though others have partial power; Jonson, and Herrick, and Herbert fail in this who do not fail in other things; Habington is naught; the eighteenth century all but barren: and so we reach Wordsworth. The great names (apart from writers of an odd good sonnet or so) can be reckoned on the fingers: Sidney (we do not admire Mr. Nichol's selection from him), Shakespeare, Drummond of Hawthornden, Milton, Wordsworth, Keats. Add to these Mrs. Browning and Rossetti in our day, and you exhaust the list—not a long one for our opulently poetical England. One of the surprises of the book to the average reader, by the way, will be two excellent sonnets by Thomas Russell. Individual sonnets are not wanting. Two of Constable's are good; there are fine ones by Sylvester and William Browne; others of his and one of Campion's are like dainty lyrics more than sonnets. Donne's are well known and ruggedly strong. Gray and Egerton Brydges have each a fine and known sonnet. At least one of Lamb's, Blanco White's, one of Shelley's, and one or two of Hood's outstand from the book. And that, if we have any judgment, is all. Surely, we are driven to repeat, the sonnet is ill-suited to English genius. The present day tells a different tale, to some extent. Yet we question whether a simpler form be not needed; and we ask, with Mr. Nichol, why not the Shakespearean?

The Young Mozart.

THE great musicians are for the most part peculiarly interesting figures; more than poets, more even than artists, romance clings about them; and of them all the most radiantly attractive is Mozart. Deplorably brief though his actual life was, we can scarce realise that he died a few years older than Shelley, and no longer youthful of look. We think of him always as the young immortal, the joyous and marvellous boy. His character—almost his work, despite its unmatched perfection—strengthened the illusion. He has something of a gentlemanly and graceful Dumas père—clean of the gross flesh, in more than literal sense, and the worse irresponsibilities. There is the same perpetual boyishness, the same improvident neglect of monetary prudence—though to less criminal extent, the same joy of life and art, the same effortless fluency and astonishing fertility of invention, but united with the formal perfection of the eighteenth century, which was lacking to the early nineteenth century and Dumas. There was even the same love of fine feathers, chastened by a better taste than belonged to old Alexandre's negro blood. Clementi, indeed, once took him (or said he took him) for one of the court-chamberlains. As a child he obtained abundance of dainty clothes, jewellery, and the like, from the royal or aristocratic admirers of his playing. A ring he wore at Naples during a juvenile tour created a disturbance. The Neapolitans were convinced his precocious feats must be the result of sorcery, and the spell, they decided, was in the ring. Only by taking it off could he calm the tumult which arose.

He is said to have been too brusque and careless for a polished courtier—and a musician must be a courtier to thrive in those days. But from a child he showed the royal self-possession of genius, to which high or low is one.

"So," said the prince-archbishop of Salzburg to the child, back from his first tour round Europe, "we have been to France and England, we have been presented at Court, we have gained great honour!" "But," answered little Wolfgang, "but I don't remember having seen you, Sir, anywhere but here in Salzburg!" Nor was he shy at the Court appearance which the archbishop spoke of, before the Empress Maria Theresa herself. There is a touch of pathos in it. The young princesses petted the blue-eyed, chubby-cheeked child. He tripped and fell. Marie Antoinette hurried to pick him up, and "You are good," cried impulsively frank Wolfgang; "I shall marry you!" Better for poor Marie Antoinette to have married the little musician, than Louis XVI. and his tragic destinies.

The spirit of his operas was in himself. Bright, gay, youthful, ardent, falling in love at sight, and taking a disappointment with tuneful defiance, full of the joy and vivacity of life. He told his wife that he should rather have been a dancer and a composer of dances than a composer of music; and she witnessed to his singular elegance and charm of motion as a partner in the dance. He wrote "Don Giovanni" while his wife (a born storyteller) sat by him and told tale after lively tale. An inspiration apt to the gay melodist and the delighting opera! The confluence of diverse bloods which is Austria only could have compounded such a genius, blending the melodious spontaneity of the Italian with the harmonious science of Germany. Loving father, mother, sister, wife, and deep in love with life; his faults the faults of an abounding boy; leaving works by the hundred, while a hundred have perished; he dropped still singing into the sudden grave, and his "Requiem" floated out to us through its closing doors. Born full-armed with music, he was never meant to be old.

Impressions.

XX.—Poets.

THE hands of the clock pointed to ten o'clock. The end of the lecture was near. My interest re-awakened. "Some," said the lecturer, "are so busy in their lives seeking truth that they have no time to make money: others are so possessed by the strangeness of the seen, and the reality of the unseen, that they have no time to seek truth." There he paused, and came forward a few steps, as if the lecture was ended. The rest was conversational. "I have known three poets in my life," he said, "and this, or something like it, was their way.

"One, a grey-haired poet, I saw but once. It was the month of June in the down country where he lived. The hour was just before sunset, and I, passing by his house, saw him come out of his study, and stand for a moment erect, still as a statue, on the hill-side. He gazed over the quiet land to the setting sun. Then he bared his head, and his lips moved. So he stood till the sun disappeared. I passed on, to see, for ever afterwards when I read his poetry, his figure as I saw it on that June evening, bare-headed before the setting sun, and his lips moving.

"With the streets of London the second is associated. Ill-dressed, looking ill, always with books tucked under his arms, he hurries along the pavement, jostled by the passers-by, derided by the vulgar, going I know not whither, but always hastening on between a quick walk and a run, as if in pursuit of the visions that, the maddening world disregarded, he sees above the house-tops. His chin is always uplifted: above, and beyond, his eyes are always fixed: there on the ribbon of sky, with intermittent gleams of light, that hovers above the buildings. His lips also move—quickly.

"With the third I had some former acquaintance which ripened through a night we spent together in a Northern town where he was living at the time. I had gone there to attend a meeting of a literary society that was endeavouring to persuade the world to accept an ancient author to whom the world was entirely indifferent. This poet and I walked away together from the meeting, and he spoke of a yellow, dog's-eared, leather-bound book which he had bought that day for ninepence. He talked of it with enthusiasm, and his voice rose and fell as he quoted. "Come to my rooms," he said, "and let me read some of it to you." O the neighbourhood where he lived! We went through dark, dank railway arches, and stopped before an aged house in a narrow street, where even at that hour children were scuffling in the gutter. The stairs of the house were uncarpeted, the walls were moist, but the room where he lived was rare in its simplicity. There were books, a few curious prints, one beautiful rug on the bare boards, and on the table a litter of manuscripts. He lighted a candle and read, and the thoughts of that ancient author became living words. Colour shone out in that little room; music filled it. Through the mouth of the living poet; the dead poet spoke again. Outside some dismal man was playing dismally on the cornet, and once the night was cut by a shrill cry of 'Murder'; but the poet read on, oblivious of the present with its complexities and its terrors. And when in the small hours I left him and felt my way down and out into the dark street, he stood at the door, swaying in ecstasy, a candle in one hand, the dog's-eared book in the other, declaiming great verse into the sullen night."

Drama.

Neo-Christianity on the Stage.

It was, I must confess, with some surprise that I found "Resurrection," that remarkable work of the veteran Tolstoi, come back with the plunder of fresh thought to the literary ideals of his youth, behaving as well as it undeniably did upon the stage. The novel is, of course, of absorbing human, as well as philosophical, interest. But it is crowded with detail and with psychological analysis of a kind which does not generally lend itself well to broad and intelligible dramatic treatment. There were faults enough in the performance at His Majesty's Theatre, but on the whole the piece, a triumph of adroit stage-generalship, and played with unusual sincerity by Mr. Tree and with fine emotional quality by Miss Lena Ashwell, did succeed, at any rate during the first three of its four acts, in gripping one beyond expectation.

"Resurrection" belongs to that characteristically modern dramatic species which one habitually knows as melodrama. I do not here use the word in any depreciatory sense. I merely mean that, after running in its course the whole gamut of tragic passion, it ends, not upon the tragic discord, but upon a note which, if not quite optimism, is at least what George Eliot used to call "meliorism." It is tragedy translated into the terms of Christianity. And its theme is appropriately drawn from that neo-Christian gospel of love which Tolstoi has long been preaching to an impenitent and Nietzscheist world. The strains of the Easter Resurrection hymn ring through the play, but it deals, not with the Resurrection of legend, but with the Resurrection of the love of humanity in the soul after its crucifixion by sin and suffering and remorse. This universal and human issue, although perhaps a little imperfectly stated by M. Henry Bataille and Mr. Michael Morton, is naturally the dominant one in the conception of Tolstoi himself. It is worked out in the hearts of Prince Dmitry Nehludof and of the girl Katusha, known as "The Maslova." The story is a simple one, and is very probably familiar to many readers of the ACADEMY, as the book has been translated into French, and, for all I know, into English. For the purposes of the drama it is arranged as follows: In Act I. Dmitry Nehludof, a pleasure-loving young officer, on a visit to the country house of his aunts, sees Katusha, a girl of peasant extraction, who has been the playmate of his youth, and seduces her. For ten years he thinks no more of the affair, but for a vague uneasiness of conscience on hearing that, for some unspecified reason, his victim has been sent away by his aunts in disgrace. In Act II. he is wealthy and prosperous and a prince, and engaged to the charming young Princess Marie. But he is called upon to serve on a jury, engaged in the trial of a Moscow prostitute of the most degraded class for the alleged poisoning of one of her many lovers; and in the notorious "Maslova" he recognises, to his horror, none other than Katusha. He goes through what Tolstoi, with his deep psychological insight, knows to be the very real spiritual process of conversion. The old life falls from him. Katusha is innocent of the particular charge brought against her, but he fails to secure her acquittal, and resolves to devote all his powers to the duty of atonement. He breaks off his engagement to the Princess Marie, and makes his protest against the injustice of society to an amazed judge, representing the official class which Tolstoi detests, in her mother's drawing-room. Act III. contains a very powerful and very painful scene, in which Nehludof visits the drunken drab in prison and is received by her, first with a leer of invitation, and afterwards, when she discovers who he is, with upbraidings and revilings. His notion of atonement is marriage, and this he offers, only to be savagely refused. But his action has touched a buried potentiality, and in her soul, too, the Resurrection begins. In Act IV. he follows her to Siberia, and ultimately succeeds in obtaining for her a pardon from the Czar. By this time her love for him has arisen, but she realises that his renewed proposal of marriage is motivated not by love, but by a cold sense of duty. Therefore she in turn makes her sacrifice, and finds her future in the ideals of a Nihilist, by whose devotion to the poor wretches amongst whom his lot is cast she has been deeply impressed. And so the play ends, as it began, with the kiss of peace, and the strains of the Easter hymn.

Mr. Tree's version has, as I said, many faults, but I do not wish to dwell unduly upon them, or to deny that there was, none the less, much in the performance to stimulate and to move. It is, of course, wholly devoid of literary style, a fact which, I am afraid, will hardly militate against its acceptance by an English audience, which only cares for style, if at all, in comedy. And like most of the plays at His Majesty's, it is a great deal too bustling. Some years ago, Mr. Tree discovered in himself a unique faculty for drilling a crowd, and since then crowds he has never spared us. So in "Resurrection" we have for Act I. a crowd of moujiks and retainers parading before Nehludof's window and entering his bedroom to drink vodka and give him the Easter greeting. For Act II. we have, firstly a crowd of jurymen, portrayed with much grim humour, to which Mr. Lionel Brough largely contributes, and secondly a crowd, of the most deadly sort, in a Moscow drawing-room; for Act III. a hooting and yelling crowd of male and female prisoners; for Act IV. the same crowd tramping and bivouacking in the weird Siberian night. They are (except the drawing-room one, which ebbs and flows as the principal actors do or do not require it, in the well-understood fashion) extremely life-like, and must represent a triumph of organisation. But they delay the action; they distract and vex the attention of the audience; and they are inconsistent with the fact that tragic emotions, by the very law of their being, pass essentially in detachment and solitude. The dissipation of interest which they inevitably entail is, I think, responsible for a lack of concentration in the last act, making it come as something of an anticlimax and obscuring the ultimate issue—the issue of Nihilism—which, in fidelity to Tolstoi's intention, should have received clearer and more deliberate expression.

Art.

Water-Colours, a Connoisseur and Adam.

A CHANCE remark set me thinking about English water-colours. It was made by an elderly man who had been associated with the arts for half a century. "I've had a most delightful time at Messrs. Agnew's exhibition of water-colours," he said. "Better than ever! They have some lovely Turners there, and among them is that magnificent 'Chryses on the Seashore.'" The man's face glowed with pleasure, and I realised that he was one of that faithful band who, through all mutations, remain loyal to the "National Art" of English water-colour. They are not uninterested in other pictures, but mention the names of Cox, de Wint, Copley Fielding, Varley, Barret, or Sandby, and their eyes glisten with the mournful ecstasy of an exiled Englishman who, on arid plains, suddenly has a vision of a Devonshire lane in springtime, or a Scot who, in the heart of Africa, remembers the Hebrides. The old water-colourists do not appeal to the younger generation of collectors, and in a few years' time the faithful band will be but a remnant; but many are still with us, and it is pleasant to see them going round the walls, for the thirty-seventh year in succession, of Messrs. Agnew's "collection of selected high-class water-colour drawings." What, by-the-by, is a low-class water-colour drawing?

The modern connoisseur, wealthy and cosmopolitan, has not much affinity with the faithful band. "Where are you going?" said one of these happy-starred individuals to me the other afternoon. "To look at British water-colours," I answered. He pursed his lips as if in scorn, then said, "Come and see my collection!" The water-colours could wait. It would be foolish to miss the opportunity of seeing my acquaintance's collection of pictures, furniture, china and curios. So I accompanied him to his house. In silence we ascended the thickly-carpeted stairs and entered the first of a series of noble rooms. "Turn on the lights," he said to the servant who had followed us, and instantly the walls of the larger room sparkled with portraits of women of the eighteenth century. The electric lamps, placed close to the portraits, shone on them; shades protected our eyes from the dazzle; the rest of the room was dim, but in that flood of light those gracious masterpieces of the eighteenth century glowed down upon us with startling vividness. My host did not speak. He gazed affectionately at them, then looked at me, and I guessed the thought in his mind. It was: "What are your pretty water-colours of ruins, hedge-sparrows' nests, and plums, compared with these?" Fortunately, I was not called upon to make a reply, for at that moment he was called away, and I was left alone with the treasures. It was a relief. Something above an ordinary mind is needed to please a collector in the presence of his spoils. He dislikes gushing approval, and silence disturbs him; he is not averse from having his taste questioned, but it must be accompanied by signs of a wider knowledge, and a stronger will. And in such a collection as this, which contained examples of all that is rare in the arts and art industries, the attitude of the visitor is curious rather than critical. What can one say about a case of gold snuff-boxes? "I see you collect snuff-boxes, too," sounds tame, but it does not necessarily show a lack of appreciation. Few amateurs have anything to say before a Romney portrait except "Beautiful! Very beautiful." A bookman might be tempted to quote Edward FitzGerald, but to reel off seventy odd words about Romney, by a recluse of sentiment, to an owner of Romneys may not be expedient. This is what FitzGerald said: "How touching is the close of Romney's life! He married at twenty-one, and because Sir Joshua and others had said that marriage spoilt an artist, almost immediately left his wife in the north, and saw her but twice till the end of his life, when old, nearly mad, and quite desolate, he went back to her, and she received him, and nursed him till he died. This quiet act of hers is worth all Romney's pictures." That last sentence is a hard saying to repeat to an owner of Romneys.

The world had been ransacked for the spoils that stood in crowded magnificence in the room where I sat. A French king had written at that bureau; a princess had used that console-table; that marble group had been ravished from an Italian palace; no power of will or money could duplicate that cabinet of china; time had but given a more illusive beauty to the floral garlands that entwined themselves on the back of the couch on which I reclined. To that escritoire, inlaid with so many shining woods, a picked workman had given seven years of his life. The eye wandered over these things, resting nowhere, dazzled by the pomp and glory of the art world. I touched the shining woods of a cabinet. The surface was even—perfect workmanship. I removed the heavy key from the lock. It was made of gold. Holding that golden key in my hand I realised that the pendulum of my appreciation of the magnificent had swung to the highest point. The other extremity would be an agreeable change, so I slipped from that room, intending to return, and made my way to the British water-colours—ruins, hedge-sparrows' nests, and plums.

British water-colours are not the thunder and lightning of art, and these 268 drawings at Messrs. Agnew's which deal mainly with gentle subjects must be approached in a calm and unexpectant mood. They are the work of the quiet men of art, who would rather paint a landscape with cottages than a storm at sea, a hayfield than a battle. Even when they do choose a moving subject the drawing is keyed to their reposeful natures. Cox's "Welsh Funeral" is not sad, Copley Fielding's "Storm Clearing off: Entrance to Glencoe," is not dramatic: these drawings arouse no deeper feeling than a mild appreciation. The great eighteenth century portraits challenge and stimulate, flashing the personalities of men and women before our eyes, disturbing us as human nature—elusive, enigmatic, unending—must always disturb; but the eighteenth century water-colourists had nothing to do with such Titan's work. For them the simple face of things—evening glow, a church porch, or an Italian lake. Again through their eyes we catch glimpses of quiet corners of the world we have travelled, chosen because of some effect of atmosphere or colour that caught the wandering artist's eye. They repeat themselves, of course, but who is not glad to see again the Campagna or a Surrey common.

Wanderers were these old water-colourists, but not great travellers. A motor car would go as far in an afternoon as David Cox or de Wint in a summer. As for Turner, well, as usual, he dominates this collection, towering above his brethren. Water-colour was the expression of their whole talent; water-colour was the expression of but one of the compartments of his genius. Here you see him as the wanderer over England, making some of the drawings that were to be engraved in the "England and Wales" and the "Southern Coast" series. Also, you may see him pausing before Ehrenbreitstein, the fortress looking like a ghost on the top of its rock, or on the wet Lancaster sands, or studying the effect of moonlight mingling with firelight in a Surrey lime-kiln, knowing just what water-colour could do, leaving such subjects as "Jack Cade's Rebellion" to Sir John Gilbert.

Darkness had fallen when I returned to the connoisseur's house. The rooms were brilliantly lighted, making the spoils look more magnificent than ever. There seemed no place for modest water-colours amidst such grandeur. My eyes wandered round from one spoil to another, up past the portraits till they rested on the Robert Adam ceiling. The unobtrusive lines of the design of that ceiling, with its simple symbols, its flowers and fantasies, harmonised with the memory of those quiet eighteenth century water-colours, and I wondered what my host would say to a few water-colours on the walls of an Adam room, with some pieces of Adam furniture against the white walls. But I did not suggest it to him.

Science.

The Supreme Question.

It would be idle to comment at length upon the intellectual state of our time. Suffice it to observe that, on the afternoon of the day on which was published Mr. Myers' book on personal immortality, I saw on a bookstall a sixpenny edition of Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe." Within a few hours I had read that telepathy is an "acknowledged fact." Mr. Myers' book has been hailed as the greatest bequest of last century to ours, but from my recollection of Haeckel's work, now published at one eighty-fourth part of the price of Myers', I well knew how cogent were its claims to that distinction. It is to me no less than terrible that this book, so fascinating, so lucid, so momentous, should be broadcast to-day, presenting to the untrained mind the results of the work of the nineteenth century, and building upon that immovable and magnificent basis a system which is a lie.

After reading through ten chapters of familiar matter—chapters valuable, however, in that they present an epitome of all science—the reader of this sad masterpiece will make two observations of some moment. The first is that the author is not above an adroit juggling with terms, notably in his now familiar use of the word "soul"; and you will ask yourself, what is the relation of this method to his intention, the elucidation of truth? The second observation is this, that the apostle of "truth, beauty and goodness" finds it consistent with his professions to describe the sublime belief in an immortal soul as a "trivial conception," and to allude to the myriad pictures of the Madonna and Child in terms of a deliberate indecency which are to his lasting shame, and which, were such a thing conceivable, would cast an indelible stain upon Truth herself.

These blemishes apart, however, Haeckel's work is so far a direct exposition of the main facts of existence as modern science knows them. But in his next chapter ("The Immortality of the Soul") he proves, to his own satisfaction, and at great length, that the soul must needs be "etheric," or indeed gaseous; so that one might form "soul-snow," as Dewar liquefies hydrogen, and that this "reductio ad absurdum" demonstrates the soul—and its immortality—to be a myth. This theme is illustrated by allusions to the pleasure of the eternal company of a mother-in-law and to the history of Henry VIII., which are the cheap and obvious garbage of the slums of intellect, and which culminate in this (the italics are mine): "modern realism can have nothing whatever to do with these incomprehensible notions; they satisfy neither the mind's feeling of causality nor the yearning of our emotions." And "the belief in the immortality of the human soul . . . is in hopeless contradiction with the most solid empirical truths of modern science." As if that mattered. Modern science has "proved" what we all know, that a living dog is better than a dead lion, or that you may incinerate a corpse, and has, in Haeckel's view, proved the non-existence of that which it has not begun to attempt to understand. Agnosticism is intelligible,—"there lives more faith in honest doubt," but atheism is not merely the antithesis of the scientific attitude, but a deliberate impertinence. Confession of ignorance is the first essential of the enquirer, and the denial of it which such assertions exemplify not only incriminates all thought, but is, if you think of it, the only possible way in which the world's time can be wasted.

But it is in the next chapter ("The Law of Substance") that is found the base of the monistic creed. Haeckel has applied this term—the law of substance—to those two supreme generalizations, the laws of the conservation of matter and of energy, which underlie all scientific conceptions. Before either of these was proved, Spinoza had embodied them in the "stately pantheistic system" which Goethe and Haeckel take to be "the loftiest, profoundest, and truest thought of all ages." "To this profound thought of Spinoza," he says, "our purified monism returns after a lapse of two hundred years." That matter and energy will be for eternity, is the scientific belief. From this Haeckel goes on most admirably to show—and he has tens of thousands of new readers at this hour—that there is a supreme unity in things, that matter and energy are indivisible, that all forms of matter are derived from one—the "prothyl"—and that all forms of energy are transmutable. All this is, of course, platitude,—splendid and vital platitude.

And here we are confronted with the supreme question. If monism is to stand; if, as Haeckel says, we "have the courage to accept a rounded philosophical system"; if we are to claim, as Haeckel does, to have found the solution of the world-riddle, at this point we must forsake Logic and say that, since matter and energy are to be for eternity, it follows that they have been from eternity. It does not follow. "Creation from nothing is a miracle," says Haeckel; "therefore it is false." For the "myth of creation" he substitutes evolution, as explaining everything. It has been proved to explain the course of everything, of the starry heavens and the mind of man. But it does not approach the question—Whence? This book, which professes to tell us all there is to know, from the "clash of worlds" to the theories of sociology, deliberately denies the first question of all. It does not follow that because matter and energy are indestructible—for this is the whole theory—they are therefore from eternity. The terminal atom on my pen defies Haeckel and his worthless logic. Whence, it says? He has no answer worth the name. If his system is to be "rounded," there must be no dualism, no antithesis. Therefore it is necessary to have resort to barefaced dishonesty. Hence the following: "All these and similar forms of belief in creation are incompatible with the law of the persistence of matter and force; that law knows nothing of a beginning." Exactly; it knows nothing of a beginning. Nor does it assert anything of a beginning. But this latter-day philosophy must settle that point; upon which its existence depends. Therefore the preposterous deduction is made that there never was a beginning: that Matter, being indestructible, is therefore from eternity. Says Schopenhauer: "the world exists in virtue of its own inherent forces . . . a polite way of giving the Lord God his congé." Observe that this answer to the supreme question directly depends upon a naked piece of false reasoning. We cannot destroy matter: therefore it can never have been made. This is the logic of those who would show that God must be, if he is at all, a gaseous vertebrate.

As Haeckel himself shows, and endeavours without a trace of success to explain away, Kant, Virchow, Du Bois-Reymond, Newton, Baer, and many others, have passed through his stage; obsessed in their time as he even yet is, by the power of intellectual pride. Here this splendid thinker and observer stands, "drawing the line under his life work," with a book which promises to be the creed of many in our century. It is founded upon a gross error in logic. The "mighty atom" and many other absurdities have come and gone. We have, as the first fact, the "law of substance." One atom, or one ion, if you please, cannot make another, nor can the others destroy it. To me, from this admitted fact, the only deduction is a first cause. It is not only the fool, but the intellectual knave who "hath said in his heart, there is no God."

Correspondence.

"As the English Knew Him."

SIR,—Many thanks for your gracious review of my compilation of "Lowell's Early Prose Writings." At a time when certain friends of Lowell are abusing me for having done a most indecent thing, such an acknowledgment of propriety from a high English source is, indeed, welcome. One point in the review leads me to express a wish. The point is where your reviewer says: "As for Mr. Littlefield's appreciation of 'Lowell in 1842,' it is a sound and just piece of work in the main, and the biographical detail in which it abounds will be more welcome in that Mr. Scudder's 'official' Life of Lowell has not left any deep impression on the great heart of the British-American public."

This last is perfectly true, and it reminds me of English criticism of both Scudder's book and Dr. Hale's "James Russell Lowell and His Friends," which invariably ended with—"but this is not the Lowell whom we knew."

And hence my wish—that some Englishman, before it is too late, should write of Lowell as the English knew him. I am sure that his ripest, fullest, most human years were spent with you—in his den at the Legation, where he chatted and talked of books with bookmen, and at St. James's, and at the laying of corner-stones of English libraries, at the inauguration of English schools, &c.—and yet we have no record of those years so rapidly dimming. But we should like to have them. Why will not one of Lowell's English friends—say Theodore Watts-Dunton—give them to us? A very important hiatus, I think, would thereby be filled.—Yours, &c.,

WALTER LITTLEFIELD.

The Light that Failed.

SIR,—I do not think your dramatic critic, Mr. E. K. Chambers, can be aware that the "happy ending" to "The Light that Failed" is that of the version originally given to the public over ten years ago, in (I believe) "Lippincott's" Christmas number. This seems to me to make the case against Mr. Kipling very different from what it would be, had he, at this stage of his career, deliberately altered his story; or sanctioned its alteration to suit the requirements of the theatre.

With regard to the dislike of the public for tragedy, which Mr. Chambers appears to doubt, has not the fate of Mr. Pinero's "Iris," of Mrs. Clifford's "Likeness of the Night," of Mr. H. V. Esmond's "Grierson's Way" proved very clearly that tragedy in modern garb, however good, makes very little appeal to the average playgoer? Moreover, the management at the Lyric have but lately put the readiness of Londoners "to subdue their souls to chastening influences" to the test. With what result? I was present at three performances of "Othello"; at two of them at least, with the exception of the pit and gallery, the house was half empty. Under these circumstances, it is scarcely strange that Mr. Forbes-Robertson should have decided against a tragic conclusion to his new venture.

I fear it is only too true that our drama can hope for no adequate support from a public which seems literally to revel in sham pathos and false sentiment.—Yours, &c.,
AGATHA M. BARRHAM.

[The "happy ending" to "The Light that Failed" printed in "Lippincott's" Magazine in January 1891 was a perversion of the story as "originally conceived" and published in book form later in 1891.]

Wanted: A Japanese National Song.

SIR,—May I suggest to your readers, some of whom have been writing this week poems in praise of Spring, that they should turn their attention to a real want—a National Song for Japan. The need for it is shown by the following extract from a Japanese newspaper, which was sent to the "Spectator" by a resident of Tokio:—

There should be a national song in every country but we Japanese have none. "Kimi-gayo" is by no means a national song. This is a song praising the virtues of the Emperor. A national song is the representation of the feeling of the populace. As a country is in reality the possession of commons, and not of nobles, the ideal of a country exists among commons and not among nobles. A song comforting the commons, ennobling their ambitions, and giving them the thoughts of self-respect and self-confidence, is that which our nation most urgently needs. The song though common must not be vulgar. As the commons are the natural nobles of a country, their song must be noble as far as their thoughts are noble. . . . As the song is common, it must be a song of labor. A song is not for pleasure, but for encouraging laborers. Some one said: "I take this pen for the country; I lift up this axe for men; I strike this hammer for humanity; and I work all for God." This is justly said to be suited for the spirit of a national song. A song that ennoble labour, which nobles, the lazy people, despise, is a true national song. It is neither genteel nor vulgar, but noble and common. Who can make our daily work holy? Who can compose the first national song in our country? Does the Heaven not send such a poet among us?

—Yours, &c.,

The Recreations of Distinguished People.

SIR,—I am always wildly interested in your correspondence columns; this week they inspire and encourage me. Your courteous admission of Mr. Algernon Ashton's very proper protest against somebody's failure to include a description of his pastimes in an article on "The Recreations of Distinguished People" nerves my pen arm to the task and duty of calling attention through your columns to the equal injustice of my own case. The other evening (the Sunday before last, I believe it was), Miss Marie Corelli had a "Little Talk about Literature" with the Heaton Mersey Philosophical Society. The gifted lady drew brilliant, if obscure parallels between Mr. Pierpoint Morgan and the Etruscans, and between her own masterpieces of literature, and those of Byron, Shelley, Keats, Sir Walter, and the less known but admirable William Shakespeare; but, as Mr. Ashton says of his own striking case, "whether by a strange oversight, or for some other reason," she made no mention whatever of my various works. Again, a person named John Smith has written an article in the Noodle's Journal on "The Occupations of the Illustrious." This includes particulars of the daily life of several European Sovereigns, and even of a Prime Minister or two, but nothing as to the features of my own daily routine, and this, as Mr. Ashton rightly says of his own remarkable case: "is all the more surprising as some of these . . . are perhaps the most singular of any. Here they are, copied word for word from the 1903 edition"—of "Who's Which": "Occupation: Mr. Dawson writes chiefly for posterity and fame. He rises at 2 a.m., takes a warm bath in whiskey and soda and dresses entirely in pale pink satin, with a moistened chest-protector affixed to his temples. He then sits down to his desk and writes without a break for ten or fifteen minutes, according to the weather. Then he visits the tombs of famous personages, and listens to the speeches in Hyde Park; after which he gives audience to creditors, and other hangers on to his fame. He then dines, generally upon boiled haunch of zebra with caper sauce, and retires for the day and night. Recreations: Chiropody, trumpet-playing (his own), and the study of medical journals, with special reference to Swelled Head and allied complaints."—Yours, &c.,

Fern Hill Park, Woking.

A. J. DAWSON.

"The Vision of MacConglinne."

SIR,—I am informed on good authority that credit for the admirable translation of "The Vision of MacConglinne" should be given to the original translator Hennessy, and that Prof. Kuno Meyer's work lay chiefly in a revision of Hennessy's text. I shall be glad if you will insert this, as a correction of my statement in the article "The Cuchullin Saga" in the ACADEMY of last week.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD GARNETT.

Mr. Davidson as Novelist.

SIR,—The author of the article on "Novelist Poets" should have made enquiries before he rashly wrote: "We do not look to Mr. Davidson . . . for novels." As everybody with a healthy taste for a moving romance ought to know, Mr. Davidson is, to adopt the title of one of his stories, "A Practical Novelist." I can also call to mind "Ninian Jamieson," "Baptist Lake," and that brilliant fantasy "The Wonderful Mission of Earl Lavender," not to speak of "The Pilgrimage of Strong-soul" and other shorter tales.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM G. HUTCHISON.

Father-in-Law or Step-father?

SIR,—A few weeks ago some of those who think Dickens infallible were sending letters to the "Saturday Review" defending his use of the term father-in-law in cases where Shakespeare, Addison, and a host of other literati employ step-father. Is one then to believe that those who sneer at the use of step-father will be disposed to maintain that if a man leave a legacy to his father-in-law, his mother's second husband has as good a claim to the money as his wife's father? Is that the law? and can these ruffled Dickensites say, "Thyself shall see the act"?—Yours, &c.,

W.

Wanted a Poem.

SIR,—Could you or any of your readers tell me where I can find an old historical poem, beginning—

The Romans in England long held sway
The Saxons after them led the way,
Till both of them had an overthrow
Each of them by a Norman bow.

It gives a short description of each King and Queen. For instance:—

Good Queen Bess was a glorious dame
And bonny King Jamie from Scotland came,
Charles the First was a martyr made
And Charlie his son was a comical blade.

I should be glad if I could find out the last verse and who wrote it or where it could be found.—Yours, &c.,
76, West Hill, Sydenham. FLORENCE E. FOSTER.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 178 (New Series).

Last week we offered a Prize of One Guinea for the best set of verses, not to exceed 16 lines, on Spring. Eighty replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss Ethel C. Mayne, Rockwater, Blackrock, Cork, for the following:—

I heard the thrush to-day—the same!
He sang the thing he used to sing,
His throat as gladly thrilling;
And near I drew—he's grown so tame,
"Trill-rill!" he kept on trilling.

I found the buds to-day—the same!
The earth was quick with green a-prick,
And shy brown sheathes were showing . . .
There was our tree without a name,
Snowy as if 'twere snowing!

I felt the Spring to day—the same!
For every year the green is here,
And every year the singing . . .
But sure! no Spring-time ever came,
Bringing what this is bringing!

Other replies follow:—

When fair days shine,
Forgotten winds of Spring will wake and blow,
Like sudden notes divine
From some far lute a thousand years ago.

This barren rod
Will break to leaf and bloom within my hand;
Above the fragrant sod,
By every brook will greening willows stand.

O tempest-worn,
Forget the driving storm that comes no more!
For thee, chill and forlorn,
Waiteth an azure sky, an emerald floor.
[E. H. T., Manchester.]

"Wake, wake! The sun is high:
Back from the windows of the sky
The cloudy curtains roll: by many a token,
Snowdrop and crocus fair,
I know drear winter's spell is broken.
Rise up, old Earth, from out thy drowsy lair
'Mid mouldered leaves, and sing
Thy matin song of Spring."

"Nay, nay, I trust thee not,
Though in thy little garden-plot
Thy foolish firstlings cower, I wait the tidings
Of swallow at my eaves,
And all his whispered, soft confidings.
The house is dark and cold: my bed of leaves
Is warm. I rise not yet,—
Lest trusting brings regret."
[H. C. P., Uffculme, Devon.]

Lily, laughing light and free:
How I loved those days of spring
When you first danced down to me
Like some heavenly thing!

In my garden by the sea
Lilies white were flowering,
None so pure, it seemed to me,
As this heavenly thing.

Death came sailing silently—
Now I hate the days of spring,
While the lilies mock at me
Of my heavenly thing.

[W. M., Davos Platz.]

A voice breathes through the world to-day
From rain-swept woods of waking leaves :
This veil-like cloud shall pass away,
This veil the unseen spindle weaves.

It changes yet, it does not live,
It cheats, but still it shadows good ;
For lo, the soul earth cannot give,
Hath come to her for motherhood.

[E. H., London.]

In vain all the winter I studied
The proofs which no learning can prove,
Until springtide returning has flooded
The fields with the Spirit of Love.
From the milky way of the daisies,
The thick star-blossoming thorn,
Like a ladder to heaven, lift your praises,
O light-winged larks of the morn.
As of old in the Orient burning
Rose a star in the track of the sun,
So, ere nightfall, the same star returning,
Will shine, when the cycle has run.
We are slaves to the world and its wages,
We are wise, and eat dust, like the snake ;
Then arise, O thou Star of the Ages,
Awake in the west—Awake !

[G. N., South Norwood.]

Springtide in Egypt, this to some is sweet,
For now the days flash by on fervid feet,
'Companied by strong winds and cloudless skies
And sunlight riotous. With languid eyes
In the broad garden men, at evening,
Watch the pale orange-flowers blossoming.
England, with yearning do I turn to thee
Across long miles of sad estranging sea ;
Recall the pleasures of an English spring ;
Hear from tall elm the rooks' harsh music ring ;
Watch rain-filled freshets purling through the woods ;
See broad fields verdant from receding floods ;
Hail warmer days that herald April's reign
O'er dusty furrows with their sprouting grain ;
Seek hazlewoods where the first primrose blows,
Or mossy banks where the wild violet grows.

[P. T. B., Tonbridge.]

A voice comes over the sea,
And a whisper stirs in the land ;
My heart leaps up in me,
For I know that Spring is at hand.
Oh, Spring comes in like a tide,
Lifting the spirit high,
Nearer the wonder, and wide
Rapture, and rest of the sky.
The pulse of desire awakes
In the tired dumb soul of the earth.
Out of her lethargy breaks
The thrill of the passion of birth.
Alas for the flowerless pause,
The ebb that follows the flow,
What breathing of Hope may cause
The blossom of Love to blow ?

[H. S. B., Stirling.]

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

"More Letters of Charles Darwin: a Record of His work in an Hitherto Unpublished Series," edited by Mr. Francis Darwin and Mr. A. C. Seward, will be published by Mr. Murray next week.

The Clarendon Press have in preparation an edition of Sir Thomas More's "Utopia," edited with introduction and notes by Mr. Churton Collins.

Messrs. Macmillan will issue shortly an abridgment of Prof. Bury's History of Greece, which has been carried out under the supervision of the author. The work is in length about a quarter of the Student's History, but the abridgment has been so done as to keep the narrative almost entirely in Prof. Bury's original phrasing.

Mr. J. H. Fowler, of Clifton College, who previously published an edition of Book the Fourth of Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" with explanatory and illustrative notes, has prepared for Messrs. Macmillan a similar edition of Book the Third, which comprises extracts from the English and Scotch poets of the eighteenth century, from Gray and Collins to Burns and Cowper.

Mr. John Lane will publish shortly a new work dealing with the correspondence of Mrs. Carlyle, to be entitled "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle," annotated by Thomas Carlyle and edited by his nephew, Alexander Carlyle, with an introduction by Sir James Crichton-Browne. We are informed that "it is the mission of these volumes to rehabilitate the character of Thomas Carlyle."

Volumes I. and II. of Mr. George Allen's new Library Edition of Ruskin's Works, edited by Mr. E. T. Cook, will contain, among other papers, the following early writings: The Poetry of Architecture; Essay on Literature (1836) and Letters to Mr. Dale (1841); Essay on Music and Painting (1838), partly unpublished; Letters to a College Friend (1840-43); Leoni; The King of the Golden River; various new matter. The Poems will appear separately as Volume II.

Messrs. T. and T. Clark announce an extra volume of Dr. Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible. This volume is not intended to supplement the Dictionary, which is complete in the four volumes already issued. It is an extra volume with full indexes. During the progress of the Dictionary through the press, it was seen that many of its articles touched somewhat closely upon subjects which lay outside the scope of a Dictionary of the Bible. It is sufficient to name Agrapah, Diaspora, Philo, Josephus, Talmud, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and the Religion of Greece and Asia Minor. Again it was felt that certain subjects or portions of subjects invited a fuller treatment than the space at command or the proportion to be observed could afford. This volume would therefore contain a fuller investigation of the English versions, The Sermon on the Mount, Textual Criticism of the New Testament, Wages, Ships, Religions of Assyria, and Babylonia, of Egypt, and of Israel; the Development of Doctrine in the Apocryphal Age. There are other subjects, related to one another, which had been treated at quite sufficient length under their own individual titles, but which lose something from being scattered throughout the volumes. A few general articles have been written in order to bring these subjects into relation to one another, e.g. articles on the Races of the Old Testament, on Roads and Travel, New Testament Times, Hours, Papyri, the Style of Scripture, Symbols, &c. All the articles have been written by scholars who have made a special study of the subjects assigned to them.

NOTICE.—A SECOND IMPRESSION of A CASTLE IN SPAIN, By BERNARD E. J. CAPES, AUTHOR OF "THE LAKE OF WINE," &c., IS NOW READY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

PUNCH.—"A romance of thrilling interest. . . . The writer's style is reminiscent of Thackeray in Esmond, of Anthony Hope, 'Q,' and in certain parts of George Meredith. To get all these authors at their best in one novel is no small achievement; yet it is a salad of which the peculiarly attractive flavour is the author's own secret. Taken for all in all it is one of the very best romances the Baron has come across for some considerable time."
THE TIMES.—"It is some time since we have read a novel so full of good matter as 'A Castle in Spain.' . . . The narrative is wonderfully brisk and vivid, and the style distinguished."

MONT PELÉE,

AND

THE TRAGEDY OF MARTINIQUE.

A Study of the great Catastrophes of 1902, with Observations and Experiences in the Field.

By ANGELO HEILPRIN,

President of the Geographical Society of Philadelphia.

With 36 Full-page Illustrations and 29 others in the Text.

The Author's early visit to Martinique permitted him to study the scene of the major disaster very soon after its happening, and his experiences during the great eruption of August 30, of which he was a direct observer, were such as to make the narrative one of thrilling interest.

The Daily Chronicle speaks of it as "A most vivid account of the utter annihilation wrought."

The Manchester Guardian says:—"Professor Heilprin writes with extraordinary vigour, and some of his descriptions are not easily to be forgotten."

THE DAILY CHRONICLE, in a recent leading article, says: "There is a general agreement amongst those who place more importance on the spirit of religion than on the letter of religious dogma that a time is approaching, if it has not come, when religious truths require to be restated in the light of a deeper and wider knowledge of the conditions of human life and of the relation of man to nature."

This restatement has been attempted in the remarkable

The Literary Week.

In certain forms of book production America seems at present to be ahead of us. We have recently received from a Chicago publishing firm three slim volumes, excellently printed and turned out: Leigh Hunt's "Paolo and Francesca," "Twelve Songs" by Maeterlinck, and William Morris's "The Art of the People." The volumes are really good examples of book-making, the Leigh Hunt and Morris in particular showing a beautifully arranged page. Such work seems in America to be almost a commonplace of production. The feature of the week's publishing has been the large number of novels that have been issued. Two dozen works of fiction have reached this office. Among other books published during the week we note the following:—

MORE LETTERS OF CHARLES DARWIN. Edited by Francis Darwin and A. C. Seward.

An invaluable supplement to Darwin's "Life and Letters." Some of the matter contained in the two volumes is highly technical, but much throws a pleasant light upon the writer's memories of childhood, his wide sympathy, and his appreciation of the work of others. Amongst the possessors of letters included here are Sir Joseph Hooker, Mr. A. R. Wallace, and Mr. John Morley, whilst certain letters of these to Darwin also find a place. The volumes contain many portraits.

JOURNALS OF FIELD-MARSHAL COUNT VON BLUMENTHAL FROM 1866 TO 1870-1.

Edited by Count Albrecht von Blumenthal and translated by Major A. D. Gillespie-Addison. The journals were written to serve as notes for further memories, as was also an autobiography commenced by Count von Blumenthal: "they are thus only fragments, and do not claim to be in any way complete works." In his introduction Major Gillespie-Addison sums up briefly the events which led up to the invasion of Bohemia in 1866. In a letter, dated July, 1877, addressed to the Field-Marshal by the Crown Prince, accompanying the gift of a bust, we read: "May this bust recall the memorable days during which I was permitted to have my Mentor at my side—a time when not only the Prussian monarchy was at stake, but also the existence of the German Empire." Three maps and two portraits are included in the volume.

MICHAEL ANGELO BUONARROTI. By Charles Holroyd.

A fully illustrated volume by the keeper of the National Gallery of British Art, "with translations of the Life of the Master by his Scholar, Ascanio Condivi, and three Dialogues from the Portuguese by Francisco D'Ollanda." The first part of the volume consists of Mr. Holroyd's rendering of Condivi's Life, the most valuable of the lives of Michael Angelo. This is the first complete translation which has appeared in English. "Extracts," writes Mr. Holroyd, "have been given; . . . but the faithful and reverent character of the whole work can only be given in a complete translation, its transparent honesty, and loving devotion." The second part of the volume deals with the Master's Works. The three dialogues on Painting by the miniature painter D'Ollanda are included in an appendix.

HANDBOOK TO THE BRITISH MUSEUM. By E. T. Cook.

In this compact and packed volume Mr. Cook applies to the Greek and Roman galleries of the British Museum the method that he adopted with the National Gallery. The aim of the book is to say something about everything, how the objects are links with the past, how they came into the possession of the Museum, and what the poets, historians and essayists have said about them. On one page we find quotations from Pater and Sir Lewis Morris. The Elgin Room has a chapter to itself with introductory extracts from Emerson and Haydon.

It is not only novels that have large sales in sixpenny reprints. We learn that another 20,000 edition of Prof. Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe" is being printed, and that Mr. Herbert Spencer's "Education" has reached an equal circulation in its cheap form. The next reprint in the same series is to be Grant Allen's "Evolution of the Idea of God."

On Tuesday night Mr. Pinero delivered in Edinburgh, to the members of the Philosophical Institution, a lecture on "Robert Louis Stevenson: the Dramatist." The plays discussed by Mr. Pinero were "Deacon Brodie," "Admiral Guinea," and "Beau Austin," and the question which the lecturer set himself to answer was this: "Why should Stevenson, the dramatist, take such a back seat . . . in comparison with Stevenson, the novelist, the essayist, the poet?" Part of the answer Mr. Pinero states thus:—

We shall find, I think, that Stevenson, with all his genius, failed to realize that the art of drama is not stationary, but progressive. By this I do not mean that it is always improving; what I do mean is that its conditions are always changing, and that every dramatist whose ambition it is to produce live plays is absolutely bound to study carefully, and I may even add respectfully—at any rate not contemptuously—the conditions that hold good for his own age and generation. This Stevenson did not—would not—do. We shall find, I think, that in all his plays he was deliberately imitating outworn models, and doing it, too, in a sportive, half-disdainful spirit, as who should say "The stage is a realm of absurdities—come, let us be cleverly absurd!"

The point is a good one, though with whatever intention Stevenson set out in the plays he became at times absolutely and convincingly serious. For Stevenson's essential dramatic talent Mr. Pinero has, naturally, the greatest respect. As example of that talent he quoted the extraordinary story which Stevenson sketched for us in the "Chapter on Dreams." Concerning "Beau Austin" and technique Mr. Pinero said:—

I am not claiming any absolute and inherent superiority for our modern realistic technique, though I do not think it quite so inferior as some critics would have us believe. But what I do say is that the dramatist is bound to select his particular form of technique, master, and stick to it. He must not jumble up two styles and jump from one to the other. This is what the authors of "Beau Austin" have not realized. Their technique is neither ancient nor modern; their language is neither poetry nor prose—the prose, that is to say, of conceivable human life. The period has nothing to do with it. People spoke, no doubt, a little more formally in 1820 than they do to-day; but neither then nor at any time was the business of life, even in its most passionate moments, conducted in pure oratory.

True enough, no doubt, but Mr. Pinero seems momentarily to have forgotten those conventions of the stage which would seem to make realistic dialogue impossible. If Mr. Pinero ever takes the trouble to read through his own dramas he must be aware that his characters talk as no people ever did talk. And after all, when Mr. Pinero has criticised Stevenson as a dramatist and made out a reasonably strong case, there remains the fact that although we enjoy Mr. Pinero's plays, we have enjoyed Stevenson's more when we have had the chance of seeing them. Two of the Stevenson-Henley plays, at any rate, are literature.

Mr. MURRAY's instances of verb manufacture in the "Spectator" have drawn three letters on the subject. One of the "Spectator's" correspondents writes:—

In six out of the nine instances given by Mr. Murray the novelists or poets he condemns are supported by authority. The "Century Dictionary" gives "hoarse," "husk," "shrill," "tiptoe," "glimpse," "parrot," as verbs, with references to Shakespeare, Spenser, Richardson, &c. Mr. Murray must get used to bad calligraphy. I am convinced that his Guppy must have written, not "yells," but "wells of joy artesianed up his throat"; and if Guppy hath not "enriched our tongue," this effort is distinctly "good."

Then follows a communication from a lady concerning children's coinages:—

Only yesterday when my little girls were playing with a toy hospital, one of them said to the other: "This child seems to be suffering from 'cute neuralgia in the eyelashes; bettn't we give it a dose of cough lozenges?" Again, in speaking of two china dogs, she said: "'Castor' and 'Pollux' look languid this morning; bettn't they have a bath?" Her sister observed to me just now: "What a noise you did make tinacking with that hammer!" "Had not we better," or "they had better," sounds very awkward and cumbersome compared to the brief and convenient "bettn't."

Children, however, are privileged; it is, perhaps, fortunate that they do not write for publication.

A LITTLE book which has had a rather remarkable success is "Wee MacGreegor." It has now reached its thirty-third thousand. Scotland has a pleasing habit of reading what its own children produce. We hear that in Glasgow, where "Wee MacGreegor" was published, people have been buying it by thousands. Would a book published in Birmingham, say, have anything like the same chance? We think not. It must be the dialect that does it. "Och," says one of the characters, "whit's about a rid toorie." We shall find out some day what that means.

THE "Literary Year Book" for 1903 leads off with a portrait of M. Maurice Maeterlinck; then follows a survey of the "Year's Work, 1902," by Mr. Herbert Morrah. Mr. Morrah is optimistic on the whole; he thinks that literature is flourishing, and that in the dramatic world there are "signs of abundant life." The "Year Book" continues to increase in bulk; authors join the literary ranks with airy cheerfulness, and if they repent they repent in secret. This year the directory of authors runs to one hundred and sixty pages, and that of publishers, including a useful foreign section, to forty pages. On the civil list there are no fewer than one hundred and seven more or less literary pensioners, the annual grants ranging between £25 and £250.

WILL the day of the artistic poster ever really arrive in England? Occasionally the hoardings are made less hideous by posters good in idea and capable in execution, but these intruders are put out of countenance by the conventional horrors which crowd them round. Yet there are plenty of men who have shown themselves capable of producing beautiful poster designs, and a few of these have been reproduced by Messrs. Spottiswoode in a collection of "Ideas in Colour." Amongst the most attractive of these are the drawings by Mr. Tom Browne, Mr. Hassell, and Mr. Charles Robinson. There seems no reason in the world why such work should not replace the glaring abominations which make a daylight bus journey something of a penance. But the old order in the poster seems too set to change.

A RATHER remarkable volume has just reached us, entitled "The Rebellion of 1815, generally known as Slachters Nek." The volume runs to close on a thousand pages and comprises a complete collection of all the papers connected with the trial of the accused. The book has been prepared under Government instruction by Mr. H. C. V. Leibbrandt, Keeper of the Archives, and forms a valuable record of certain passages in the history of the Cape of Good Hope. The general reader is hardly likely to attack such a portentous-looking volume, but for the novelist there is a mine of good material. We have page after page of verbatim question and answer, and a number of letters packed with interesting detail.

THE endless romance of the "Review of Reviews" is going endlessly on. The latest chapter shows us Francis Gordon on the point of giving up all his wealth to the poor, and Rosamund flies from the prospective pauper, "her garments shaking out strange fragrances" as she goes. There certainly seems no reason why this kind of thing should not go on, as we are informed it will, "month by month without end."

We expressed our view of Nietzsche last week. This is what Mr. W. L. Alden gives to the readers of the "New York Times Saturday Review" as his opinion:—

Nobody denies the ability of Nietzsche, but of what possible use are the writings of a blasphemous lunatic? Nietzsche was precisely that and nothing else. His writings never by any possibility helped any man. They are bad through and through, and the less healthy people have to do with them the better.

We should imagine that there is a good deal of Nietzsche's work which Mr. Alden has never read.

IN "Memories of Half a Century," by Mr. R. C. Lehmann, now appearing in "Chambers's Journal," there are some characteristic stories of the writer's grandfather, Robert Chambers. The one personal interview with him which Mr. Lehmann remembers he records as follows:—

It must have taken place in 1864, when as a boy of eight, I had just begun learning Latin with a tutor. This great intelligence had been communicated to my grandfather, and I can remember my feelings of mingled pride and apprehension when the towering and dignified figure took me by the hand and began to question me: "So, my little man, you're into Latin?" "Yes, grandpa." "That's good; that's good. Now then, can you go through mensa, a table?" "Please, grandpa, we call it musa, a muse, in our book. I can do that for you." And I did, without in the least understanding why my grandfather gave a Homeric shout of laughter.

At the end of the article, Mr. Lehmann quotes some verses addressed by Wilkie Collins to the writer's mother, of which Mr. Lehmann says, "It is plain from these playful and polished lines that he might, had he cared for the task, have set up as a frivolous rival to Mr. Locker or Mr. Austin Dobson in the writing of vers de société." We have not space to quote the lines, but we may say that in our view they fall very far behind the work of the two writers named.

An article by Mr. W. J. Long in the "Field Naturalist's Quarterly," entitled "How the Animals Die," is quite above the average of such work; it has sympathy, knowledge, and a sense of style. We quote from the concluding sentences:—

The vast majority of animals go away quietly when their time comes; and their death is not recorded because man has eyes only for exceptions. He desires a miracle, but overlooks the sunset. Something calls the creature away from his daily round; age or natural disease touches him gently in a way that he has not felt before. He steals away, obeying the old warning instinct of his kind, and picks out a spot where they shall not find him till he is well again. The brook sings on its way to the sea; the waters lap and tinkle on the pebbles as the breeze rocks them; the wind is crooning in the pines—the old, sweet lullaby that he heard when his ears first opened to the harmony of the world. The shadows lengthen; the twilight deepens; his eyes grow drowsy; he falls asleep. And his last conscious thought, since he knows no death, is that he will waken in the morning when the light calls him.

In the current number of "Longman's Magazine" we find some simple and beautiful verses by Mrs. Shorter, entitled "The Child." The child comes to turn hopelessness into gladness:—

"Will you not stay and teach us to be glad?"
The woman cried; "We then indeed were blessed."
"I am but little to go forth alone,"
The babe replied, and nestled to her breast.

And so he stayed for many years to play
Beside her hearth, and at each purple eve,
When came the man soft singing from his work,
All full of dreams he could but half believe.

The woman met him on their threshold; spoke
In solemn wonder, with a "Hush!" and "Hark!"
"To-day he drove out Sorrow from the door:
With his small hands he shut her in the dark."

Or, "Go you soft: he slumbers like a bird
That nests, half-singing in his pleasant sleep:
To-day from our hearth-side he thrust out Grief—
This wonder-child did laugh to see her weep."

Then the child becomes a man, goes out into the world, and returns with something of the world's knowledge, so that the mother who watches him sleeping sees that he is "dreaming of another face." The charm of the poem consists in its unaffected simplicity.

WE have already heard a good deal about Sir Henry Irving's forthcoming production of "Dante" at Drury Lane; we have even been told where and how the scenery is being painted, and the probable cost of the scenery. These points do not interest us. But we shall be interested to see whether Boccaccio appears in Dante's Hell, as a correspondent of the "Westminster Gazette" says he is to appear. Referring to this, another correspondent of the same journal writes:—

It is indeed, if true, an astounding anachronism for Dante to be made to put into Hell Boccaccio, of whom Dante had never heard, and who was the lecturer on Dante fifty-two years after Dante's death.

An astonishing anachronism indeed; but to such anachronisms we are gradually becoming accustomed. Historical accuracy in drama will soon be considered a sign of the amateur. Nowadays we seem to have no time for the essentials of such work.

THE latest Literary Examination Paper set by "Good Words" has "David Copperfield" for subject. Here is the first question:—

1. Explain with reference to the context—
 - i. "That's a settler for our military friend."
 - ii. "My foot will be upon my native heath."
 - iii. "Touch the Commons and down comes the country."
 - iv. "You are playing Booty with my clerk."
 - v. "What I wish is that parties was brought up stronger minded."

There follow six more questions, of which the last is: "Transcribe from the columns of the Middlebay 'Times' a valedictory letter (imaginary) to Lord Tennyson from the pen of Wilkins Micawber, Esquire, Junior." Competitions of this kind are very popular, we believe; but does the book selected for the examination paper ever give the competitors any further pleasure?

THERE is shortly to be published in Chicago a new quarterly journal to be called "Modern Philology." The first volume, we learn, is to contain six hundred pages, though whether "volume" means "number" we do not know. The advisory board consists of the following: Profs. Kittredge, Bright, Thomas von Jagemann, Warren, Matzke, Hempl, Gummere. "Their connection," we read, "with the work is not nominal, but real."

HERE is one of the dedications of the week: "To the Duchess of Sutherland and Rosemary I dedicate this story; which looks suddenly brighter since two such kind friends have accepted its dedication." The book is by Mr. E. H. Cooper, and is called "Wyemarle's Mother."

THE ideas of our competitors this week as to what constitutes a current literary topic are very varied. In addition to the replies printed on our competition page, we have received remarks on the following subjects: "The Black List," "Weddings and Woe," "The Dramatized Novel," "False Fiction," "Spring Competition," George Lewes' "Rose, Blanche and Violet," "The Decline of Fiction," "Celtic Literature," "School Magazines," "An Academy for Critics of Verse," "A Plea for Verse," "On Public Libraries," "The Sonnet in England," and "The Dislike of Tragedy in Drama." The amateur dramatic critics who have sent in replies have something sensible to say; they seem to know what they want, and with an astonishing unanimity they come to the conclusion that they seldom get it. The dramatized novel appears to be a source of constant annoyance, and "Resurrection" has received at the hands of our amateur judges as decided criticism as that devoted to it by Mr. Arthur Symons in the "Saturday Review."

Bibliographical.

IN writing a volume on Andrew Marvell for the "English Men of Letters" series, Mr. Augustine Birrell will have a comparatively easy task. Original research will not be expected from him, and of biographical data there is already plenty. There are the memoirs by Cooke, prefixed to the edition of the "Works" published in 1772, and by Captain E. Thompson, prefixed to the edition of the "Works" issued four years later. Of no special value are the "Life" by J. Dove, which accompanied specimens of the Poems in 1832, and the later "Life" by the Rev. E. Paxton Hood (1853). Still later, Marvell fell into the laborious hands of the Rev. A. B. Grosart, whose elaborate account of him and edition of his works occupied four volumes of the "Fuller Worthies Library" in 1872-5. Latest of all come the two volumes which Mr. G. A. Aitken contributed to "The Muses Library" in 1892—volumes containing the Poems, Satires, a Memoir, and a Bibliographical Note. On these and on the Grosart edition Mr. Birrell may well base his own biographical edifice.

Mr. George E. Woodberry, who is to do for the "English Men of Letters" series the volume on Emerson, is an American writer already fairly well known in this country. He is rather a versatile gentleman. He has written a book on Edgar Allan Poe for the "American Men of Letters" series (1885), and is one of the supervisors of the edition of Poe's Works which came out in 1895. He has also edited or "introduced" Bacon, Shelley (1892), and Aubrey de Vere (1894). His critical work includes "Studies in Letters and Life" (1890), "National Studies in American Letters" (1899), and "Makers of Literature" (1900). But Mr. Woodberry is "creator" as well as critic, having published at least three volumes of verse—"North Shore Watch and Other Poems" (1890), "The Players' Elegy on the Death of Edwin Booth" (1893), and "Wild Eden" (1899).

It is to be hoped that the forthcoming mammoth collection of Horace Walpole's letters will include a bibliography, for the manner in which the letters have gradually seen the light is full of varied interest. Keeping to the nineteenth century, we find these successive publications: "Letters to the Rev. W. Cole and others, 1745-82" (1818), "Letters to G. Montagu, 1736-70" (1819), "Private Correspondence, now first collected" (1820), "Letters to Sir Horace Mann," edited by Lord Dover (1833 and 1843-4), "Correspondence with G. Montagu, H. S. Conway, W. Cole, and Lady Hervey" (1837), "Letters," edited by J. Wright (1840), "Letters to Lord Ossory, 1769-97" (1848), "Correspondence with Rev. W. Mason," edited by J. Mitford (1851), "Letters," edited by P. Cunningham (1857-9 and 1891), and then, after a long interval, "Some Unpublished Letters," edited by Sir Spencer Walpole (1902). The two handiest "selections" from Walpole's letters are, of course, those edited by L. B. Seeley in 1884, and by C. D. Yonge in 1890.

The new edition of Sir G. W. Dasent's "Popular Tales from the Norse" will, of course, be welcome. The book came out originally in 1859, and an edition of it for children followed in 1861. Apparently it has not been issued in many forms. It is probably the book by which Sir George will best be remembered, although those who recall his thirty-three-year-old novel, "Annals of an Eventful Life," will always keep for it a little corner in their hearts. Its author did not succeed in establishing himself as a novelist, for I doubt if many recollect even the titles of his "Three to One" (1872), "Half a Life" (1874), and "Vikings of the Baltic" (1875). On the other hand, his volumes of essays, "Jest and Earnest" (1873) may still be dipped into with some satisfaction.

The announcement that the Clarendon Press is to give us a new edition of the "Utopia" reminds us that we received from the same press some eight years ago a volume, edited by J. H. Lupton, which contained both the Latin text of 1818 and the English text (by Ralph Robinson) of 1551. Two years earlier—that is, in 1893—Robinson's translation, revised by F. S. Ellis, had been reprinted at the Kelmescott Press, with a "foreword" by Mr. William Morris. Robinson's version may be said to have outlived that by Bishop Burnet, though of that there were reprints as late as 1850 and 1858, the latter edited by J. A. St. John. Of the version by Arthur Cayley, jun., published in 1808, we hear nothing nowadays.

The announcement by the Stage Society of its intention to perform an English version of M. Maeterlinck's "Aglavaine and Sélysette" should cause a fresh demand for the translation of the play made by Mr. Alfred Sutro, prefaced by Mr. J. W. Mackail, and published by Mr. Grant Richards in 1897. As Mr. Mackail says, the work has "little interplay of action. Beyond Aglavaine and Sélysette themselves there are really no characters. . . . But praise cannot be too high for the fineness and truth of the two principal figures; nor for the consummate skill with which the interest, the sympathy, and beauty are slowly slid from one to the other."

There are two other theatrical enterprises which are likely to do some little benefit to literature. One is that by which Edward FitzGerald's "free translation" from Calderon, "Such Stuff as Dreams are Made of," will be represented by the Elizabethan Stage Society. This may send people not only to FitzGerald's work, but to D. F. McCarthy's translation from the same original, "Life is a Dream." The latter came out in 1873; FitzGerald's version in 1877. Then there is Miss Ellen Terry's promise to produce Ibsen's "Vikings"—that is to say, "The Vikings at Helgeland." This has been translated by Mr. William Archer, whose version is included in the third volume of Ibsen's "Prose Dramas" (1890). Mr. Archer will no doubt revise his translation for the occasion, and a cheap reprint of it would be a boon to many playgoers.

The name of the new editor of "The Literary Year-Book," Mr. Henry Gilbert, appears to be unfamiliar to some people. Mr. Gilbert is nevertheless the author of at least two books—"Hearts in Revolt: a Tragi-Comedy of Youth" (1901) and "The Captain of His Soul" (1902).

The Unknowable.

HUMAN PERSONALITY AND ITS SURVIVAL OF BODILY DEATH. By Frederic W. H. Myers. 2 Vols. (Longmans. 42s. net.)

FREDERIC MYERS wrote several volumes of prose and verse, all of them marked by great spiritual insight and a rare and even perilous eloquence. In particular his "St. Paul," a review of which stands almost alone amongst the collected works of Mr. George Meredith, may claim to rank amongst the more than minor poetry of the 'sixties. His latter years were not, from the literary point of view, productive. He lived the life of a blameless official, and devoted his personal energies to the investigation of the rarer psychological phenomena. With Edmund Gurney he founded the Society for Psychical Research. He collaborated in that epoch-making book, "Phantasms of the Living," and continued after Gurney's death the active collection of facts, and the unswerving effort to base upon them a satisfactory theory of human personality. In the pursuit of this aim he had to wade through sufficient records of human folly and credulity to sicken a less ardent searcher after truth. But in the end he came to consider that he had arrived at evidence which, although many of his colleagues interpreted it otherwise, justified very important conclusions upon the vexed questions of human destiny. He accepted a position not essentially different from that of spiritualism, in that he believed certain utterances obtained either verbally or by means of "automatic writing" through "mediums" to be veritable communications of departed or "discarnate" spirits made to those still in the flesh. The book now issued is his justification of the faith that was in him. It was found almost complete at his death, and has been prepared for publication by Mr. Richard Hodgson and Miss Alice Johnson. Whatever may be thought of its ultimate thesis, it is beyond question a work of the most profound and wide-reaching interest, forming a complete survey of the facts with which "psychical research" attempts to deal, and setting forth with singular persuasiveness and exquisite temper the interpretation of those facts which Myers thought that right reason compelled him to adopt. It is almost impossible to give in short space even the outline of the elaborate and complicated argument employed. It covers all the difficult and varied phenomena of dreams, somnambulism, hypnotism, thought reading, apparitions, hauntings and so forth. These, after due allowance has been made for illusion, mal-observation, dishonesty and so forth, Myers holds to establish the fact of certain direct activities of mind upon mind which do not necessarily pass through the channels of the physical organism.

At such a theory the materialist may chafe, but there is nothing in it which the Platonist need dismiss as inconceivable. Just as behind the material environment, suggests Myers, there is dimly becoming known the etherial environment, with laws of its own which are but little understood and can only be guessed to be at some unknown point continuous with those of matter, so even more shadowy but doubtless still continuous looms yet a third or metetherial environment in which our spirits live and move and have their being. The metetherial activities occasionally involve the normal waking consciousness, but more often that split-off, or, as Myers calls it, "subliminal" consciousness which comes into play in dreams or in the abnormal states of somnambulism, hypnotism or trance. So far as these activities, which may be generally summed up as "telepathy," go, modern psychology, profiting much by the investigations of psychical research, would probably in the main accept Myers' contention, and acknowledge them as a real, but very obscure fact in the relations of man and man. Myers, however, now invites psychology to go a step further, and to hold that, although as a rule the trance phenomena are sufficiently explained by telepathy between man and man, yet there are certain cases in which the agent is not man in the ordinary sense, but a discarnate spirit, continuing its conscious existence after its dissociation with the bodily organism and endeavouring, for whatever reason of curiosity or apostolic fervour, to re-establish communications with the world it has left. The evidence upon which he most relies for this immense and startling extension of the telepathic theory is to be found, firstly, in the remarkable experiences of the late Mr. Stainton Moses, and secondly, in the trance-utterances of a well-known and carefully observed Boston medium, Mrs. Piper, which purport to come, and in Myers' view, actually do come, from individuals lately dead and well known during their lifetime to several of the Psychical Researchers and their friends.

For ourselves, after carefully reading Myers' treatment of the question, we remain wholly unconvinced that there is really any solid basis for his belief. All the facts seem to us, as to many others, including Mr. Podmore, whose own book was recently reviewed in these columns, capable of a more probable explanation as instances of telepathy between the living. But the pros and cons of this can hardly be discussed here, and it is perhaps more immediately interesting to throw some light upon the personal temper of mind in which Myers approaches his difficult and momentous problem. He manages to combine an unwavering belief in the unseen with one hardly less profound in the method of modern science, that "interrogation of Nature entirely dispassionate, patient, systematic." Were it not so, indeed, his book would have no more claims to serious consideration than the lucubrations of any illiterate spiritualist. But for him, although the etherial world is distinct from the material world, and the metetherial world from both alike, they all form ultimately part of the great cosmic order. In the psychological region, as in the biological, there is no miracle. All is law, although the laws may differ. Spiritual facts, like physical facts, must be explored by the one faculty for finding truth which man possesses, his reason. They are not to be kept in a "separate and sealed compartment," sacred to religion and shut in from the light of day.

My one contention is that in the discussion of the deeper problems of man's nature and destiny there ought to be exactly the same openness of mind, exactly the same diligence in the search for objective evidence of any kind, exactly the same critical analysis of results, as is habitually shown, for instance, in the discussion of the nature and destiny of the planet upon which man now moves.

This is a high ideal, and even those who are least inclined to accept some of Myers' most cherished conclusions will acknowledge that throughout all the lengthy and detailed discussions of his remarkable book he has done all that in him lay to give it his loyal adherence.

But it must not be forgotten that we are dealing with a poet as well as with a man of science, and not the least interesting of Myers' pages are those in which, after expounding his speculative theory, he lets the reins of his imagination go a little in summing up its spiritual bearings. Here, for example, is a noble and disturbing passage. Myers has been explaining that the initiative in the communications between this world and that seems to come rather from the discarnate than the incarnate spirits. Seeking some open avenue they discern a glimmer of light, which indicates an organism so constituted that a spirit can temporarily inform or control it:—

One touch of pathos, indeed—though not of tragedy—stands out to my recollection from the trances which I have watched—a kind of savage and immemorial emotion which takes one back to many an old-world legend, and to the "Odyssey" of Homer above all. Odysseus, at the entrance of the under-world, poured the blood of victims into a trench, that the dim spirits of the dead might drink of it and have force to see and hear. But it was to learn from Teiresias that he came, and until he had spoken with Teiresias he suffered none of the thronging spirits to draw anigh. There sat he—as Polygnotus' picture showed him—on a heap of stones in the grey light beside the trench, his drawn sword laid betwixt him and his mother's soul; since, "not even thus, tho' sick at heart, would I suffer her to come nigh the blood, ere I had heard the tale Teiresias had to tell."

ἀλλ' οὐδ' ὧς εἶων προτέρην, πύκινον περ ἀχέων, αἵματος ἄσσον ἔμεν πρὶν Τειρεσίας πυθέσθαι.

Even in such fashion, through Mrs. Piper's trances, the thronging multitude of the departed press to the glimpse of light. Eager, but untrained, they interject their uncomprehended cries; vainly they call the names which no man answers; like birds that have beaten against a lighthouse, they pass in disappointment away. At first this confusion gravely interfered with coherent messages, but through the second and third stages of Mrs. Piper's trances, under the watchful care apparently of supervising spirits, it has tended more and more to disappear.

All this must needs be so; yet I, at least, had not realised beforehand that the pressure from that side was likely to be more urgent than from this. Naturally: since often on this side something of inevitable doubt—nay, of shuddering prejudice and causeless fear—curdles the stream of love; while for them the imperishable affection flows on unchecked and full. They yearn to tell of their bliss, to promise their welcome at the destined hour. A needless scruple, indeed, which dreads to call or to constrain them! We can bind them by no bonds but of love; they are more ready to hear than we to pray; of their own act and grace they visit our spirits in prison.

The epilogue to the book is a "Provisional Sketch of a Religious Synthesis," in which Myers attempts to estimate the bearing of his beliefs upon the traditional religions of the world, and predicts that "in consequence of the new evidence, all reasonable men, a century hence, will believe the Resurrection of Christ, whereas, in default of the new evidence, no reasonable men, a century hence, would have believed it."

And yet in no single act or passion can that salvation stand; for hence, beyond Orion and Andromeda, the cosmic process works and shall work for ever through unbegotten souls. And even as it was not in truth the great ghost of Hector only, but the whole nascent race of Rome, which bore from the Trojan altar the hallowing fire, so is it not one Saviour only, but the whole nascent race of man—nay, all the immeasurable progeny and population of the heavens—which issues continually from behind the veil of Being, and forth from the Sanctuary of the Universe carries the ever-burning flame: Aeternumque adytis effert penetralibus ignem.

The Preacher Poet.

HERBERT'S POEMS. A New Edition. With the Life of the Author. By Izaak Walton. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 3s. 6d.)

THE seventeenth century poets are coming to their own; and above all, the religious poets of the seventeenth century. Vaughan and Crashaw have been made accessible to the every-day reader; and now the poetic father of both, George Herbert, is re-issued in cheap form by the S.P.C.K. Unlike Crashaw and Vaughan, Herbert has long been recognised and accessible. But the present volume gives us double riches by including old Izaak Walton's memoir of the poet. You can turn from the sweet and homely poems to such sweet and homely English as that which records Herbert's marriage with Jane Danvers:—

This Mr. Danvers . . . did so much affect him that he often and publicly declared a desire that Mr. Herbert would marry any of his nine daughters . . . but rather his daughter Jane than any other, because Jane was his beloved daughter. And he had often said the same to Mr. Herbert himself; and that if he could like her for a wife, and she him for a husband, Jane should have a double blessing; and Mr. Danvers had so often said the like to Jane, and so much commended Mr. Herbert to her, that Jane became so much a platonic as to fall in love with Mr. Herbert unseen. This was a fair preparation for a marriage; but alas! her father died before Mr. Herbert's retirement to Dantsey; yet some friends to both parties procured their meeting; at which time a mutual affection entered into both their hearts, as a conqueror enters into a surprised city; and love, having got such possession, governed, and made there such laws and resolutions as neither party was able to resist; insomuch that she changed her name into Herbert the third day after the first interview. This haste might in others be thought a love-phrenzy, or worse; but it was not, for they had wooed so like princes as to have select proxies; . . . that the suddenness was justifiable by the strictest rules of prudence; and the more because it proved so happy to both parties; for the Eternal Lover of mankind made them happy in each other's mutual and equal affections and compliance; indeed so happy, that there never was any opposition betwixt them, unless it were a contest which should most incline to a compliance with the other's desires. And though this begot and continued in them such a mutual love and joy and content, as was no way defective, yet this mutual content and love and joy did receive a daily augmentation, by such daily obligingness to each other as still added such new affluences to the former fullness of these divine souls, as was only improvable in heaven, where they now enjoy it.

There you have a staid little romance, smelling wall-flowers and sweet-marjoram. It provides an exception (by the way) to the general saying that only men fall in love with one they have never seen—if Mrs. Browning, perhaps, be not another exception. The orderly fixing of his affections on the lady proposed to him is quite in character with the writer of "The Temple," from whom one would expect no vagrant ardours. His person bears out the same character, as one sees him in the portrait prefixed to the book, and the portrait (at least equally lively) given by demure and charming old Izaak himself:—

He was for his person of a stature inclining towards tallness; his body was very straight, and so far from being cumbered with too much flesh, that he was lean to an extremity. His aspect was cheerful, and his speech and motion did both declare him a gentleman; but they were all so meek and obliging that they purchased love and respect from all that knew him.

One needs but these two quotations to have a sufficiently distinct conception of the man, bred from the noble Herbert stock, and born in their Castle of Montgomery, who came to be the devout rector of Bemerton, and to write the poems immortal under the name of "The Temple." But his poetic character is a less simple matter. Herbert the poet is a combination which could scarce have happened but in those spacious days, and can scarce be repeated in days less fraught with circumfluous poetry (if the term may be permitted us). Basically he is the typical Englishman; shrewd, homely, beef-nourished common-sense, looking squarely at what is before his eyes, rootedly ordering loving and practical. But into that competition has miraculously fallen a germ of the seventeenth-century fancy, in all its unexpectedness, its grace of child-like good-faith and simplicity—yea, its very ingenuitiveness is ingenuous. The result is a unique and charming blend, a goodly savour to the Philistine, yet savoured truly by refined culture alone. It is a delight to the unliterary pietist, and a choice morsel to Coleridge. Vaughan is for the few, Crashaw a stumbling-block to the multitude: the few and the many find pasture in Herbert.

The conspicuous feature of Herbert's usual style was long ago remarked by Coleridge. His language is the ordinary language of perfectly well-bred talk, plain but choice; yet it is entirely adequate to his poetic effect. Here his aristocratic breeding joins hands with his practice as a country preacher. The thing is related as a preacher might relate a deftly illustrative apologue to a homely congregation. For the larger number of his poems are in effect apologues—allegorical stories driving home a point. The apologue itself is devised with that mixture of convincing fancy and hodge-podge practicality which makes his peculiar strength. It is difficult to find an example at once satisfactory and short; but "Redemption" may serve, though there are longer and better:—

Having been tenant long to a rich Lord,
Not thriving, I resolved to be bold,
And make a suit unto Him, to afford
A new small-rented lease, and cancel the old.
In Heaven, at His manor, I Him sought.
They told me there that He was lately gone
About some land, which He had dearly bought
Long since on earth, to take possession.
I straight returned; and, knowing His great birth,
Sought Him accordingly in great resorts,
In cities, theatres, gardens, parks, and courts:
At length, I heard a ragged noise and mirth
Of thieves and murderers: there I Him espied,
Who straight, "Your suit is granted," said, and died.

It is comprehensible almost to a child; yet the art, in its degree, is excellent. That is Herbert at his level: and because his level rests on such a bed-rock of prose common-sense, he keeps it with a surer uniformity than the winged Crashaw or the illuminated Vaughan. Vaughan is naked spirit—the most essential poetry of the three; and the most of him is deadly prose. Crashaw's radiant Muse is often "tricked and frownced" and mincing and like an over-conscious Botticelli angel. But even when Herbert writes prose he does not write dull prose; whereas with his brethren who are all poet, it is poetry or failure.

But at intervals Herbert quits his level, and becomes lyric. His grave sincerity is quickened with a visitation of tenderer feeling, and becomes sweet with a contained sweetness. "Church Music" has so touched him:—

Sweetest of sweets, I thank you: when displeasure
Did, through my body, wound my mind,
You took me thence, and in your house of pleasure
A dainty lodging me assigned.
Now I in you without a body move,
Rising and falling with your wings:
We both together sweetly live and love,
Yet say sometimes, "God help poor kings!"
Comfort, I'll die; for, if you post from me,
Sure I shall do so, and much more.
But I travel in your company,
You know the way to Heaven's door.

The most beautiful examples of his usual style, such as the well-known "Peace," we have been debarred from (as we said) by their length. But there is a height of serene lyric loveliness which he touches but a few times, as in the famous "Sweet day! so cool," &c. Lovelier than this, to our thinking, and with a breath of tender ardour in it, is the "Easter":—

I got me flowers to strew Thy way,
I got me boughs off many a tree;
But Thou wast up by break of day,
And brought'st Thy sweets along with Thee.
The Sun arising in the East,
Though he give light, and the East perfume,
If they should offer to contest
With Thy arising, they presume.
Can there be any day but this,
Though many suns to shine endeavour?
We count three hundred; but we miss:
There is but one; and that one, ever.

That rings rather Crashaw than Herbert; and so sweet a fervour he never reached again. We might dwell—perhaps we ought to dwell—on the sententious gnomic verse in which Herbert, with his practical wisdom racy of the soil which begot our English proverbs, is a master: "The Church-Porch" is compact of such. But "the words of Mercury are harsh after the songs of Apollo," and we leave here our notice of a poet not the least of whose works is the engendering, according to the spirit, of two such disciples as Crashaw and Vaughan.

The Enigmatical Emperor.

AUGUSTUS: THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THE FOUNDER OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By E. S. Shuckburgh. (Fisher Unwin. 16s.)

In this volume of three hundred pages, Dr. Shuckburgh gives an account, drawn from wide reading and touched with sympathy, of "the greatest ruler known to us." It is a careful exposition of the situation at one of the crises of history, when Rome had conquered the world and was still vaguely hoping to rule it under a constitution designed for a city. Dr. Shuckburgh has none of those flashes of untrustworthy inspiration—nothing of the dramatic instinct of Carlyle or even of Mommsen; he gives no single portrait of the man who brought order into the chaos of the Roman world when for nearly a century prancing pro-consuls had been in command of huge armies over which flaccid consuls and a trembling senate had no means of control. And probably for all time Octavianus will remain a mystery, the human force that, half-unconsciously, gathered up a collapsing world and moulded it into a new form. His life was not so dramatic as that of his uncle Julius Cæsar, who was a man with fifty years and a past behind him before he thought of taking life seriously; there was no Rubicon, no fierce Napoleonic activity that crammed a lifetime into a few months and reformed the calendar and outlined a constitution in the intervals of fighting, and there was no dramatic ending by a dagger in the Senate House—merely an old man who fell back dead in his bed as he tried to kiss his old wife's lips. But this young man—he was more than Napoleonic in his precocity—set the tune to which the world danced for centuries. And in spite of records, in spite of contemporary adulation and subsequent depreciation, in spite of his own bare summary of achievement preserved on the walls of the temple of Ancyra, one is little nearer to the heart of the man.

When a little over eighteen years of age he heard of the assassination of his uncle Julius Cæsar, and with the news came the announcement that he was heir to his uncle. In the present day there is no parallel to the situation, for the world is bigger and less compact; but this youth, whose intentions even Cicero could not fathom, shewed no sign of hesitation—only a quiet coolness and a marvellous faculty for keeping his mouth shut. The world had no lack of men who wanted to be masters; Sextus Pompeius was scouring the seas, Brutus and Cassius, Marcus Antonius and Lepidus, all men of experience, had to be grappled with. And this mere boy, who in these days would be just leaving Eton, landed in Italy, gathered behind him a large section of the veterans of the Great Julius, and was able to treat on terms of equality with men who had been statesmen long before he was born. One of the grimmest scenes in history is the conference of Antonius, Lepidus and the stripling Octavianus when the proscription was decided upon, and each one sacrificed—with a sigh—his relatives to the enmity of his colleagues. The State needed purging, but the process was memorable in the awful history of proscription. And one of the mysteries in the character of Augustus is this initial cruelty which was followed by a clemency and a generosity quite remarkable in an age which had not yet listened to the Sermon on the Mount. Dr. Shuckburgh's statement of this difficulty is worth quoting, for until it is cleared up there can be no unity in our portrait of Augustus.

The moral problem presented by the change from ruthless cruelty to wise and persistent clemency has exercised the minds of philosophers and historians ever since. "It was not clemency," says Seneca, "but a surfeit of cruelty." But this explains nothing. If Augustus had ever been cruel for cruelty's sake, the increased opportunities of exercising it would have whetted his appetite for blood, as it did in some of his successors. It was circumstances that had changed, not altogether the man. Still, no doubt, success softened (it does not always) Augustus's character. His ministers were humane men, and in favour of milder methods. His wife was a high-minded woman and always ready to succour distress, as she showed during the proscriptions, and afterwards in her son's reign. He had among his immediate friends philosophers and men of letters whose influence, so far as it went, was humanizing. And lastly, such opposition as still existed was no longer of irreconcilables who had "known liberty." A new generation had grown up, which on the whole acquiesced in the peace and security of a benevolent despotism. It was a new era, and Augustus became a new man. Full of honours and possessed with irresistible powers, feeling the responsibility heavily, and often in vain desiring rest, he had no farther personal object to gain beyond the credit of having served his country and saved the Empire.

That is a statement of the difficulty, but no solution. One does not become a new man by mere lapse of time. But it is, we think, quite possible that in the matter of the proscriptions the youth was overborne by the older men. Moreover youth is less tolerant than thoughtful age. It is only the best natures that improve with advancing years, and the increasing clemency of Augustus is at least a proof of character.

Dr. Shuckburgh gives a most lucid account of the steps by which this extraordinary young man, ever ready to take advantage of other men's mistakes (such as the infatuation of M. Antonius for Cleopatra), always disclaiming ambition, found himself master of the world before he had passed into the thirties. Between this and his death six and forty years intervened; and though one can trace the transformation in the Roman world, the change in the point of view of poets and orators, the reformed finance, the settlement of provinces, the efforts after public morality, though inscriptions throughout the Empire bear witness to the ceaseless activity of Augustus, though at his death he left a surely founded constitution, we have but vague ideas of the personality that lay behind. Dr. Shuckburgh has collected materials for the picture of the outward man:—

Augustus was a short man (just under five feet seven inches), but so well proportioned that the defect in height was not noticed unless he was standing beside much taller men. He was remarkably handsome at all periods of his life, with an expression of calm dignity, whether silent or speaking, which involuntarily inspired respect. His eyes were grey, and so bright and keen that it was not easy to meet their gaze.

Of personalia too, contemporary writers have left much that Dr. Shuckburgh has drawn upon. The sanctity of married life with the encouragement of matrimony and paternity was one of the objects of the Augustan policy. But in his own case Augustus took a more than American liberty in divorce. He divorced his wife Scribonia (whom he had married for political reasons) on the day of her son's birth. And he induced Tiberius Nero to hand over Livia to him. Tiberius was most complaisant, and entertained the bridal pair at a banquet:—

The marriage was so prompt that a favourite page of Livia's seeing her take her place on the same dinner couch as Cæsar, whispered to his mistress that she had made a mistake, for her husband was on the other couch.

And the pair lived in deep affection until Augustus died.

A Biblical Drama.

ABSALOM: A CHRONICLE-PLAY IN THREE ACTS. By T. Sturge Moore. (At the Sign of the Unicorn. 5s. net.)

MR. STURGE MOORE'S design is bold and sufficiently original. The difficulties of scriptural drama have repelled most writers. Those who have attempted it strive in some way to maintain the scriptural flavour, and the note of scriptural dignity. Milton, in "Samson Agonistes," had recourse to the form of Greek choral tragedy, which permitted him to give a lyrical elevation to his treatment, and removed the whole drama far from realism. But Mr. Sturge Moore has deliberately elected to follow the model of the Elizabethan chronicle-play, with some modification; and has treated the theme of Absalom's revolt against David with frank realism and even modernity. The play covers the whole career of Absalom, so far as it is recorded in the Bible; and Absalom is drawn as a rash, headstrong, aspiring, vain, and unwise youth. Ahithophel is the crafty and astute politician, desirous only to divine the winning side, and ally himself with the dispenser of future favours. There is no attempt to maintain the Biblical diction: save in an occasional passage, there is hardly a colouring of it. The language is fearlessly modern. This realism and modernity is extended even to David. In the opening portion, indeed, we are bound to say Mr. Sturge Moore seems to give good cause for Ahithophel's opinion that the old king is falling into dotage: there is little trace of the sagacious and resolute King of Scripture. The David of the Bible has not a little of the fox about him, even in his age and misfortunes: but Mr. Sturge Moore's David presents rather a poor figure beside his Ahithophel. The realism becomes absolute in the accessories and minor characters: it gives one rather an odd sensation to have Absalom's runners playing the giddy goat and kissing the Jewish women. One of these accessory characters, Rebecca, seems somewhat aimlessly introduced in the scene in which Ahithophel's counsel to Absalom is defeated by Hushai: one does not see what effect her by-play has on the main action.

The style of the drama aims at the mixture of rhetoric and poetry which we have in the chronicle-plays of Shakespeare. But, truth to say, Mr. Sturge Moore's rhetoric is more conspicuous and more successful than his poetry. He can command very graphic descriptive touches, such as this:—

There! there, the smoke begins to skim away;
Thin, slant, and straight the smart breeze combs it up;
The flame, see, red, brown, purple, almost black,
Eager to singe more bristling beards, leans out;
The great blue noon watches with bated breath.

That "combs it up" is an admirable phrase. But more than this is needed for poetry; and Mr. Sturge Moore's imagery has a hard, intellectual cast, seems born of the brain more than the emotions. The metre, too, is over-monosyllabic, which gives it a prosaic movement, lacking in flexibility. As rhetoric, however, the speeches are good and characteristic, though it might be difficult to find one which would be very impressive as an extract, separated from its context. The drama, as a whole, is a satisfactory intellectual effort, the characters distinctly conceived and coherent: it fails in emotional power and effect. One is not moved by Absalom's fall; one is not even moved by David sobbing over his son, as one is moved by the brief, simple cry of the Bible. That cry is retained, and sparingly enlarged: but any enlargement is fatal, save from the hand of a master. What the play might be on the stage, the laws of the censorship save us the need to speculate.

For English Readers.

THE ATHENIAN DRAMA. II. SOPHOCLES. By J. S. Phillimore. (Allen. 7s. 6d. net.)

IN a sense this volume is a betrayal. From the Aeschylus, the first volume of the series, we understood that this series was intended primarily for the English reader quite ignorant of or but slightly familiar with the original. Let us see how this promise is fulfilled. The introduction (86 pp.) contains some forty quotations in Greek, all of which are relevant to the matter under discussion. If the reader cannot translate the quotation or cannot place it in this volume he is debarred from a full enjoyment of the essay. An instance will make our point clear. We read (p. 69) that "the opening sentiment of the chorus in—δοτις τοῦ πλεόνος μέρους

(O.C. 1. 1211)

seems likewise inspired by personal feeling." How is the English reader to check this statement? Mr. Phillimore's translation is not numbered; consequently the reader must refer to a text of the Oedipus Coloneus, compare it with a prose numbered translation, and then make search for it in this volume if the quotation happens to be taken from one of the three plays translated.

Betrayal number two is less serious. Forgetting for what object these translations are made, Mr. Phillimore takes as his example Browning's "Agamemnon." Could anything be more hazardous? Browning himself tacitly admitted that the best preparation for his version was the reading of a prose rendering. But Browning was a poet, and no matter what restrictions he placed on his Muse the poetry would out. The pity is that the translator did not feel that Browning's canon ought not to be applied in an edition of Sophocles for readers, many of them possibly reading an Athenian play for the first time.

Mr. Phillimore has, however, both poetic gift and metric skill. Nothing in its way could be more effective, perhaps because it reminds one of the opening passage of "Pippa Passes," than—

Sunbeam! Never a lovelier
Dawned on Thebus to awaken her
Seven Ports in the days of old!
The Dawn, ris'n at last, in a gleam,
Passes over the Dirce stream,
Open eyelid of dayspring golden!
Foeman mail'd with buckler of white,
Who from Argos sallied to fight,
Precipitately she turns him to flight,
Bit nor bridle can hold him!

Or than—

Rest here, friend: for the Land of Horses
Knows no better abode in all the region,
The white mound o' Colonos, where Nightingales of a choice repair,
With sweet melody murmur'd soft in Fresh green copses abounding;
The flushed ivy she keeps aloft in,
Thick-set bosky surrounding
Haunts o' the God where the berries are legion!
Never a wintry wind dishevels
Bacchus' close, never hot sun forces
These shy swards where he loves to lead the revels,
Nymphs to nurse and to tend his courses!

The introductory essay is an exceedingly careful evaluation of Sophocles' place in art, and is dotted with sayings which one remembers without effort:—

Self hungers after its own mystery, and seeks for the self in another, communicated by artistic interpretation. And it is the self which eludes us in Sophocles.

Only the almost sentimental turn for melancholy which marks the Ionian is strong in him (Sophocles), as in all natures which are hyperaesthetic both of pains and pleasures.

We close the book with mixed feelings, grateful for Mr. Phillimore's enthusiasm, sorry that the pursuit of a false ideal has robbed us of so much. The commentary should be at the foot of each page, and might with profit to most readers be made a little more complete.

Villagers.

THE RIGGLESSES AND OTHERS. By Evelyn E. Rynd.
("Country Life" Library. 6s.)

MISS RYND will be remembered as the creator of a Kentish charwoman of appalling but often amusing loquacity, who first babbled through the pages of a contemporary, and afterwards between the covers of a book—"Mrs. Green" by name. To Mrs. Green, Miss Rynd has now added the Rigglesses, a husband and wife of the same degree of illiteracy and powers of conversation, but of vastly more effective and cunning periods. To a certain extent they are types: every country clergyman must know something of the kind; but Miss Rynd makes them far too clever. If the Rigglesses were as clever as she would have us believe, they would long since have ceased to live humbly in their Kentish village. They would be wealthy tradespeople in a town. Mr. Riggles would have six shops in a row, and Mrs. Riggles would wear silk and take a nap every afternoon on a repp sofa.

If we overlook this discrepancy, and also do not too closely scrutinise the form of speech which Miss Rynd would have us believe is common in her village (but which, in our opinion, never really existed outside the pages of "Martin Chuzzlewit"), the book is frankly good fun. We will not go so far as the "Country Life" Library's own reviewer, who remarks (in the advertisement pages at the end of this volume) that—the brilliant young writer who made such a hit with "Mrs. Green," has written a book much in the same vein, only that the humour is much brighter and touched with a finer pathos, while the wit is keener than ever. The scene is the same as before, viz., a village in Kent, and the characters are for the most part in the same status in society as the immortal charwoman. But light as is the vein, the authoress touches some of the deepest issues of life, and although it is always with a laugh, it is also with tenderness and insight.

It would be a great saving of time to have this kind of thing done for one, but since we have been asked to come to our own opinion of the book, we would say that by all with whom a book in the dialect of Mrs. Gamp is not too hard a nut to crack, "The Rigglesses" should be found to be good company. We quote a passage illustrating one of the many discomfitures of the curate in the presence of this terrifying couple:—

"Perhaps it might be as well to go back to the beginning," said the Curate, when he had revived sufficiently, "and start clear."

"An' where was the beginning, sir?" said Mr. Riggles, resettling himself in an affable manner.

"Ah, where, indeed?" said Mrs. Riggles, "which Genesis was nothin' to it."

"I mean," said the Curate, with an elusive eye skimming hastily past Mrs. Riggles, and Genesis, "let us return to the question which originally brought me here, Mr. Riggles, and which I have not yet fully stated."

"When the parat is sech as all should regret," said Mrs. Riggles, "why return to the same? Look at Lot's wife, as is salt for h'evermore."

The Curate refused, with a visible effort, to look either at Lot's wife or Mrs. Riggles.

"It might be easier, Mr. Riggles," he said agitatedly, "if you and I were to deal with this matter alone. You might understand me better, and I might find myself less confused, I mean."

"'Ardly," said Mr. Riggles. "Let us hever listen patient to the clergy, especially such a one as this 'ere. Do you mean without me wife, sir?"

"I think I do," said the Curate, avoiding the eye of Mrs. Riggles.

Miss Rynd details the dialectic triumphs of her villagers with remorseless assiduity. Our only wonder is that any one was found to tackle them at all. In real life they would decimate the country side.

Truth in Chaff.

F. C. G.'s FROISSART, 1902. By F. Carruthers Gould.
(Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

FOR a second time Mr. Gould, with pen and picture, has chronicled the events of a year, and we hope that for many years so gay a commentary on serious matters may be given us. Mr. Gould imagines Sir John Froissart contemplating the events of yesterday in the spirit of his own century, with the Emperor Wilhelm of Almaine, Sir Cawmell de Bannerman, Sir John de Morlaix, the Earl of Durdans, and other new friends with old faces. It is all good-humoured enough, and whether he describes or illustrates the Coronation or the voyage of Sir Joseph, Mr. Gould is never nasty, and one can well believe that politicians flock around him in the hope of publicity, and that Mr. Chamberlain has a choice and cherished collection of himself as seen by Mr. Gould's eyes.

Mr. Gould is alone among caricaturists—since Du Maurier died—in the possession of a literary as well as an artistic faculty. And being literary, he is impartial. His chaff goes all round. Thus "The Discomfort of the Buffs" or the split in the Liberal party is as amusing to him and to his readers as the "Buying of Horses for the Army."

Sir John Froissart enquires about the little difficulty between Sir Cawmell de Bannerman and the Earl of Durdans as to the tabernacle and the clean slate, and finds that there was no slate and no tabernacle:—

I had great marvel of this, and enquired how a slate might be cleaned if there were indeed no such thing. Whereupon the man of law made merry at my bewilderment, saying that he believed of a surety the slate and the tabernacle were metaphors, and could neither be written upon, nor cleaned, nor dwelt in.

Then he showed me what manner of thing a metaphor is.

"It is," quoth he, "a figure of speech of contrarious and perilous creation, for it ariseth out of a word that hath been taken away out of the place to which it pertaineth of right, and is put where it is not clearly understood and cannot easily be explained."

So Mr. Gould brings Froissart into the twentieth century, and a man who has been dead for centuries and looked at men and things with alien eyes is a valuable critic. But the pictures are the thing. Mr. Gould sees events in terms of black and white. And the Liberal split is drawn delightfully in the picture of the Earl of Durdans walking away from Sir Cawmell, who pokes a head from the forsaken tabernacle. One of the smallest pictures is among the happiest. "Sir Blundell de Maple protesteth that towel-horses would have better served the army than the horses that had been bought in Hungary." You should see Mr. Gould's towel-horse!

The things that are not said in leading articles can be said by the humourist who calls in the old world to redress the balance of the new. And that is precisely what Mr. Gould does. He tells the truth.

THE STUARTS IN XVIIth., XVIIth., AND XVIIIth. CENTURY ART. By J. J. Foster. (Dickinson.)

MR. FOSTER sets at the head of his introduction to these sumptuous volumes the following quotation from Charles Kingsley's "Plays and Puritans": "The only temper in which a man can write accurately and well is a temper of trust towards the generation whom he describes; the only temper, for if a man has no affection for the characters of whom he reads, he will never understand them." In that temper Mr. Foster has approached his task, and he has accomplished it with distinct success. The extent of the period covered—from James V. of Scotland to Prince

Charles Edward—made it, of course, impossible for the author to give us any great amount of historical detail; his object has rather been to link together in a concise narrative the characters and events which are illustrated in the fine series of reproductions. It may be said that no such collection of Stuart illustrations has ever before been brought together, and the reproductions have evidently been made with the utmost care. The portraits, naturally, claim the most important historical place, then follow the medals and personal relics. No royal house has so persistently appealed to personal affection and loyalty as the house of Stuart, and the old attraction is curiously alive, if not actively vital, to-day. In their affliction and downfall they were more beloved than in their brief day of power; they were a race, indeed, arrogant in power, but in affliction capable of the most human and graceful tenderness and solicitude. In that lies their constant appeal to the romantic sense. Their tragedy was not inaptly summed up by Carlyle, who naturally was no Stuart lover and as naturally was unfair: "The Fates said to them be kings of talent, but not of talent enough; kings of a deep inarticulate people, in whose heart is kindled fire of Heaven, which shall be unintelligible and incredible to you. Take these heroic qualities, this sort of gypsy black. Let there run in your quick blood pruriency of appetite, a proud impatience—alas! an unveracity, a heat, and a darkness; and therewith try to govern England in the age of Puritanism. That we have computed will be tragedy enough for England and you."

Both author and publisher are to be congratulated on these beautiful and invaluable volumes.

LETTERS FROM AN UITLANDER, 1899–1902. With an Introduction by Major Sir Bartle Frere, Bart. (Murray. 5s. net.)

CONCERNING the author of these letters Sir Bartle Frere says: "The writer is a man who has long been resident in South Africa, and has held more the position of onlooker than of participator in its political and commercial affairs. He is not connected with gold mining, he has carefully watched events, and he is an honest English gentleman." The matter contained in the correspondence which follows seems to bear out Sir Bartle Frere's introduction; the letters are frank, honest, and eminently sane. The first of the letters is dated June 26, 1899, more than three months before the war began. We read:—

Is the British Government aware that in South Africa it has to face the greatest conspiracy of our times?

The position is grave beyond all precedent—"to let things slide" is fatal.

By hesitation England is fostering rebellion at hot-house speed—a show of power and determination would prevent war at once.

But the show of power and determination came too late, and so we had the South African War. The anonymous author of these letters, in common with everyone who knows anything about South Africa, saw, and still sees, the greatest element of danger in Cape Colony and the Africander Bond. But as that danger is at last being recognised, we need not dwell upon it here. Concerning our policy towards the natives the writer is equally sound. The amount of vague gush and nonsense talked about the general question of "the native" over here is astonishing, and also valueless. As Sir Bartle Frere says, when an Englishman changes his skies he does not change his traditions, and he is always inclined towards generosity:—

But do not let us therefore suppose, because the South African colonist sees the vital necessity of (as he would put it) "keeping the native in his place," that he has formed any dark schemes for turning the Kaffirs into mine-slaves, or victims of a tyrannical oppression.

The whole question, indeed, turns upon reasonable knowledge of both blacks and whites. Now that the war is over and administration has a chance, we begin to see what was patent before to scores of men whose experience might have been of use to avert the final catastrophe. But the catastrophe came, and these most interesting letters indicate its causes as well as suggest means of reasonable and sound reform.

LIFE AT WEST POINT. By H. Irving Hancock. (J. P. Putman's Sons. 6s.)

"THERE IS NO PLACE FOR A LIAR AT WEST POINT. Should a detected liar address one of his comrades on a personal matter, the only answer is frigid silence, possibly accompanied by a raising of the eyebrows." The superior attitude of the book will be appreciated from this quotation, and the reader may assume that the raised eyebrow takes the place of the senior subaltern's chastisement elsewhere. The author has no anecdote to relieve the praise of the system which turns out cadets equally at home in the work of the cavalry, the artillery, the engineers or the ordnance department. It is said that at the present day more than sixty per cent. of the cadets are the sons of men who toil for day's wages; and that the officers can live on their pay. Reading this book, one is forced to the belief that there is no time or inclination at West Point for practical joking or horseplay; there are no indications that the smoke-less, drink-less cadet has any excitements beyond the occasional "hop": but then, says the author enthusiastically, "on the floor many a face is seen radiant from love assured." There are also strolls down Flirtation Walk, but the authorities have set a time limit on this dissipation. The cadets are nominated, and the system is cast-iron, resulting at first in letters of resignation home, but after four years, producing an officer equal to any university man in education and his superior in physique. The Civil War was an exhibition of the practical results of West Point training: Grant, McClellan, Lee, Sherman were all cadets; Stonewall Jackson was not.

The book is most usefully illustrated, and gives a very thorough presentment of the system which produces a fighting machine to the complete satisfaction of the American people.

Mr. W. A. Hirst, in "A Survey of English Ethics" (Longmans), has hit upon a rather original and reasonable idea. He takes the first chapter of Mr. Lecky's "History of European Morals," and provides it with full notes and an interesting and suggestive introduction. "Experience in lecturing on Philosophy," says Mr. Hirst, "has convinced me that students learn far more by reading a standard work than by studying a handbook. The first chapter of 'The History of European Morals' is in every way suitable both to students who are beginning to attend a course of lectures and to those who are wise enough to pursue some branch of liberal culture in their hours of leisure." The experiment is for those "who wish to learn and to think."

The "Year's Art" for 1903 is the twenty-fourth issue of the annual. The scope of this publication is so well known that we need not enlarge upon it. Mr. A. C. R. Carter, in his review of "The Past Year," says: "In one quarter only was activity displayed, and that in the auction arena—a suspect locality indeed. Suspect, because of late years there has been a steadily increasing depletion of British Art treasures in private possession, which even a very heavy ad valorem impost duty levied in the American Custom-houses in no appreciable degree diminishes." With Mr. Carter's plea for a society which should "hold a watching brief, as it were, for the nation, and make a private owner give time before yielding to the offers of American, French, or Teutonic millionaires" we have every sympathy.

NEW EDITIONS: In their "Pocket Classics" Messrs. Macmillan have issued "Tom Brown's Schooldays." The author's preface to the Sixth Edition is included, and many illustrations have been supplied by Mr. E. J. Sullivan. The popularity of Oliver Wendell Holmes seems inexhaustible. A new cheap edition of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," with an introduction by E. H. Blakeney, reaches us from Messrs. Blackie. The "Autocrat," says Mr. Blakeney, is "undoubtedly his finest achievement."—The latest addition to the "World's Classics" is Macaulay's "Lays of Ancient Rome" (Richards). Macaulay's characteristic preface is included.

Fiction.

A FREE LANCE OF TO-DAY. By Hugh Clifford. (Methuen. 6s.)

MR. CLIFFORD suffers in an almost inevitable comparison with Mr. Conrad, an artist who commands similar local colour. He has copious information about still unhackneyed territories—the regions on either side of the Strait of Malacca—and an admirable descriptive gift; the narrative, for instance, of how the seventh wave bore the pâyang containing his hero across the bar of a river could scarcely have been better done. But he has the fatal instinct to get dramatic situations at any price, and the fact that he is an arrant stage manager refuses to be disguised by such a chapter-heading as "The Finger of Fate." The "Free Lance" is an Englishman whose weariness with business routine and civilisation has induced him to give his services to a Sumatran kingdom called Acheh, where hatred of the Dutch is the chief spur of action. He fights the Dutch, and when he has seen the manner in which his brown friends treat the bodies of the slain foe he begins to feel his own whiteness as something besides a colour. Yet Mr. Clifford's Malays are in the main very sympathetic sketches, satisfactory proofs of our growing power as a nation to refresh ourselves benignly in the contemplation of racial differences. The queerest character in the book is a degenerate white who has turned pâyang or medicine-man. That is certainly an effective scene where, while confessing that he is the vilest of fear's votaries, the pâyang turns his contemptuous confidant's dagger into a writhing thing, limp as indiarubber and horribly amorous of its master. Artistically speaking, we hold the wily mariner Bäginda Sûtan the best portrait in the book. It is he who by pretending to punt persuades a pursuing steamer that the water his vessel occupies is of dangerous shallowness, and the perfect legitimacy (so to say) of this incident is in strong contrast with the jugglery that brings a number of ill-assorted people together in "The Place of the Ancient Dead." It was, of course, the love interest of his tale which involved Mr. Clifford in that which constitutes its failure as a work of art. Fortunately "failure," though an ugly word, has as many degrees as has the legal expression "damages." Mr. Clifford has not failed to write an exciting and picturesque story; he has failed in order to be popular, and is therefore only on the shady side of success.

THE SQUIREEN. By Shan F. Bullock. (Methuen. 6s.)

THIS is rather a study than a story, and those who look for exciting incidents in front of the stage will be disappointed. It is a study which deals entirely with the grey and rather sordid background of life in Ulster, at a point where Protestant carefulness wedges itself into Catholic shiftlessness. Gorteen, the small, fruitful and Protestant, produces more than Bilboa, Armoy and Drumhill, which are big and bare and Catholic; it produces Martin Hynes, Scotch-English-Irish, who at thirty-five is good looking, has a long curled moustache and ambition to pose as country gentleman at Hillside, while the ledger tells an unflattering tale. There is nothing in the story but the marriage of Martin to Jane, who had a reputation for ugliness and a bit of money from old Hugh Fallon. And there is one scene in the story that is unforgettable in its realistic sordidness, the scene in which Martin, who must have money, bargains with Jane's relatives round the table, while Jane herself listens at the keyhole. The battle rages between fifty and a hundred and fifty (for no one would take Jane without generous recompense), until finally:—

"Well, curse you for a heart o' stone! Come," cried Hynes, with an oath, his words precisely those that a hundred times he had used in fair and market, "here's my last word: make it guineas an' I take the heifer."

"Pounds!" answered Fallon.

"Guineas!" shouted Hynes, rising from his chair. "It's my last word: guineas or nothin'."

This, then, is the story, how Jane finally submitted gladly to the masterful Martin, who was practically pledged to the penniless Kate. It all moves within a few square miles of Ulster, and is slow, sad, and carefully, conscientiously written. But Mr. Bullock does not succeed in explaining how Martin—lover of Kate—could ever have conceived even a temporary passion for the peaky-nosed Jane with her unattractive hair, or how the neighbourhood that grinned at her betrothal should christen her "snowdrop Jane." She was one of the women who are very valuable when they are old. Mr. Bullock's background of Ulster is excellent, but the people in the foreground are not quite convincing to those who know that Gorteen and Guildford and Galveston are alike when the soul is stripped of its conventional clothing.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

IN PICCADILLY.

BY BENJAMIN SWIFT.

The scene of this glittering story of "smart" life is Piccadilly, and passes mainly at the Hôtel de Luxe, the proprietor of which wrote Memoirs. In the beginning we are introduced to Debris, who, having loved Lady Ossington before her marriage, haunts her afterwards. "Their honeymoon across Europe had been a horror, because in almost every city, in every hotel, they found Debris." Among the other characters are a precocious youth and an aspiring valet. All have ebullient hearts. (Heinemann. 6s.)

WYEMARKE'S MOTHER.

BY EDWARD H. COOPER.

Most of this story is supposed to be written by the child Wyemarke; it begins: "Once a man wrote a book about me called 'Wyemarke and the Sea Fairies,' and next, he helped me to write one myself called 'Wyemarke and the Mountain Fairies.'" That man, as readers will remember, was Mr. Cooper. This story is all about Wyemarke and Mother and Kitty and Jim, with an interruption in Mr. Cooper's proper person concerning Kitty. (Richards. 5s.)

THE LITTLE RED FISH.

BY P. L. OLIPHANT.

Mesmerism, to be effective, requires, at this time of day, to be done well. Mr. Oliphant's heroine, whom we first meet at a country house in Scotland, was, by right of her great grandmother, the Ranees of Moralsarpur. The Government of India had set a usurper on the throne of her ancestors. It was her ambition, by means of the Little Red Fish, and its hypnotic power, to regain her birth-right. Mr. Oliphant is at home in a country house. (Arnold. 6s.)

LOVE IN A LIFE.

BY ALLAN MONKHOUSE.

A problem novel. Theology, Socialism, commercial combines, the cleavage of classes, and the traditional young Manchester man of humble origin and intellectual aspirations. It is a pity that this young Manchester man so often lacks humour. John Axon is no exception to the rule. But the book is a serious study of many urgent problems. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE INTRIGUERS.

BY THOMAS COBB.

"Eliot Sefton was standing before a looking-glass, in the act of putting on his hat, when the proprietor of the house in Bury Street, where he had for some time lodged, entered the room." The proprietor of the house came to say that Mr. Bagster, the jeweller, was waiting, and to him Eliot Sefton owed money. Later, a man called Newman turns up, and Sefton says, "Have a peg?" The whole story is in Mr. Cobb's light and quite superficial manner. (Eveleigh Nash. 6s.)

THE LORD OF THE DARK RED STAR. BY EUGENE LEE HAMILTON.

"Being the story of the Supernatural Influences in the Life of an Italian Despot of the Thirteenth Century." The motto is taken from Shelley:—

Son and Mother, Death and Sin,
Played at dice for Ezelin,
Till Death cried, "I win! I win!"

Mr. Lee-Hamilton has written some good verse, and this book shows the influence of verse writing. But it is too fantastic and remote from life to be of much account. (Scott. 6s.)

FRIENDLY FOES.

BY SARAH TYTLER.

The story of a father and daughter, a butler, the butler's son, and a murder that was hardly a murder. This incident, however, provides the scheme of the book, which ends in happiness for Freddy (Freddy was a girl) and the butler's son. (Digby Long. 6s.)

JOSÉ: A STUDY OF TEMPERAMENT. BY FLORENCE SEVERNE.

José was one of the children who get tired of doing nothing. To her governess, who could not understand this, she said, "No, that is just what it is, I have done nothing, and I want to do something." Then her father marries a second wife, and the real trouble begins. A story with considerable intuition and even actuality, but complicated with extraneous and unnecessary details. (Digby Long. 6s.)

THE CYNIC AND THE SYREN.

BY J. W. MAYALL.

The Cynic was a young farmer who had "suffered badly at the hands of fickle beauty," and had foresworn woman at twenty-five. The Syren was a village coquette. The Cynic took Bank Top Farm, which adjoined that of the Syren's father. Need we say more? The cynicism of the Cynic is a little overdone. Even the misogynist of twenty-five does not remark, in the course of his first conversation with a charming girl, "I can believe anything of a woman. The Devil's in 'em." Letty was naturally indignant. But she had her revenge. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE THIN RED LINE OF HEROES.

BY MRS. FRED MATURIN.

A tale of the social side of army life, written as a journal by a lady who congratulates herself on having at last blossomed into "a real live Mrs. C.O." The regiment embarks for India. At Port Said, after a description of the canal and the desert, the writer remarks naively that "this high falutin' style is awfully difficult to keep up," an opinion with which we are disposed to agree. (Richards. 3s. 6d.)

The Pretty Manner.

THERE are several kinds of pretty writing—the sentimental pretty, the descriptive pretty, the naïve pretty—and the varieties and combinations of these are innumerable. In our day we have almost elevated prettiness into an art; grown men strive to achieve it with a labour which often results not in real prettiness, but in a rouged and bejewelled counterfeit. The moment prettiness becomes laboured, disillusion is on her heels; the freshness of her youth passes in a flash; she becomes a poseuse, and though we may endure her for minor virtues she must descend at last into the limbo of the artificial. Mr. Barrie generally, but by no means always, saves himself from shipwreck by his delicate sense of humour; that humour is his compass through shallows which would prove fatal to less sensitive craft. Stevenson, too, had pretty moments, but they were always well in hand, and, as it were, in the picture; the inappropriate epithet, the tears of the sentimentalist, were never his. Much, indeed, may be said for prettiness, but there comes a point when it induces a sort of mental nausea, when we feel ourselves to be unwilling victims of an artificial mood, wandering in a world where all proportion is lost and actuality no more than a wavering shadow.

Sentimental prettiness meets us upon the threshold of Mr. Alfred Ollivant's "Danny" (Murray), and pursues us relentlessly to the conclusion of the story. The book has other qualities; here and there we find almost strength, and here and there real pathos. But the strength is more vague and suggested than actual, and the pathos never has the sting of sudden tears. Everything is worked up to with an elaboration which at times offends and at times amuses us. We are always glad to meet dogs in fiction, and no doubt "Danny" was a dog of dogs. Indeed, Daniel, son of Ivor, who on a time came to Hepburn, which is north of the Solway, was, on Mr. Ollivant's showing, a very Lancelot of beasts. We have ourselves numbered amongst our most intimate friends dogs who need not have been ashamed to meet "Danny" in the street, but we should have hesitated to weave about them such a romance of gloom and tears. Mr. Ollivant's book is fuller of prettiness and weeping than any book which we have come across for months. But the tears, as we have indicated, do not spring from that absolute contact with the actual which gives the crown to pathos—rather, and that against our will, we are involved in a maze of lachrymosity which not infrequently bears the authentic brand of snivelling.

The story of "Danny" is simple, and may be indicated briefly. The dog—he is a Dandie Dinmont—is sent to the child-wife of the dour Laird of Hepburn and kept at first against the Laird's will. Then the young wife dies, and the dog remains, to grow at last into the only solace of the old man and his two ancient servants. In the village are two who hate the Laird and all his house—a widow and a half-idiot son. The Laird, years before, had killed accidentally the woman's husband, an accident most happy in its outcome for her, but wrought by an evil nature to bitter ends. "Danny" is hated by these two, and at last is half-drowned by the son; but he is rescued in time, and returns alive but utterly humbled. There follows his regeneration by the awakening of his old hunting instinct, which leads to a false accusation against him and the dog's death by—suicide. Such are the outlines of the story. Let us now turn to the treatment.

Of the young wife we read:—

The lady dabbed her eyes. Then she looked up. There was rain in her eyes, rain on her eyelashes, and her mouth a rainbow; and she began to talk in April showers.

The Woman tramped out. Hardly was the door shut, when Missie rose, arrayed as one about to walk the dewy lawns of Heaven, and stood listening.

Bending over him, she took his (Danny's) face between her hands; and he, dreaming dreams of slaughter and the chase, looked up and beheld her above him in long white raiment, with hair like the shadow of the glory to come veiling her.

Pretty? Yes, if you will, but of a prettiness quite on the wrong side of weakness. The first paragraph, we confess, makes us feel physically uncomfortable; its femininity is more than we can endure with patience. And what can be said of "the dewy lawns of Heaven"? Only, we think, that fiction can very well do without such meaningless phrases. Again, we may be sure that even the wonderful Danny when he "looked up" did not behold his mistress as Mr. Ollivant has described her. Mr. Ollivant is prolific of such passages as "with hair like a shadow of wrought gold"; which conveys as little as words may. Yet in the earlier chapters of the story there is a good deal of work which touches us, a suggestion of innocence and sweetness, delicately caught and delicately expressed. There is pathos in Missie's death and in Danny's faithfulness, but over all is the shadow of remoteness and the taint of a too luscious woe.

We find the same faults in Mr. Ollivant's descriptions of nature. The old servant Robin Crabbe goes searching for lost Danny:—

There was no sign of him he sought—only hope creeping out of the East over the land like the first faint flush of love rosyng Innocence; and the white mists drawing ever up from the face of the moors like the skirts of angel-hosts who rise from night-long watch in the dark places of the earth, and trail back to Heaven in the fair morning, there to fulfil their day-long duties as God's choristers.

That evening at the tender between-time when the day is gone, the night not yet come, and the gossamers swing across the evening like fairy tresses hung from star to star, there were three watchers on Lammer-more.

We had marked other passages for quotation, but these two will serve to indicate Mr. Ollivant's striving after prettiness. The first, we are sure, is of a kind to meet with wide appreciation, but to us it is entirely meretricious. And why should the angel hosts only fulfil "day-long duties as God's choristers"? The implication would be funny if Mr. Ollivant were not clearly in such deadly earnest. The second passage we need hardly criticise: gossamers swinging "across the evening like fairy tresses hung from star to star" is downright bad—there is no other word for it. Mr. Ollivant has a passion for stars, though happily he does not often introduce them with such entire inappropriateness.

To "Danny" himself, Mr. Ollivant's hero, the same strictures apply. "Danny" is overdone. Perfect he is not, but he is too near perfection even for a dog. And his affection for his mistress, the Laird, and the old serving man and woman is an affection surcharged with sentiment, and expressed from the author's point of view. Danny is for ever looking at his friends with "fond" eyes or "dear" eyes; he is a "tender gentleman in shining silver apparel," and the like, which again is too pretty, too sweet. "He could be patient as a cat, and as still; he could be stealthy as a fox; and when the stalking time was past, and the time for the onset come, he smote upon his enemies, overwhelming them like an avalanche of stars." It is beyond our imagination to conceive how a Dandie Dinmont can overwhelm his enemies "like an avalanche of stars," and it is equally beyond us to understand how the author could see the phrase in bare type without instantly striking it out. Perhaps Mr. Ollivant's most characteristic note is the heroic, expressed in terms of prettiness or pathos.

It seemed necessary to say so much concerning "Danny" because the book has already received some attention in its serial form, and in its present revised form is likely to receive still more. We are far from saying that the story does not deserve consideration; it does. We have dwelt upon what we conceive to be its serious defects, but it also has qualities of understanding, and even of beauty, which we willingly acknowledge. Yet it remains, when all is said, an example of the pretty manner, and against the pretty manner we have always made, and must continue to make, our protest. Let the pretty manner be assiduously cultivated, and at once true literature begins to suffer, at once proportion—the strong handmaiden of real art—is lost. The art of prettiness is the art of unessentials, and to-day unessentials crowd upon us in letters. There are times when it seems to us that we have declined upon an age of embroidery in literature as useless as that embroidery in another kind which stares at us, framed and glazed, from the walls of pious keepers of family relics.

And with this prettiness there usually goes a misrepresentation of the values of life. There, perhaps, lies the great danger. The vital issues are forgotten or overlaid, the real things of flesh and spirit, if they appear at all, are left, as it were, to whimper in a corner. That was not the way of the writers who moved through the world open-eyed, and gathered from its triumphs and failures, its useless sacrifices and noble follies, materials for the teaching which humanity for ever needs and to which it will always listen. The pity is that it is so often necessary to remind the world that it has the right to demand of literature something more than frippery and prettiness. Fortunately there are living writers who give it more, but what are these amongst so many of the other sort? The dignity of letters is a phrase which should still carry a sound meaning and a wholesome moral.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

ZOLA's last book "Vérité" comes to me this week with a deep black line round the yellow cover. However deplorable the man's sudden death, if we needed fresh proof, "Vérité" is conclusive evidence that letters lose nothing by the author's silence. It is a dreary, monster failure to build romance out of fact. Zola wished to tell the story of the most poignant and complicated of national blunders, and turns it on a squalid provincial crime that never could have interested anybody but the few concerned. Having no imagination, not a particle of the artist's temperament, no power of living, vivid, convincing characterisation, such a task as he attempted was best calculated to show us his limitations. In the "Anneau d'Amethyste" and "Monsieur Bergeret à Paris," M. Anatole France has, with a few inimitable strokes here and there, with beguiling ease and accomplished dexterity, gathered all the essential features and characters of the Affaire Dreyfus into fiction. But Zola, with all his laborious realism, has not even come near suggesting a remembrance of it. He surpasses even himself in dulness, prolixity, and overcrowded canvas, and it is sad to see such a passionate love of justice and humanity tarnished by such a bitter hate of those who teach and practise a religion he regards as the poison of life, the enemy of reason. Instead of contenting himself with attacking Rome and clericalism, it is individual Catholics he vindictively flagellates. He raves sheer nonsense when he assumes that all Catholic-bred Frenchwomen are hypocrites, sly, and immoral; that all priests and monks are monsters of cupidity, perfidy, and vice, and tumbles into hallucination when he again triumphantly depicts a regenerated France freed of the tyranny of Rome and priesthood; churches cleft by lightning, and priests without occupation. But his worst sin is the sordid mess he has made of the breathless drama we lived in for two years. Instead of the national crime that excited the whole world, we have an ignoble crime in an obscure province, an obscene attack and child murder by a Christian brother, for which a Jewish schoolmaster, the child's uncle, is condemned. A Christian brother was accused of such a crime some years ago in the north of France, which doubtless suggested the subject to Zola, but it is a sorry equivalent of the Affaire Dreyfus. Esterhazy, turned Christian brother, is an Esterhazy with all his ineffable characteristics left out, and Colonel Picquart, transformed into a village schoolmaster, is a Picquart without the salt of heroism. There is only one character in the book that has a slightly convincing air, and that is the rigid, implacable Madame Duparque, the grandmother of Marc's wife, an intractable Catholic who martyrisés everyone round her in the name of religion, and has a touch of the dreadful fanatical heroism of the Puritans and old-fashioned bigots.

The French are nothing if not serious, even in their frivolities. Here young men of genius are not content with killing time by writing prose or verse. They must found schools. Never mind if the new names express old ideas and older forms, since everything humanity can say or do has been said and done. The essential thing is to find the name and let the rest take care of itself. A few years ago M. Saint Georges de Bouhélier founded the school of naturism. He never did anything else, and nobody ever knew what naturism in literature meant. To-day M. Fernand Gregh founds the school of humanism, and the founder of naturism accuses him of plagiarism, while he in return accuses his accuser of having anticipated, if not stolen his ideas. Behold us advanced: humanism is naturism and naturism is humanism. But let us not demand a lucid explanation of either. M. Gregh is the victim of a first success. Since he published his charming volume of verse, "Maison de l'Enfance," which contained the famous "Menuet," as lovely as the loveliest lisp of Verlaine, he has done nothing of value. As well as humanism, there are three schools of poetry established within the last year. Nobody knows anything about them, except the few obscure geniuses who have founded them, and each school is usually represented by a solid society of two. To the sumptuary school may be said to be unofficially attached the poet Henri de Régnier, who offers us in his new volume of verse, "La Cité des Eaux," work that is both fine and polished. There is a mournful and sober beauty about some of these poems which recalls Alfred de Vigny. Such stately lines as:—

C'est un jour dont le soir a la beauté d'un songe,
L'air que l'on respire est pur en ces beaux lieux;
Et sous le doigt levé du Temps silencieux,
La lumière s'attarde et l'heure se prolonge—give the note of the still, distinguished melancholy which pervades the volume. The sonnets to Versailles, "La Cité des Eaux," are chill and lifeless, befitting the dead splendours they hymn. Their lapidary form makes them a suitable offering to the poet's father-in-law, the impeccable sonneteer, José Maria de Heredia. The "Bassin Rose" has an indescribable charm—

L'Echo muet dans l'ombre tend la main
Au Silence à genoux auprès de l'Amour mort, are unforgettable lines, and no less fine—

Et le Temps, qui survit à ce qu'il a été
Et se retrouve toujours tel qu'il s'est quitté, Fait l'eau trop anxieuse et les roses trop hautes.

"Le Sommeil," a beautiful poem, is pure de Vigny, with all the commanding resignation and haughty sadness of that most virile of pessimists. But it is not a mere echo, an imitation, it is the very voice and spirit of de Vigny. The rhythm is captivating, of a sober delicacy and sweetness. I would like to quote the whole, but content myself with the last verse:—

Non, ce laurier sans joie et ces fruits sans désir,
Et la vaine rumeur dont toute vie est faite,
Non, tout cela, c'était pour pouvoir mieux dormir.

Impressions.

XXI.—The Journey.

A BOOK-SHOP window arrested me: pushing my way through the traffic, I stopped to read the pages open flat against the glass. Through one pane I read: "June's nightingales for me. . . . Leaf cries to leaf: we change not, though you change." Through another, this: "We hear his voice and feel that he had already come to know what he afterwards compressed into a single poignant line—'All life is but a wandering to find home.'"

Then I moved aside to make way for a thin-lipped individual, who came out of the doorway with a book under his arm, while another voice, raucous but cajoling, further disturbed my reverie. I turned. It was the liveried conductor of the new electric service who spoke. He stood on the kerb, pointing to the smart motor-omnibus. "Now, ladies and gentlemen," he was saying, "who's for the country? Who's for the fir-woods where the nightingales sing?" The afternoon was my own. I stepped into the motor-omnibus, and seated myself opposite the thin-lipped individual, whose eyes were already fixed on the pages of his purchase.

The first hour of that ride from the heart of London was familiar, and but for the exhilaration of the rushing air might have been dull; but when we reached those parts where the old, outlying villages are being linked up by paved roads to the metropolis; where the line of jerry buildings is broken here by an old manor house, there by a thatched cottage crumbling between a new terrace and a new fire station, then the wonder of this unresting, clawing London got possession of me, and I looked to my companion, feeling the need of someone to share with me the sense of her intolerable vastness.

He raised his eyes, smiled quietly and said. "Do you know a poem of Emily Brontë's called 'Last Lines'? It has seven stanzas, and it begins: 'No coward soul is mine, No trembler in the world's storm-troubled sphere Mr. Haldane, the author of this book, says that it contains the teaching of Aristotle transferred from the abstract to the concrete. Curious how thought bridges the centuries—Aristotle to Emily Brontë.'"

The motor-omnibus stopped to take up two secular priests; one was fat, the other thin. Each fumbled in his pocket for his breviary, and with rapid movement of his lips, with eyes fixed on the thumbled page, each began to read his office. Neither they nor the thin-lipped man seemed to notice that at last London was becoming exhausted in her battle with the country, and that twilight was falling on the hedges. At the next stopping-place they all alighted. The conductor lit the big lamps of the motor-omnibus, and we rushed on along the illuminated road into the darkness beyond. Half-an-hour later the brand-new motor-omnibus broke down. After waiting patiently for some time I walked on, away from the sound of the hammering—on—till I found the fir-woods, but there were no nightingales singing.

I lost my way on a heath, wandered for two hours till I came to another wood, and through the trees a lighted window shone. "All life is but a wandering to find home," I muttered, "for me, as for Aristotle and Emily Brontë, the priest and the philosopher." Then I tapped at the window, and when I tapped the light moved and came towards me.

Drama.

Mr. Maugham's Irony.

MR. W. S. MAUGHAM has caught his feet in the net of irony. In "A Man of Honour," produced by the Stage Society at the Imperial Theatre, he has presented, with considerable insight and no sentimentality, an episode in the life of an idealist. Basil Kent is a barrister and a man of letters. He is full of high purposes and heroic illusions. He has volunteered to South Africa as a trooper, and has obtained a medal for distinguished service. At the beginning of the play he is in a considerable state of moral exaltation. He has seduced a girl, Jenny Bush, a barmaid, and a child is expected. Jenny is irretrievably common, and has a brother who is a bouncer of the first water. Basil does not love her—in fact he more than half loves Hilda Murray. But he has resolved to marry her. In reply to the remonstrances of his friend, John Halliwell, who urges the common-sense view of the matter, he takes lofty ground. It is his point of honour; and besides, the child must not slink into the world like a thief. Nothing can stir him from his determination. Unfortunately in marriage, it is not the first step which costs. The flush of Basil Kent's heroics fades away, and he is face to face with the daily problem of the life he has set himself. He makes but little effort to solve it. Practice at the bar and a villa at Putney do not afford many opportunities for the more picturesque virtues. To earn his living is irksome to him, and debts accumulate. The impossible brother-in-law pervades the house and borrows money. The baby dies. Jenny offends his fastidious taste in every action and every word. He takes refuge in sarcasm, a weapon which unliterary people do not understand, but do not the less resent. The brother-in-law endures the lash of Basil's tongue for the occasional pickings in the way of sovereigns and good cigars which the association yields; Jenny for the love she bears him. But she is not, on her side, able to control her temper or her speech, and the villa at Putney rings with recriminations. Meanwhile, Basil has not ceased to see, and even to philander with, Hilda Murray. Jenny, who opens his letters and follows him in the street, learns this and drives him to further distraction with her jealousy. He has given her no very serious cause for it until a day when, after a more bitter scene than usual at home, he takes refuge in Hilda's house, and declares his passion for her. Hilda is also something of a moral idealist. She repulses him, and adjures him to be faithful to his duty. Ultimately, however, she gives way. At that moment enters Jenny, who has forced her way into the house, looking more vulgar than ever, and violently upbraids the woman who has robbed her of her husband. Hilda is a little moved, leaves the room, and sends in a message to Basil announcing her intended marriage to Robert Brackley, a minor poet. Jenny has a glimpse of hope, and entreats Basil to "give her another chance," but he is merciless, tells her that he never loved and now has done with her, and departs without listening to her entreaties or her threats of suicide. Probably he knows well enough that a threat of suicide is a common form with women of the barnmaid type when they are crossed in love. Jenny, however, as a matter of fact, does commit suicide, walking the same night into the Thames. The final act shows us the idealist in the depths of remorse, crying out somewhat hysterically, but not wholly without truth, that he is his wife's murderer. The faithful John Halliwell does his best to comfort him and to point the obvious moral that you should not enter upon a path which is not that of ordinary men, unless you are quite sure that you have the strength to walk in it. He also undertakes the duty of buying off the obnoxious brother-in-law, who loudly expresses his intention of getting his knife into Basil at the inquest. Then Mr. Maugham allows his irony full swing. Before long Basil confesses that after all, instead of passing, as even the housemaid had done, a sleepless night, with his wife lying dead in the next room, he had managed to drop into a doze upon the sofa; and further that, even in the midst of his grief, he is conscious, shamefully conscious, at the back of his mind, of nothing so much as an immense sense of freedom. Somewhat Ibsenitishly, he jumps up, pulls the blind, and lets a flood of morning light stream in through the window. It also emerges that he has already telegraphed to Hilda Murray, and presently Hilda enters, dressed with extreme propriety in black, and full of condolences with her "poor friend." Her appearance almost precisely coincides with that of the coroner's officer.

Mr. Maugham's play is certainly not impeccable. There are passages which drag. The ironical intention might perhaps have been made more manifest from the beginning; and I think that the introduction of the brother-in-law, who after all is mainly of the nature of comic relief, in the middle of the stress of the last act, was an error of judgment. But it is good honest work, well written, well constructed, and with a point of view of its own; and the Stage Society may fairly claim the production of it as a feather in their cap. Of course, as my acute colleagues of the daily press have not been slow to remark, it is very probable that, for all its merits, it would not be altogether a success upon the commercial stage. As one of them very properly points out, that unfortunate last act almost wholly destroys the respect of the audience for the hero. It must be admitted, I am afraid, that the London playgoer dislikes irony, if possible, even more than he dislikes tragedy. But a few unimportant alterations would doubtless enable Mr. Maugham to recast his conception into a form which would be more acceptable to the general public. Actors of more established reputation, although they would hardly give a more competent interpretation than that which I saw on Monday, would naturally prove attractive. Stress might be laid on the comic relief, and Brackley, the minor poet, might become, as one critic suggests that he ought to have been, the leading feature of the performance. And of course a more sympathetic ending is essential. I imagine it running something like this. Jenny Kent is carried streaming from the Thames and laid on the sofa. Basil, in floods of tears, realises too late that she has been his only love and that he has lost her. Suddenly she stirs, sighs, opens her eyes. Restoratives are applied. Slowly she comes back to life. Basil is kneeling by her side. There are embraces, pardons, protestations. Jenny will not be vulgar any more, nor Basil critical. Hilda Murray may go and marry her Brackley. And so the curtain falls upon a Putney villa turned into an Earthly Paradise. Once more the British public streams out into Charing Cross Road or the Strand, with the generous tear upon the satisfied cheek. I hope that Mr. Maugham will take advantage of my hints. They are not copyright. He will doubtless get his reward in royalties. But I do not feel so sure that he will himself care to witness a representation of "A Man of Pioneer Painters.

"So you've not been working to-day," I said to the painter.

He stirred the litter of magazines and books on the table. "No, I've been reading about other workers; that always disturbs and deters me. I'm rather a coward. It began with a passage I chanced upon in a magazine, this: 'Beauty touched with strangeness.' That, I said to myself, is what painting should be—'Beauty touched with strangeness.' And that's just what my pictures have not. I realised it with hideous clearness this morning—couldn't do another stroke of work. Nervous, irritable, I picked up a book and tried to read. The volume nearest my hand was Zola's 'Truth.' I couldn't make any way with it, but I wanted to be just to the man, so I tried another Zola—an old friend, 'L'Oeuvre,' and that set me thinking about the pioneers in painting, the men who've been themselves for better or worse, and suffered. I recalled the first time I went to that bewildering little room at the Luxembourg where they've crowded the Caillebotte collection of French Impressionists. What a white-stone day that was. I was fresh from London, where I had been labouring on a picture called 'The Convalescent'—you know the kind of thing—pale girl, crimson shawl, porch, honeysuckle, mother in background, anxious lover watching, dull light from anywhere and everywhere, and all so brown and black. When I strolled into that little room at the Luxembourg I realised in a flash that these men had painted sunlight, not sentiments, what they had seen, not what they had idly imagined. What a sorry, shoddy thing my 'Convalescent' seemed. I painted the background in Surrey, the girl in my studio from a model, and the mother and lover just grew. Then these sparkling Frenchmen jumped out at me. Manet I knew, and the last picture I looked at that day was Fantin-Latour's 'Homage à Manet,' where the painter sits before his easel surrounded by his friends and followers—Monet, Renoir, Zola, and the rest. What a revelation that little room was. How that dogma of Manet's has since sounded in my head: 'The principal person in a picture is the light.' I'm older now, and the Impressionists have dropped into their pigeon-holes of my experience. 'Beauty touched with strangeness' is my present ideal, and yet when I think of Manet's 'Bar at The Folies-Bergère' I know that I could swing back into a grovelling admiration for that—barnmaid, beer bottles and all. It was Manet who said, 'Each time I paint I throw myself into the water to learn swimming.' Strong soul!"

"Who was Caillebotte?" I asked.

"He was a painter, and the patron of the Impressionists of his day. His fine picture, 'Les Raboteurs de Parquets,' a study of oblique perspective, aroused the derision of the Philistine, and his bequest of his collection of Impressionist pictures to the State disturbed the Professors at the 'Ecole des Beaux-Arts' almost to the point of resignation. The Government, however, showed uncommon tact, and the collection was accepted and hung. It's by no means complete, or representative of the movement, for Impressionism has run into many bye-paths since Caillebotte's day, but it serves for the present. You want me to define Impressionism? Some time ago when such pictures were unpopular, unrecognised, and unbought, a humble wit described an Impressionist painter as one who had a private income.

"I doubt if many know the origin of the term. It dates back to 1863 when the Salon jury rejected all the pictures by Manet and his friends. The Emperor intervened, and ordered that these novelties should be hung in a special room, which was called the 'Salon des Refusés.' One of the pictures was a sunset by Monet, called 'Impressions.'

From that day these painter-pioneers were called Impressionists. They are anti-intellectual, indifferent to, and unmoved by symbolism, psychology, or literary motive. Immediate vision is their sole concern. They hold that no colour exists by itself; that colour varies with the intensity of light; that shadow is not absence of light, but light of a different value; that the strict Impressionist should paint with only the seven colours of the spectrum; that touches of those seven pure colours should be placed upon the canvas juxtaposed, so that at a distance the individual rays of these colours shall blend and act like sunlight upon the eye."

"You are strangely learned on the subject," I remarked.

He smiled. "No, not learned, accretive. I have just been reading a little book, quite a remarkable little book for its size, on 'The French Impressionists.' It is No. 6 in Messrs. Duckworth's 'Popular Library of Art,' and has been translated from the French of M. Camille Maclair. The author holds a brief for the Impressionists, and an impressionable man like myself must read him with a steady head. He is an enthusiastic partisan of those bright rebels who pricked and punched the French Academic body from 1860 to 1900. Since then M. Maclair opines that they have come into their own, which means selling. But he knows his subject, and he has also had the great advantage of M. Durand-Ruel's permission to reproduce in this little green book no fewer than forty-nine of their pictures. Of course, you miss the sunlight and colour, but it's an immensely interesting pictorial record. What pictures, what visions, what effort the chapter headings call up! Manet, Degas, Monet, Renoir, Pissaro, Sisley, Caillebotte, the illustrators Lautrec and Forain, and finally the eager, facile Neo-Impressionists and Pointillists, and the scramble of third-raters, the young men in a hurry, the sedulous, brainless apes who have learnt the trick and little else. You can hardly go into a Continental gallery to-day but you are offended by some barbarity of shrill sunshine and false colour.

"But the great souls of the movement, Manet, the innovator, the man of tireless industry, the bold and frank Manet, the fighter who tried his hand at everything, and died—fagh! I quote: 'Manet died, exhausted by his work and struggles, of locomotor ataxy, after having vainly undergone the amputation of a foot to avoid gangrene.' Who was it said, 'Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold'? To proceed: how well I remember seeing Manet's 'Execution of Maximilian' at the first International Art Exhibition at Knightsbridge. In that picture, I am well aware, he was not the strict Impressionist, but how real it is, how quiet, how arresting, and how intensely pictorial.

"Degas troubles and captivates me. Is there anything more alien to beauty than the costume and posturing of a ballet girl? Yet I would sooner have hanging on the walls of this studio one of his ballet-girl pastels than anything I can call to mind. I suppose it's because he's such a consummate draughtsman. He's got the disease of truth, as somebody said, and I suppose when a man like Degas has those germs in him, he persuades you, even against your will, that what Keats said about beauty and truth was right. You remember the near woman in his pastel of 'The Greek Dance.' She's hideous, and she and her two companions are pirouetting on their toes—ugly attitude. But what a lovely picture it is: the trunks and the fuzzy branches of the trees imitate, as it were, the lines of the girls' upraised arms. Gesture and light—those are the terms in which I think of that picture.

"And Monet! Consider my machine-made 'Convalescent,' and then think of Monet and the hayricks, the poplars, and the water-lilies. He, more than any man, has made light the persons of his pictures. I see him starting off at sunrise in a carriage with twenty canvases. He seats himself before a hayrick, studies its effect under the early morning light, and paints. So through the long day: to each hour its light, and he the recorder of the shining procession of the hours. He exhibits the pictures together, and you can follow the magical transformation of a hayrick from sunrise to sunset. Seventeen studies of the towers of Rouen Cathedral he made, and each is a new version of the worn and blackened stone. And his slim poplar trees. I see them in dreams.

"Here is a good saying of M. Maclair's: 'If Manet is the realist-romanticist of Impressionism, if Degas is its psychologist, Claude Monet is its lyrical pantheist.' Of Renoir, Sisley, and Pissaro I cannot say anything now. Seurat and Signac, with their theories of scientific cromatism, are a little beyond me. I prefer the man with the strong purpose to the experimentalist, but they are all for light, and that counts—that counts. The Impressionists have fought well in a good cause—for the right of personal vision, and for the honour and glory of the sun. France may well be proud of her children, these pioneer-painters. They have profoundly influenced French Art."

"Have you heard," I remarked, "that one of the important pictures at the next Salon will be a group of twenty-thousand, or is it thirty-thousand, Mayors?"

The Destiny of the Horse.

CARLYLE was struck by the pathos of the horse's foot, with its five toes "glued together." But the primaevae horse submitted to no such process. He was a typical vertebrate, having ten fingers and ten toes. Upon these he walked in the American continent long ago; not upon his palms and soles. He is, therefore, styled digitigrade, not plantigrade. Complete skeletons of him, at this earliest stage, were found in the early Eocene deposits at Wasatch in North America. The fossil form, named Phenacodus, had been already unearthed. But, as the ages passed, the horse found that it was more to his purpose to let some of his fingers and toes go; he was content for some time with four instead of five, then with three. It is at this stage that the European evidence begins. In the early Miocene deposits a three-toed horse is found. In the later Miocene a further stage is reached; only the middle finger and toe touch the ground, whilst the lateral fingers and toes are becoming shorter and shorter. The four-toed was only a short stage in descent. The horse belongs to the odd-toed section of the hoofed or ungulate mammals. The even-toed, or those of the "cloven hoof," have another pedigree. In the horse of to-day and many past days, the middle fingers and toes alone remain. His knee is the homologue of man's wrist; his "cannon-bone" answers to the middle bone of the palm of the human hand; the "pastern," "coronary," and "coffin" bones answer to the three bones of the middle finger; and the hoof is its nail. The "splint bones" represent our second and fourth fingers, and some small bony prominences at the bases of these correspond with our thumb and fifth finger. The case is similar with the hind legs. The modern horse, therefore, walks upon the tips of the nails of his middle and only remaining fingers and toes. In an American museum you may see the entire series without a break, from the five-toed horse to the horse of to-day, nor is it possible to say, so complete is the series, that at any particular point a line of demarcation may be drawn. There is not a gap in the slow history of the horse's descent. The extreme significance of all this is that, nearly thirty years ago, it demonstrated for the first time the fact of evolution of an extant species, and the direct line of descent of an existing animal. The tale is complete that links the one-toed genus Equus of to-day with a five-toed ancestor which was common to it, to the tapir, to the rhinoceros and to other hoofed quadrupeds.

For many generations the horse, as we know him, has been the friend and servant of man. Four thousand years ago, or thereabouts, the Hebrew poet Job sang his praises: "hast thou clothed his neck with thunder"; long afterwards the inventor who wrote the first page of the last chapter but one in the horse's history, exaggerated his powers for his own ends and made the unit, the "horse-power," just one and a half times as much as it should have been. Slowly the steam-engine has developed and been followed by petrol and electricity and underground cables, until a Royal Commission sits upon London locomotion. Soon the dust of our streets, in which blows the deadly plant—the tubercle bacillus—that slays one in six or seven of mankind, will be freed of the far less objectionable element due to the horse. Meanwhile horse-hair has become invaluable in surgery, and the horse's blood invaluable in medicine. Soon the wretched bus-horse will be unknown. For the astonishingly complex and incomprehensibly rapid chemical changes which occur when a muscle contracts—changes in motor nerve-cells in the brain and in the nerves leading therefrom; in the motor nerve-cells of the spinal cord and the nerves leading, in their turn, from them to the muscle-cells, and in those contractile muscle-cells themselves—for all these we shall have, everywhere, a column of steam or a dead dynamo. The horse's muscles are long ago superseded; for man's purposes, that is to say. But he has within him a living laboratory which no dead forces can emulate. Observe the horse of to-morrow, when his powers are really understood, when his ultimate and unique possibilities are realized. Freed from mere muscular toil, cared for as by the Arab of the desert, splendidly housed, liberally and regularly fed, he will be used for an end worthy of his ancient lineage, his beauty and his countless virtues. He will be made—he has already been made—to bear our children's diseases for them. The vicarious burden is nothing upon his noble shoulders. It is the easiest, as it is incomparably the most wonderful and the most valuable service that the horse has ever rendered to man. It is a worthy acme to the long climax of his history; even though that includes the furnishing of the final proof of the theory of organic evolution.

Cultivate from some unfortunate child's throat a colony of the bacilli of diphtheria (the Klebs-Loeffler bacillus). These inject through a hollow needle under the horse's skin. The bacilli are a bagatelle to him. His body-cells, easily and without any hurt, produce an antitoxin against the toxin or poison which the bacilli form. The same process is going on in a child's throat somewhere else, but the antitoxin is insufficient, the bacilli are winning, the child is dying. Open a vein, one of those beautiful sinuous veins on the horse's leg, remove a few drops of blood containing the antitoxin, inject them under the skin of, say, the wrist of the choking child: in a few hours it draws the grateful breath of convalescence. This is going on all over the world at this hour. The whole process costs the horse nothing. He will not deign to turn his head or stop champing his hay during your pin-pricks, and he leads a princely life for his trouble. The antitoxin he supplies has revolutionized the whole aspect of diphtheria. The death-rate has fallen twenty, fifty, sometimes ninety-five per cent. The result of a case of diphtheria depends almost entirely on the earliness of use of the antitoxin. Used on the first day it is practically infallible. The doctor need not calculate the dose in proportion to the age, or rather the weight, of the child. He is dosing the bacilli, not the patient. So he gives the same dose to every case. Tracheotomy is so rarely necessary that the doctors are almost forgetting how to perform it. The horse has already rescued thousands of children, all the world over, since Prof. Roux, of Paris, invoked his aid—achieved his destiny.

I ask whether this is not a worthy reward for his centuries of labour in our behalf; for the myriad brutal blows; for the knacker's yard; for the rude omnibus, the cavalry-charge, and the race-course: that such work should be relegated to inanimate machines—machines which man can make with his own hands, and that the horse should lead a life of useful and honoured luxury, whilst the exquisitely subtle and inimitable chemistry of his living cells should save our children's lives?

The Cuchullin Saga.

SIR,—In his brilliant and sympathetic eulogium of Miss Hull's "Cuchullin Saga," Mr. Edward Garnett pleaded for a completer presentment in English of the great cycle of which Cuchullinn is the central figure. "Let Mr. Nutt see to it," he said. Alas! how Mr. Nutt wishes he could see to it. But willingness, however great, is conditioned by facts, and it is a melancholy fact that in this, the richest Empire of the World, money cannot be counted upon for the support of scholarship, and that in these islands, the home of the vast majority of the Celtic race, the original home and developing ground of the only Celtic literature that counts in the culture-history of mankind, Celtic scholarship can only flourish if subsidised. If even at this eleventh hour the public would bestow a more generous support upon Miss Hull's labours, she and I would gladly face the risks and sacrifices necessary to present the fruit of those labours in a more perfect form. In default of the book-buying public, it is unfortunately the case in this country that no source exists to which the scholar can appeal for support.

It is not so in other countries. Let me cite the instance of France. For upwards of thirty years France has been, thanks to the existence of the "Revue Celtique," the centre of Celtic studies. Now the French Government has for years subsidised the "Revue Celtique" to the extent of some £40 a year. This year, I understand, in deference to the stringent demand for economy which has affected all departments of the national budget, the subsidy has been reduced to £30. £40 a year! a pittance it will be said. Quite so; my point is that an annual pittance, infinitely less in amount than many a wealthy man pays for an evening's gratification, may suffice to keep alive a publication of the utmost value the influence of which upon a most important branch of human knowledge has been beneficial in the last degree, and yet that in this wealthy country, this home of Celtdom, such a pittance cannot be counted upon. Four years ago, largely owing to the fact that the "Revue Celtique" could not expand its space to keep pace with the increasing output of Celtic research, a subsidiary Celtic review was started. In this country? Oh, dear no! In Germany. Yet most of the matter is supplied by scholars living in this country, and next to the Celtic languages the contents of the "Zeitschrift für Celtische Philologie" are mainly in English. It is, I fear, safe to say that an application made to the Lord Lieutenant or the Secretary of State for Ireland for a subsidy enabling this review to be produced in England would have been negatived—regretfully and sympathetically by Mr. Wyndham, but negatived none the less.

In default of Governmental subsidy other countries can rely upon a well-organised system of academic and library support for scholarly research. If you think the matter of sufficient importance I will return to it next week and show

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 179 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best letter to the Editor on any Current Literary Topic. Twenty-one replies have been received. We award the prize to Mr. M. I. Ebbutt, Lampeter, for the following:—

EARLY IRISH SAGAS.

I should like to echo Mr. Garnett's plea for an unperverted translation of the early Irish Sagas. There exists, in the pagan literature of Ireland, a body of evidence as to the life, religion, history, and customs of the unchristianized Celt, of the utmost value to historian, ethnologist, and folklorist. No literature of equal antiquity exists in Europe, but the Homeric poems, and an adequate translation of Irish Sagas, literally faithful and unchanged in tone, might give us even better grounds than we now possess for adopting Professor Ridgeway's ingenious hypothesis that the Homeric Greeks were an invading race of Celts. To prove this, however, we need a cumulative weight of reliable evidence, and this will never be satisfactorily obtained if translators are at liberty to embellish, or omit, at their own will.

The ethnologist will try to discover the origin of many curious customs of to-day in the earliest records of European Aryan nations, and will find traces of totemism, tabu, exogamy, and other pre-Aryan customs—he will wish to identify Celtic gods with Greek or Roman, and trace the growth of Celtic influence—but how can he do it in security, when the translator may wilfully falsify the whole tone of the work on which he relies? The real lover of human nature, too, will rather see life as it was then, in all its crude bloodthirstiness and heroic chivalry, than be shown a refined and idealised twentieth-century version of third century life and humanity.

On all the grounds, we beg for faithful translations.

Other replies follow:—

DRAMATIC CRITICISM.

The three lectures recently delivered by Mr. A. B. Walkley at the Royal Institution will, I devoutly trust, have a wholesome effect upon many persons. It would be too much to hope that the lectures themselves as delivered will ever reach the multitude, but their logic and outlook and taste ought to so influence the hundred or two writers of dramatic stuff that finally—as the sun reaches London, let me say—these lectures should arrive and wake the slumbering senses of all those who glance at "stage echoes" and "green room gossip" in the scores of different publications.

One knows, of course, that the technique and literary form of dramatic criticism must be mainly determined by the capacity of the audience for whom the criticism is intended, yet a judgment without bias, without influence and prejudice, a verdict without any sacrifice to fad, would be much in these days.

I have often thought that the professional dramatic critic should have always upon his table when writing for the press a big card upon which in bold print should be this message: "Recollect that you are writing for those who have seen the performance in question as well as for those who have not. Let neither your swift damnation nor your easy praise run loose unless you can give reasons as plain as the nose upon your face."

[C. C., London.]

A MISCARRIAGE OF LITERARY JUSTICE.

May I suggest that, in defending the English language from the invasion of verbal aliens, our literary critics should beware of whipping forth the honourable citizen along with the intruding knave. In Mr. John Murray's letter to the "Spectator," commented on in your last issue, "hushed," "hoarsed," and other ill-deserving rascals are justly pilloried. But among them, his fine quality showing all the clearer for his evil company, stands our old friend "shrilled." The ACADEMY rescues "tip-toed" from condemnation, leaving "shrilled" unsuccessful. What is the reason that they use him thus? Poor "shrilled," beloved of poets from Spenser to Tennyson; proudly placed by Johnson and his successors at the head of a brilliant retinue of quotations, any one of them ready to plead trumpet-tongued on his behalf:—

"Break we our pipes that shrilled as loud as lark."—Spenser.

"How poor Andromache shrills her dolours forth."—Shakespeare.

"No sound is heard but of the shrilling cock."—Goldsmith.

"The shattering trumpet shrilleth high."—Tennyson.

Shall we forget the lily-maid "shrilling," "Let me die!" in the fiery dawn? Indeed, Tennyson calls in the aid of this good word no less than nine times. Literary justice surely demands that some amends be made to "shrilled" for this attempt to bring him into bad repute.

"Parroted" is another injured innocent. Though not of such high degree as "shrilled," he is an honest, homespun citizen, with dictionary authority to back him; he should not be left helpless in the pillory.

ENTITLED

DAVID AND BATHSHUA.

FIRST REVIEW.

The Liverpool Post in the course of a long notice on the day of publication says:—"The passionate intensity of the central scene is portrayed with a vividness of effect, an appreciation of the subtleties of blank verse, and an insight into the potentialities of human nature . . . the whole spirit of the stanza breathes the fire of King David's passion. . . . But we find that Mr. Wynne, in the exquisite lament of Bathshua over her dead child, gives us one of the sweetest lyrics he has yet produced. . . . It is a delicate touch, but the book is full of such insight. Indeed, throughout the drama the characterisation is far more skilfully portrayed and more definitely realised than is usual, save on the part of the few poetic dramatists. The whole work is so beautifully written and conceived . . .

FALLACIES IN PRESENT DAY THOUGHT. By J. P. SANDLANDS, M.A., T.C.D., Author of "Natural Food," "Sanitation, Public and Personal," &c.

The object of this book is to take some of the prominent thoughts and theories that now occupy men's minds, and show wherein many of them are erroneous. It deals fairly and honestly with these things in plain and simple language, as so many of these thoughts and theories are shrouded, if not in mystic jargon, in language, nevertheless, that is "not understood of the people." The author, therefore, sets them in their proper light, and thus exposes what is fallacious in them. The subjects with which he deals are those of everyday life.

The Literary Week.

THE publications of the week have not been important: more books about Shakespeare, Lives of Bret Harte and George Douglas Brown, a popular work on Hegel and Hegelianism, and the usual abundance of novels, including Mrs. Humphry Ward's new book, "Lady Rose's Daughter," which was issued serially in Harper's magazine. Short stories may or may not be popular, but authors continue to produce them. Mr. Henry James has published a volume containing eleven under the title "The Better Sort"; Mr. Israel Zangwill a volume containing eight, called "The Grey Wig," and Mr. A. C. Benson a volume containing twelve, under the title "The Hill of Trouble." Among the other publications of the week we note the following:—

LIFE OF RICHARD WAGNER. Vol. III. Translated by W. Ashton Ellis.

Covering the years 1849 to 1852-3, of which period Mr. Ellis writes: "Were the whole body of Wagnerian documents destroyed save those relating to the years 1849 to 1852-3, from them alone we might reconstitute the import of his life. For this period, so rich in psychologic and æsthetic interest, so amply illuminated by authentic records, many of them accessible only in quite recent days, I have therefore allowed myself the luxury of an unstinting hand. This "unstinting hand" has resulted in the expansion of Herr Glasenapp's original hundred pages into the five hundred contained in this volume.

THE TALE OF A TOUR IN MACEDONIA. By G. F. Abbott.

Mr. Abbott went to Macedonia under the auspices of the University of Cambridge to study the folk-lore of that country. The results of those researches will be published later in a special work. The present volume deals with the author's experiences of men, women, and Government officials. His aim, he tells us, "has been merely to describe things as they presented themselves to his own eyes, without favour and without fear." The volume has particular interest at the present time.

THE LIFE OF BRET HARTE. By T. Edgar Pemberton.

The first three chapters are headed, "Boyhood: 'Floundering';" "First Flights: 'Struggling';" "In Life's Stream: 'Swimming.'" Mr. Pemberton has collected much interesting material concerning both the early and later years of Bret Harte's life, and has presented it clearly and appreciatively. The letters of Bret Harte to various correspondents are just such letters as we should have expected from the author of "The Outcasts of Poker Flat"; they are kindly, human, and often full of boyish fun.

WE have to record, with deep regret, the death of Mr. John Henry Shorthouse. Mr. Shorthouse's name stands high in the literary annals of our time. He was always an absolutely sincere worker, and cared nothing for the popularity which may be attained by almost any man who chooses to make capital out of a first success. "John Inglesant," perhaps, was never a popular book in the ordinary sense, but it was a book which left its mark; its spiritual quality had an appeal that was bound to touch such readers as took into serious account the eternal conflict between the spirit and the flesh. Mr. Shorthouse was an artist whose lapses were part of his quality; but what his work lost in art was often gain in strength. "The Little Schoolmaster Mark" was, in some respects, an artistic failure; yet it lives in the memory with something of the insistent recurrence of music. "The Countess Eve" was a story slight, indeed, but full of the emotional and spiritual suggestion of which Mr. Shorthouse was a master. In that delicate suggestive faculty he approached Nathaniel Hawthorne more nearly than any writer whom we can recall. The greater part of his working life was spent in business; he gave to literature only of his intellectual best. Of the real value of that best we can say nothing more here. There are no doubt many readers to-day to whom Mr. Shorthouse's name is almost unknown; reputation crowds out reputation, and the strong, still man is lost sight of. But when many names now more prominent have been forgotten, the name of John Henry Shorthouse will be remembered and loved.

THE little birthplace of Shakespeare in Henley Street, Stratford-on-Avon, stands now cheek to cheek with two gabled and timbered houses of which the age is disputed, but the proportions and appropriateness are obviously right. And even as to their age, the Mayor of Stratford owns that a stable of Shakespearean antiquity was built into one of the little houses. They are condemned to the pick-axe, and their place is to be taken by a new free library, to be built by the munificence of Mr. Carnegie. Our national enthusiasm for free libraries has sensibly cooled of late; but even granting that the library in question is a boon to Stratford, and nothing but a boon, the building should surely not be set up, tall, new, and altogether different as it must needs be, on the ground near to the small house of Shakespeare, ground so fitly occupied now by the doomed cottages.

THE attempt to stop demolitions has generally proved futile. Streets in Chelsea have had to go; Kensington High Street has had to go; there has been short work made of Westminster. Whether for utility, or on the plea of "opening out a view," the last strong old wall, the last gable in London, will fall. But there is only one Henley Street, and surely a unique "artificial" interference with the laws of change might be hazarded in that one little plot of English earth. A few feet only are in question. Miss Marie Corelli, Lady Colin Campbell, and Miss Ellen Terry have made an appeal in the press, metropolitan and provincial; Miss Terry suggests that the library can be comfortably lodged in certain houses now standing. And surely there are men also who care. It is proposed to make a general literary protest. Mr. Carnegie and the Mayor are for the demolition and the new building, and a great majority of the people of the town are said to be against it. It is much to be wished that all the authors, say, taking part in the new Harvard Shakespeare, might lend their voices in protest; for Mr. Swinburne is one of them, and he speaks loud.

A CONTRIBUTOR to "Notes and Queries" has been writing on the subject of "Accuracy of Quotation." He pleads, of course, for correctness, though the examples of incorrectness which he quotes are rather uninteresting and unimportant. The writer proceeds:—

There are persons unprincipled enough to perpetrate a sin which, for want of a better term, we might call the reverse of plagiarism. It consists in putting forward as a quotation their own words, thinking, perhaps, that this plan gives them more weight, but never thinking of the useless trouble that may be given to those industrious searchers after truth who try to trace quotations to their origin.

Such trouble is, even when the quotation is genuine, often useless enough. There comes a point when annotation develops into utter boredom, and for the annotating bore we have no sympathy. We suspect that the sham quotation has sometimes been employed for the express purpose of misleading the barren annotator at whose hands we have all suffered too much.

THE "Monthly Review" prints, under the not very happy title of "A Morning's Work in a Hampstead Garden," an article by Mr. Sidney Colvin concerning Keats's Nightingale Ode. The autograph draft of the poem was given by Keats to his friend John Hamilton Reynolds; then it passed to Reynolds's sister, and through her to her two sons, Charles and Townley Green. The manuscript came up for sale at Sotheby's not very long ago, and was bought by the Earl of Crewe "at no extravagant price." The document is reproduced in facsimile in the "Monthly Review," and Mr. Colvin says concerning it, "that we have in it Keats's true and original draft of the poem is certain." On which hypothesis he proceeds to point out certain trifling inaccuracies in Charles Brown's record of how and when the ode was written. But we fail to see how Mr. Colvin arrives at his certainty. The manuscript reproduced, so far as its own evidence goes, might very well be a second or third draft. Brown said that the ode was first written on "four or five" scraps of paper; the manuscript in question covers only two half-sheets of notepapers. In absence of further evidence we should be inclined to assume that Brown was right, and that Mr. Colvin's assumption as to this being a first draft, wrong. The matter is of no great importance, but it suggests the necessity of caution in such inquiries. The emendations and cancellings in the draft are of great interest, but for these readers must go to Mr. Colvin's article.

THE statistical problem of the last few days for one of our contemporaries has been the working out of the cable cost of Mr. Kipling's poem, "The Settler," in the "Times." Certain other papers have been telling Mr. Kipling that he ought to leave politics alone, and Mr. Christie Murray in his turn has been telling the gentlemen who express this view that they are "ladling out the waters of a muddled ignorance." As a matter of fact the poem contains no politics; it is wise and sane on the broad question of the future. We quote the two last stanzas:—

Bless then, our God, the new-yoked plough, and the good beasts that draw,
And the bread we eat in the sweat of our brow according to thy law:
After us cometh a multitude — prosper the work of our hands
That we may feed with our land's food the folk of all our lands!
Here in the waves and the troughs of the plains where the healing stillness lies,
And the vast benignant sky restrains, and the long days make wise—
Bless to our use the rain and the sun and the blind seed in its bed,
That we may repair the wrong that was done to the living and the dead!

THE "School World" prints an article on the "Systematic Study of Shakespeare in Schools." The writer pleads for Shakespeare study in ordinary secondary schools as well as in the upper forms, and she indicates the lines on which she considers such studies should be pursued. For ourselves, we consider Shakespeare peculiarly unsuited for ordinary school study; he presents difficulties which the young mind may, indeed, overcome, but usually at the expense of real appreciation. Let Charles and Mary Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare" be used, by all means, and let the child read the plays if he wants to read them. But we believe it, in many cases, to be a mistake to make the study of great literature into a kind of task-work.

THERE appeared in the "Times" of Tuesday the following paragraph under the heading "Garrick Theatre": "At the first performance of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's new play at this theatre, last night, our dramatic critic was refused admission." Enterprising journalists at once saw the possibilities of a pretty quarrel, and Mr. Bouchier was interviewed. Then it appeared that Mr. Jones had been deeply offended by certain criticisms of his plays which Mr. Walkley had written for the "Times," criticisms which, said Mr. Jones, "have degenerated into personalities and hints that scarcely stop on the safe side of libel." Mr. Bouchier read the offending notices, and agreed with Mr. Jones, whereupon he wrote to the editor of the "Times," requesting that another critic should be sent to judge of the merits of "Whitewashing Julia." The editor of the "Times," however, took no notice of this communication; Mr. Walkley presented himself at the theatre, and was refused admission in the capacity of what Mr. Bouchier foolishly calls "dramatic reporter." The case as it stands seems to suggest that Mr. Jones is unnecessarily sensitive to criticism and that Mr. Walkley is rather unenterprising. Was there no seat to be bought in the house, no corner of pit or gallery, that Mr. Walkley should have deprived the readers of the "Times" of his illuminating comments on "Whitewashing Julia"? Any man who pays his money is at liberty to criticise a play as much as he likes, in print or out of it. The position of the editor of the "Times" was, of course, perfectly clear; a paper is not to be dictated to as to the critic whom it chooses to select. We seem to be approaching a time when the managers of theatres will exclude all those dramatic critics who have shown that it is their habit to express honest and independent opinions.

THE writer who is responsible for the Collects, to which we have referred before, in the Philadelphia "Conservator," continues to pour forth his five-column staccato utterances. The latest begins thus:—

Toilers and talkers. How much of you is toil and how much of you is talk? How much of you is simply lip and how much is simple deed? You go about the earth filling your days. But filling them with what? A thousand men may talk a thousand years and their world may still be void. The professional embalmers may deaden the social life in a sepulcher of words. Words. The beggar at the street corner may shame ten generations of talkers. For though the beggar only begs he does fulfil a primary law of life. But the talkers talk and talk destroys. Where have you taken your station? With the good dressers or the perfect chatterers? Do you like the people with clean hands and clean language who spend life between the pages of dictionaries and blue books? You like soft phrases. You like to take account of all the refinements. You think that a man who can speak in perfect English must have perfect morals. Your shrine is talk.

It is clear that this gentleman has no sense of humour.

THE "Letters to a Literary Aspirant" are continued in the current "Blackwood." The engaging uncle who advises his nephew deals with various forms of fiction, including the realistic:—

Realism attends to the ash-buckets, the smell of the fried-eel reservoirs, the bottle-nosed loafer propped against the wall.

And what would stick in your memory when you came in? Surely the two or three unexpected encounters, the incident that was a little different from other incidents.

Realism remembers the number of the lamp-posts passed, the pattern of the pavement flags, the specks of the everyday dust floating in the air.

And it is this that realism calls a picture of life. Hence the necessity for a special course of preparation before handling its delicate tools. The reiteration of the unimportant and the obliteration of the picturesque are the two aims you must keep steadily before your eye.

It all depends, of course, upon what is meant by realism. But "the reiteration of the unimportant and the obliteration of the picturesque" hits off skilfully certain forms of pseudo-realism. The word has come to have a narrow and arbitrary meaning for which it is rather difficult to account. There is a realism of beauty as well as of ugliness.

FROM "The Point of View" in "Scribner's Magazine" we extract the following:—

I heard the question brought up, the other day: "Why is it that a description of a painting, couched in terms of music, or of a musical composition, couched in visual terms, is so much more vivid and forceful than a description expressed in terms of the particular art with which it has specially to do?" Why, for instance, do such expressions as "an orchestra of colors," or "a flower-bed of tones," appeal so awakingly to the imagination?

"Of the truth of the statement," says the writer, "there can be no doubt." There is, however, every doubt; no writer of any real literary sense could use such a metaphor as "an orchestra of colors." The writer says later: "Your image must be not only apposite, but startling; it must compel the attention." That is a dangerous saying. From its application proceed those terrifying stridences which make a reviewer's life unhappy.

THE life of Bret Harte, just issued by Messrs. Pearson, has the following notice inserted in the review copies: "The publishers beg to draw attention to the fact that this copy is cut for the convenience of the Reviewer." We are thankful for this, though why so sensible a thing should have been done only in the case of this particular book we cannot conjecture.

MAXIM GORKY's latest play, "At the Bottom," experimentally produced in Moscow, was a great success. It deals with the dregs of the lodging-house and the street, and the regeneration of certain of the characters by means of the simple and loving humanity of an old ex-Siberian convict. The Moscow "Slovo" said of the play:—

This drama is a song; it is a hymn to humanity. It is awful and joyful. Seeing at the bottom decaying, abandoned people, you say to your conscience: "They are already dead; they no longer feel." And you are reconciled, at peace, whatever may happen to them.

But suddenly you retreat in horror. They are still alive!

A marvellous spectacle of indescribable beauty presents itself to our eyes. Beneath the mire, beneath filth, ugliness, vice, loathsomeness, horror, in a lodging-house, among the dregs—the human personality still lives!

MR. ANDREW LANG has been writing in the "Morning Post" on the subject of circulating libraries. Mr. Lang says: "The more you look, with a mind disengaged, at the mystery of circulating libraries, the more you perceive its roots extending into darkness and infinity, and understand that it has relations co-extensive with the universe." So it has, on general principles, but Mr. Lang, in common with many of us, has found it, in the country at least, of no practical value. Novels you can get by the score, but they are generally the "amateur drivel" which Mr. Lang presumes to have "an eternal attraction." Books which are not novels are to seek. You may ask for them, but you never get them. Mr. Lang concludes:—

Judicious book-buying on the side of the public would be, at least to some people, the most agreeable solution of the problem of how to get books. Unfortunately the whole house would not contain the books that should be purchased. "The peety is that, in this world, as God made it, ye canna hae a' things as ye would want them," says a philosopher in one of Mr. Stevenson's works. On this general conclusion the wearied intellect courts repose. And yet the ingenuity of man, if man will only exert his ingenuity, may yet find a way of improving lending libraries.

We doubt whether the ingenuity of man will ever attain such heights. The country circulating library does not exist for book lovers.

A SITE has been assigned for the memorial to the late Sir Walter Besant in the crypt of St. Paul's. Mr. George Frampton is to execute the work, and Mr. Anthony Hope and Mr. Austin Dobson have been appointed to decide upon a suitable inscription. Up to the end of last year the subscriptions amounted to about £330.

WE review in this issue Mr. Lennox's memoir of George Douglas Brown. As an instance of the work which a man in training for a novelist often has to do, the following is of interest:—

In 1899 . . . Brown undertook regular employment as sub-editor, as well as contributor to "Sandow's Magazine." He was responsible for several articles that appeared in its columns on such subjects as "Walt Whitman," "The Strong Man in Dumas's Fiction," "The Strength of Porthos," and the like.

THE matter of titles is always a difficult one for authors, particularly novelists. We know of one who has run through both the Bible and Shakespeare for a telling title, and failed to find one that fitted his book, which, we believe, is still nameless. But when the right title comes along there is no mistake about it. Such a title has been hit upon by the writer of a cookery book just issued by Mr. Unwin. "Please, M'm, the Butcher!" is a stroke of inspiration.

Bibliographical.

PROF. RALEIGH's "Wordsworth" will be read, of course, with very considerable interest, and perhaps with some measure of curiosity. Is it possible to say anything new about the poet? Look at the number and the quality of the men who have written about him even in our own generation! One thinks at once of the lecture by Robertson of Brighton (published 1858), of George Brimley's essay (1860), of J. C. Shairp's (1868), of R. H. Hutton's (1871), of Prof. Masson's (1874), of Mr. Stopford Brooke's (in "Theology in the English Poets," 1874), of Mr. Matthew Arnold's (in introducing his selection from the poems, 1880), of the critical passages in Mr. F. W. H. Myers' "Wordsworth" (1881), of Mr. John Morley's introduction to the Poems (1888), of Prof. Dowden's "ditto" (1892-3), and so forth—to say nothing of the criticism in verse by Mr. Arnold, Mr. W. Watson, and the like. No doubt Mr. Raleigh will shed some new light upon the much-discussed topic; but the enterprise is arduous and bold.

I notice that the "Letters from a Self-made Merchant to his Son," published in this country by Messrs. Methuen, does not bear the name of its author on its title-page. That name, to be sure, figures twice upon the cover; but I know at least one reviewer who, on the strength of the title-page alone, had been inclined to describe the book as anonymous, until the information on the binding was pointed out to him. I note the fact, because the omission of an author's name from a title-page is likely to lead to its omission in cataloguing, and thus add to the labours of bibliographers.

With reference to the forthcoming new edition of Sir G. W. Dasent's "Tales from the Norse," a literary gossipier recalls the fact that a "Life" of John Delane, of "The Times," "by Sir G. W. Dasent," was announced some years ago by a well-known publishing firm. The "Life," we know, did not appear; but at Sir George's death Mr. Delane's voluminous correspondence passed into the hands of Mr. Arthur Irwin Dasent, who, it is to be hoped, will in due time give us the biography of the great Editor which his father seems to have projected.

Signor Ricci's promised English version of Dante's "Vita Nuova" will be the third that we have had within the last decade. That by C. S. Boswell, published in 1895, was a literal translation. That by Charles Eliot Morton was published over here in 1892. Signor Ricci naturally disclaims competition with D. G. Rossetti or Sir Theodore Martin, whose versions continue to be popular. Rossetti's was reprinted so recently as 1899, and Sir Theodore's reached a third edition just ten years ago.

Prof. Dowden's "Cymbeline" makes the third play which he has contributed to the "Arden Shakespeare." He began the edition with "Hamlet" (1899), which he followed up with "Romeo and Juliet" (1900). Then came the "Tempest" of Mr. Morton Luce (1901), the "King Lear" of Mr. W. J. Craig (1901), the "Julius Cæsar" of Mr. Michael Macmillan (1902), and the "Othello" of Mr. H. C. Hart (1903). The last-named was the first volume of the series in which the edition was announced as the "Arden," and Mr. W. J. Craig described as the "general editor."

Messrs. Isbister have sent out simultaneously the "Wolfville" and "Wolfville Days" of the American humourist, Mr. A. H. Lewis. The latter volume is, I believe, new on both sides of the water; but "Wolfville: a Story of the Far West," was issued in this country in 1897 by Messrs. Laurence and Bullen. Apparently it fell flat, though in my opinion well worthy of notice. Now Mr. Lewis has his chance.

Mr. W. M. Rossetti has been digging again in the wide field of his unpublished Rossettiana, and we are to have from him a volume of "Rossetti Papers, 1862-1870." It was only yesterday—so it seems to one—that he brought out "Prae-Raphaelite Diaries and Letters," which included "Madox Brown's Diary" (1844-56) and the Journal of the "Prae-Raphaelite Brotherhood" (1849-53), both of them well worth having.

There is some danger, it appears, of Mr. G. W. T. Omond, who is to tell us about "The Boer in Europe," being confounded with Mr. T. S. Omond, who is to give us "A Study of Metre"; and vice versa. Bookish people are not likely to make the mistake, for Mr. G. W. T. Omond has been before the public for a good many years. His account of the Lord Advocates of Scotland came out so long ago as 1883, followed in 1887 by "Arniston Memoirs," in 1892-96 by sundry fictions, and in 1897 by a little monograph on Fletcher of Saltoun. It was, I believe, in the last-named year that Mr. T. S. Omond "commenced author" (a vile phrase) with a brochure on "English Verse Structure." Since then, we have had from him "The Romantic Triumph" in one of Messrs. Blackwood's series.

Something pleasant is in store for us, apparently, in the "Shakespeare's Garden" of the Rev. J. H. Bloom. I take for granted that Mr. Bloom will not merely cover the same ground as that tilled by Canon Ellacombe in his "Plant Lore and Garden Craft of Shakespeare," brought out originally in 1878 and again in 1896 (enlarged, if I remember rightly). In this connection Mr. Roach Smith's "Rural Life of Shakespeare" will, no doubt, be remembered. We may assume, by the way, that the articles on Shakespeare's History-Dramas now appearing in "Macmillan's Magazine" will in due course figure in volume form. Some phases of the same subject were dealt with by T. P. Courtenay in a book issued in 1840, and by the Hon. A. Canning in a volume issued in 1884.

"The Bookman" makes the surprising statement that "The Red House" is the first novel from the pen of Mrs. Bland (E. Nesbit). How about "The Secret of Kyriels," published by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett in 1898? I forget whether Mrs. Bland's "In Homespun," contributed to the "Keynote" Series in 1896, was a story, or only a collection of stories.

Sir Walter Besant's Magnum Opus.

LONDON IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By Sir Walter Besant. (A. & C. Black. 30s. net.)

THE word survey has two opposed meanings: (1) a general view, and (2) a particular view. When Sir Walter Besant's "Survey of London" was projected, and for so long as he lived to work upon it, we supposed that its title would bear the second of these meanings. That would have been traditional. John Stow's "Survey" was a particular view of London, street by street; and its successive enlargements and imitations by Howell, Strype, Maitland and the rest, were Surveys in the same rigid sense. We now know that Sir Walter Besant's dream went further. A particular view, or Perambulation as he called it, did not satisfy his ambition, and his work was to include a series of historical volumes containing a general view, or History. He thus proposed two tasks, either of which might be deemed sufficient for half a life-time. It is true that during many years he had been qualifying himself for a great work on London, and that when at last he began it his hope and strength were unabated. It is not the less clear that the "Survey" of which we are now receiving fragments was a Sisyphean task that was bound to overwhelm and confuse his powers.

A new traditional "Survey" of London would be an orderly and particular account of all its streets and houses. On its orderliness, particularity and completeness its value would rest. It was for such a work that students looked when Sir Walter Besant's plan was announced. At that time, indeed, the emphasis was all on the perambulation; and we, among many, had a pleasing vision of the modern Stow, throned in his room in Soho Square, holding the threads of a vast and order-establishing registration of London. To-day it is quite unnecessary to blink the fact that we were never likely to receive such a work from Sir Walter Besant's hands. The reasons for this are entirely honourable to the author of the scheme; they form, indeed, a testimony to his insatiable love and zeal for London. The task was too big for his years; its details were too complexly alluring for his temperament. We have now had fragments of both sides of the "Survey"; of the Perambulation (in the "Fascination of London" series) and of the History (in the present volume). These show the texture of the whole, and we are frankly unable to regard them as parts of a work which, had it been completed, would have marked an epoch in the study of London.

The one work which would do that, and which is imperatively needed for the sake of the past and of the future, is a new and exhaustive Survey of London in John Stow's sense. For such a work the time is more than ripe. Stow's "Survey" attained its full growth in Strype's edition of 1756. Since then no new survey worthy of the name has been made, and it is well to understand that though the scheme begun by Sir Walter Besant has much interest, it did not promise any such result.

The nobly produced volume before us is simply a larger and more highly organised production of the type of the author's "London," "Westminster," "South London," and "East London." It has the excellences and defects of these books, both of which are due to that novelist attitude which Sir Walter Besant assumed to London's life and history. This it was that made him look always for effective episodes, this it was that made him interesting to the general reader rather than helpful to the inquisitive student. The present work on eighteenth century London may, however, be safely recommended to each; it has enough in it for each; it is, in short, a wonderfully good budget of information, anecdote, description, and statistics. We go further, and say that no student can afford to be without it, though we have certain reservations to make. It is arranged under such heads as Historical Notes, The City and the Streets, Manners and Customs, Society and Amusements, Crime and Police, &c. It is in the twenty-one chapters on Manners and Customs that we find Sir Walter Besant at his best. We will illustrate his success by his composite portrait of an eighteenth century "cit":—

The question whether London was a more cheerful city—in other words, whether the people of London were more cheerful and happier—in the eighteenth century than now, has often been asked and never answered. For, in truth, cheerfulness or happiness depends entirely on the standard of life: we get what we desire, and we are happy; we cannot attain to what we think constitutes the most desirable form of life, and we are therefore discontented. Let us ask what the City man desired in 1760.

He desired, first, such a sufficiency of the world's goods as would keep at a reasonable distance the ever-present terror of bankruptcy and the debtors' prison. The contemplation of those places; the misery of wife and children when the breadwinner could earn no more; the coldness of old friends—especially that of the industrious apprentice himself, raised to the civic chair—towards the less fortunate or the less industrious in the Fleet and the King's Bench, acted as a constant stimulus to work moderation. The City man rose early and worked late; he lived frugally and spent little, till his money-bags began to fill out; he was decorous in his behaviour, moral in his sentiments, religious in observance; when he feasted it was at the expense of his Company.

His wife was like-minded; their pleasures were simple, the toast and muffins of the tea-table, a roast and a pudding for dinner; when they grew rich, Vauxhall or Marylebone once or twice in the year. The theatre they cared nothing about; the opera was beyond them; of art or literature they knew nothing; sometimes, as at Christmas, they would play a game of cards, say Pope Joan or Speculation; they attended the week-day sermon and the two services on Sunday. The wife knew a great many people in the City and paid her rounds of visits; in dress she affected the substantial citizen, and was dignified in silk or a gold chain. In the summer a drive to Tottenham or Walthamstow was a favourite pastime. As for her husband, he had his club to which he repaired either on stated evenings of the week or every evening. There were clubs of every kind; his, however, was the sober and steady kind, in which there was neither singing nor merriment. The members sat round the table and conversed in mannered and conventional speech, with great politeness and deference towards each other. They gave to each other what they most desired for themselves—the consideration due to credit and the reputation of soundness. This kind of London citizen was certainly as happy as a man can expect to be, because he got all he wished to get and died leaving a good round fortune. He died contentedly, knowing that he would "cut up" better than his friends expected; and that his memory would be, on that account, envied, admired, and respected.

Of such passages there are very many, and we need fill no more space to prove what everyone knows, that in Sir Walter Besant London found a very engaging descriptive historian. He was not a philosophical historian. Nor was he, as we have said, so helpful to studious readers as he might have been. He had a curious way, born of his novelist instincts, of covering up his tracks. Drawing his facts from a multitude of sources, he sometimes ladled them out in a you-may-take-it-from-me style which would have been perfectly right, indeed unnoticeable in an historical novelist, but which in any work professing to impart historical truth in the language of history is rather out of place. We observe that in the preface to this volume Sir Walter Besant particularly warns his readers not to ask him for his authorities:—

If it were required to name authorities for any statement advanced, or to give reasons for any conclusion, I could not, probably, do so, since the authority would lie hidden in some obscure history or some long-forgotten tedious novel.

This is a curious saying. Are we to accept as a sufficient voucher for a considerable body of information the fact that Sir Walter Besant derived it from old and obscure novels whose titles he had forgotten? If, as he points out, the forgotten novels of the eighteenth century are a treasury of hints and information (and he expressly puts them above those of Fielding and Smollett in this respect), he would have done us a real service in bringing their titles and authors' names to our notice. As it is, he found them in the twopenny box, "in the limbo of lost satires, forgotten poems," and there—perhaps not even there—they remain for us. Sir Walter Besant has only distilled their backgrounds and local colour drop by drop into his book, and each drop has melted imperceptibly into his general mass of information. But, as we have said, it was his novelist instinct that made him chary of setting up mile posts. So far does he indulge this reluctance, that not infrequently a well-known author sinks in Sir Walter's pages to the level of "a writer of the period," or some other impersonality. In the chapter on Servants an extract is thrown in to show how, even in the eighteenth century, the country girl coming up to London to enter service lost her rural simplicity, the "plain country Jane changing into a fine London madam." Any studious reader would like to know the source of this pithy description, but it is not here that he will learn that it is Defoe's. Under "Coffee Houses and Clubs" an excellent passage is introduced as from the "Journey Through England" of 1714. Why balk the reader by omitting the name of its author, John Macky, a man whose career has considerable interest and who numbered Swift among his readers? Who was the foreign traveller whose diary of 1760 is used in the chapter headed "Sundry Notes"? In a chapter on "Holidays" we have a paraphrase of an account written by "a certain visitor to London in 1831." There is quite enough in what follows to arouse the curiosity of a careful reader, but where is he to learn that the account thus imperfectly quoted—quite a document in its way—was written by one Thomas North, in "Read's Weekly" of January 9, 1731, and is quoted entire by Malcolm? Yet a small-type foot-note to this effect could not only have given this information, but it would have lent vitality and authenticity to the paraphrase. References to the "Tatler" and "Connoisseur" are seldom or never given with exactness. A list of amusements is taken from "a work published in 1786." Elsewhere much use is made of a pamphlet which is described as "the first of many 'Bitter Cries' as to the violence and the robberies carried on in the City of London." This "pamphlet" is evidently Defoe's last written work, but no inkling of the fact is vouchsafed. A versified note on the appearance of the country on the skirts of London in 1783, in the chapter on "The Extent and Aspects of the City," is very interesting for its photographic picture of the dreary builders' zone which was even then between London and the country. It is an unusual little document, but all we learn is: "It is a poet who speaks or sings." The poet was Charles Jenner, and the lines appear in his "Town Eclogue," first published, not in 1783, but in 1772. These are but a few instances, taken at random, of a needless reticence. A work of this kind has nothing to lose by generosity in the matter of foot-notes and references; but Sir Walter Besant seems to have dreaded them. It is a pity, because their absence deprives his books of much helpfulness, isolating them somewhat from their predecessors and successors.

Of the present lordly quarto volume it may be said that it fairly represents that "Survey" which Sir Walter Besant conceived, and which he used to refer to as his "magnum opus." It is a worthy literary monument to his deep knowledge and love of London.

Publisher and Authors.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF GEORG JOACHIM GOSCHEN, PUBLISHER AND PRINTER OF LEIPZIG, 1752-1828. By his Grandson, Viscount Goschen. 2 vols. Illustrated. (Murray. 36s. net.)

VISCOUNT GOSCHEN, in these two bulky volumes, has set forth the career of his grandfather, a German publisher of the eighteenth century in the town of Leipzig; as recorded in his letters and business documents. Georg Joachim Goschen was no ordinary publisher—indeed, one may fairly say a very extraordinary publisher; and the record is put together with much skill and sense of selection. The elder Goschen became a publisher when German literature was in the thick of its heroic period, and was himself actively concerned in the building-up of that period. He had a genius for his calling: a remarkable energy, self-reliance, and business capacity. He began his publishing business on a capital of something over four hundred and fifty pounds: yet in the teeth of all difficulties he never flinched from heavy enterprises, and contrived, himself a struggling publisher of scanty means, to forward struggling authors of scanty means. He possessed the exceedingly rare combination of business faculty with keen literary sensibility—even to a degree of what we modern Englishmen would consider sentimentality. His calling and career brought him into close touch with the greatest German authors of his time; and it is here that comes in the attraction of his biography. His relations with Goethe and Schiller alone compose an interesting chapter of literary history.

With Schiller especially. He backed Schiller, young, striving, and almost desperate, when to back Schiller was a generous deed; and Schiller famous and prosperous repaid him very scurvily. That is our judgment, on Viscount Goschen's narrative; and the narrative is drawn from the correspondence (chiefly) of Schiller himself and the elder Goschen's rival-publisher, Cotta: so there seems little room for misjudgment. But the beginning of their relations is a publisher's idyll. Goschen was a friend of the quartette (Körner, Huber, and the two Fraulein Stocks) who lured Schiller from Mannheim to Leipzig, and formed with him a romantic fraternity. Körner, indeed (the father of the afterwards famous poet of the German rising against Napoleon), was Schiller's saviour, paying his debts and aiding him with money repeatedly; and Körner was Goschen's partner in business. The quartette began by sending the young poet they admired a joint letter of sympathetic encouragement. Körner enclosed a musical setting of one of Schiller's songs; Minna Stock had worked a pocket-book; Dora Stock sent a sketch of the four anonymous enthusiasts. It was all very German and of the age. But Schiller discovered the names of the four, and was on fire with gratitude and characteristically sudden rapture of friendship. This was the unknown thing which his life had lacked; and existence was insupportable unless he forthwith migrated to Leipzig. But without paying his debts he could not move; without money he could not pay his debts; they must get him money. He had a periodical, "Thalia," which he could make over to a Leipzig publisher; would they procure him three hundred thalers on that security? Of course, the friends must have their Schiller; no money, no Schiller, therefore Schiller must have his money. They turned to Goschen; Goschen agreed to take over the "Thalia," and so he too was drawn into the band of Schiller-devotees. Stipulating that his coming should be kept secret from "the girls" (Minna and Dora Stock) till they had planned a little hoax on them, Schiller hastened into his worshippers' arms (he was always in a hurry for someone's arms).

It was Schiller who was hoaxed. Having promised to call on a lady (name not given) when he arrived, this is what happened, according to an account long afterwards written (it is imagined) by Goschen. Schiller was announced:—

What? This pleasant, self-satisfied man! [It was Huber.] these lively and sparkling eyes! this satirical mouth! this elegant light clothing! this easy bearing! this polite condescension! this easy, mocking way of talking!—was Schiller all this? The reality had pleased her much, but not just in the way she had expected. . . . The servant entered and announced "Herr Schiller," and at once the mystery seemed solved—a stranger had played her a trick, and this was the real Schiller. . . . Scarcely of medium stature, of powerful, not of stout build; large, candid eyes, full of intellect; an earnest mien, and rather severe and commanding glance—his words few but incisive; his speech slow, impressive, and musical. . . . This visitor certainly answered more to the conception she had formed; but once more the servant entered and announced, "There is another Herr Schiller without, and he begs." And, to her astonishment, a tall, lean man, with large joints, very marked features, pale yellow complexion, deeply set but penetrating eyes; a somewhat fixed, but not repellent look; with somewhat negligent garments—entered and said in a monotonous, hollow voice, "I owe you thanks," &c. This Schiller of course she believed to be a hoax, and matters were becoming rather strained . . . when once more the servant appeared and informed her that the two other Herr Schillers desired to speak again with her. . . . They came up to apologise for the practical joke which they had played on her, and the mystery was at once cleared up by Schiller recognising in the two who had assumed his name, his friends Huber and Jünger.

It is worth quoting, for Goschen's description of Schiller, whom he knew so well. For presently Schiller retreated to the little village of Gohlis, outside Leipzig; where among the woods and meadows of the "Rose Valley," as it was called, he became Goschen's guest for half a year. In the following year Goschen himself wrote of this experience to Bertuch:—

For half a year I lived with Schiller in one room. He inspired me with the tenderest friendship and esteem. His gentle demeanour and the gentle tone of his spirit in social gatherings, compared with the productions of his muse, are to me a riddle. I cannot tell you how yielding and grateful he is to every critic, how he strives for his moral perfection, and how disposed he is to patient reflection. He knew that Moritz had reviewed him scornfully in the Berlin paper. Nevertheless, when Moritz was here, he received him with such esteem and pleasing politeness, that Moritz, on going away, embraced him and assured him of his eternal friendship. With the greatest earnestness, with moving eloquence, with tears in his eyes, Schiller has often exhorted me, young Huber, Ober-Consistorial-Rath Körner, Jünger the poet, each to employ all his powers in his own vocation to become men whom the world would one day be unwilling to lose. We have all much to thank him for, and I shall remember him with gladness even in the hour of my death.

It is well to have Goschen's testimony, for one does not always associate such gentleness and sweetness of character with the impetuous poet and part-author of the ferocious "Xenia." For the rest, the exuberant sentiment of the letter exhibits that remarkable union of qualities in Goschen to which we before referred. It is all amazing to an Englishman. Conceive an English poet worth his salt, conceive Shakespeare, conceive even Shelley with his effusive ideals and universal benevolence, speechifying to his friends with moving eloquence and superfluous tears about the lofty use of their powers. When the friends entered an inn after a meeting with Körner, Schiller tells Körner—

Your health was drunk. Silently we gazed at each other, a solemn sense of devotion filled our minds, and all of us had tears in our eyes which we forced ourselves to repress. Goschen said that he still felt this glass of wine burning in every limb; Huber's face was as red as fire as he confessed that he had never before tasted wine so good.

Dear young men! they wept with fluency. On the appropriate occasion they always have tears in their eyes. But Goschen afforded Schiller more than tears. From this time throughout the period of their connection he was always liberal in payment, and ready with advances to meet Schiller's constant necessities. This although his capital was for long small, and he grumbled that the German public was scandalously "impervious." "Twenty people read, and only one buys," he said—a charge miserably true of the English people in these days of Free Libraries, Circulating Libraries, and Mr. Carnegie. His most important publication for Schiller was the drama of "Don Carlos," while the "Thalia" continued to run, though Schiller had left Leipzig. But before the breach between them, to which we shall come back, Goschen had signalled himself by the acquisition of Goethe. The glimpses of Goethe in this book, though fairly numerous, are not interesting. Goethe was seeking a publisher for his collected works, but his terms made publishers falter. Bertuch communicated with Goschen on Goethe's behalf, and Goschen undertook the task. With one exception, it was solely in this matter that Goethe and Goschen were concerned: they never met or became friends, and Goethe's letters relate wholly to the business-affair and the forwarding of copy from Italy,—for Goethe chose this moment for his famous Italian journey. Nothing of his intellectual side comes out in the letters. Perhaps, indeed, the most interesting light on Goethe is a mere side-light, in the impression he made on Wieland. Wieland was a literary ruler before Goethe arose; Goethe had satirised him with little, if any, just provocation; finally supplanted him in the affections of the famous Duke of Saxe-Weimar. Yet after meeting him, Wieland wrote of Goethe with sheer idolatry. Thus, to Jacobi he wrote:—

How entirely I felt at the first glance that Goethe was a man after my own heart! How I fell in love with the splendid youth as I sat by his side at the table! All that I can say . . . is this: since that morning my soul is as full of Goethe as a dewdrop of the morning sun.

And nine weeks later to Zimmerman:—

To-day I have seen him for the first time in his complete splendour—in his complete, beautiful, pure humanity. In a moment of ecstasy I knelt down beside him, pressed my soul to his heart, and worshipped God!

These Germans! But yet, let us admit a certain moderation: when he accomplished the singular gymnastic feat recorded in the final sentence, the tears were not in his eyes.

Goschen's collection of Goethe's works would be memorable for one fact alone: the fragment of "Faust," ultimately to evolve into his masterpiece, first appeared in it. Yet the German public, indifferent to his "beautiful, pure humanity," received the collection coldly: it was no great success, after the great labour and capital expended on it. This, and Goethe's exacting terms, must have cooled Goschen; for when Goethe, entering a new field, offered him his famous essay, "On the Metamorphosis of Plants," he refused it. The experts, of course, sneered at the poet essaying science, which was another reason. It cost Goschen his connection with Goethe, who was willing to have made him his sole publisher. Perhaps the same tendency to draw back just when he should have gone forward made him decline Schiller's new periodical, "Die Horen," which was to assemble the intellect of Germany. The result was that Schiller accepted the overtures of Cotta; and once engaged with him over "Die Horen," gradually succumbed to him altogether, placing in his hands the edition of his complete works, and assigning to him the sole publication of his further writings. The quarrel between the two publishers broke out formally over the inclusion in the complete edition of "Don Carlos," already held by Goschen. But the real grievance was that Schiller had given his writings at large to another man. It had been understood that Goschen should have first claim on his work; Goschen was his early and proved friend, had stood by him in the years of famine, had been his good helper when money was a crying need to him. He might well look to share the profits of his risen fame. But Schiller kicked down the ladder he had climbed, and went to another man. He did not even write to his friend on the matter, but left Cotta to transact negotiations. No marvel Goschen lost his temper with Cotta, or felt bitterness. There was no question even of higher pay from Cotta. For three years Schiller and Goschen were asunder. Then they renewed friendship; and it speaks much for Goschen's good heart that he should have renewed friendship, since to the last Schiller never renewed his publishing connection with his old friend. We cannot but feel that the poet was seriously ungrateful; and this record of Goschen's experience is scarce encouraging to publishers minded, at some risk and trouble, to encourage young and ill-rewarded genius.

An Icelandic Tale.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF CORMAC THE SKALD. Rendered into English by W. G. Collingwood and Jón Stefansson. (W. Holmes, Ulverston.)

MR. COLLINGWOOD and Mr. Stefansson have translated between them in "Cormac the Skald" a Saga of particular interest, and we have to thank Mr. Collingwood in especial for a very interesting Introduction in which he summarises the motive of this Icelandic tale, which "is the biography of an important historical personage." Cormac the Skald, "a thorough Irishman," whose ancestors must have migrated to Iceland about 931, is thus interpreted for us by Mr. Collingwood:—

The story of a poet, poor and proud, with all the strength and all the weakness of genius. He loves a fine lady, a spoiled child, who bewitches him and jilts him and jilts him again. He fights for her, rhymes for her, and rises for her sake to the height of all that a man in his age could achieve. Then, after years, he has her at his feet and learns her heartlessness and worthlessness. He bids her farewell; but dies in the end with her name on his lips. This is the motive of the book, very modern, we should call it.

In truth the saga is far more modern in tone than, say, "The Story of Burnt Njall," and we are not quite convinced by Mr. Collingwood when he argues that the people who put it into permanent literary shape "between 1250 and 1300" were more or less faithfully transmitting it as it was told two hundred years earlier. "It is a coarse rough story of coarse rough life," says the late Dr. Guðbrand Vigfússon, "and it would seem that the early and rude language of the first version was preserved in the later book, which is the most primitive piece of Icelandic prose-writing that has come down to us." This may be perfectly true, and yet the thirteenth century transcribers by eking out the primitive outline of the tale, and by turning parts of it into the language of their day, may have introduced into it its curiously modern feeling. Mr. Collingwood does not commit himself definitely on the point, which, of course, as in the case of all recensions of primitive pieces of literature, must always be highly debatable. However, taking the saga as it stands, it is certainly a very interesting document, and if we are to trust its evidence we must find that human nature in the Iceland of a thousand years ago was pretty much the same as in England to-day. A man was crossed in love and turned "viking," and harassed the coast of Ireland as a natural sequence, just as our younger sons go out to Rhodesia or Somaliland to-day. Steingerd, the faithless woman of the piece, behaves extremely like the heroine of George Egerton's "Keynotes." Cormac certainly gave her cause:—

Afterwards many people had their say in this manner; but in the end it came to this—that he asked for her, and she was pledged to him, and the wedding was fixed; and so all was quiet for a while.

Then she had words. There was some falling-out about settling down to such a pass that after everything was ready, Cormac began to cool-off. But the real reason was, that Thorveig had bewitched him so that they should never have one another. . . . Cormac never came to the wedding at the time it was fixed, and the hour passed by. This the kinsfolk of Steingerd thought a slight, deeming that he had broken off the match; and they had much talk about it.

We can imagine the sort of talk that went round the countryside. Anyway, Steingerd's family shortly afterwards married her off willy nilly to Bersi, a famous fighter, and Cormac, after chasing the bride and bridegroom to their door, challenged Bersi to fight "at the holmgang." But Cormac is again unlucky; he borrows a famous sword Sköfnung, but only succeeds in slicing off the tip of his adversary's sword Whitting, and the flying splinter wounds Cormac in the hand. Men said, of course, that there was witchcraft in the business; and Skeggi, a man of the old school who lent the sword, was disgusted, and said the "holmgang" had been brought to scorn. Steinar, Cormac's uncle, took his part, and picked a quarrel with Bersi, saying, "All we want to teach thee is thy true place"; and Bersi, having lost the charm he wore round his neck, was wounded as a matter of course. Then Steingerd, because her husband's wound healed slowly, and people no doubt jeered at him, got discontented, and "when she had got everything ready for going away," she twitted him with his wound, "and spoke her divorce from him"; and she took up, later on, with Thorvald, "a wealthy man, a smith and a skald, but mean-spirited for all that." Cormac goes off as a Viking, wins great renown, comes back, meets Steingerd, and passes a night with her "in a little farm where they were taken in and treated well." "That night they slept each on either side of the carven wainscot that parted bed from bed"; and Cormac made several songs in praise of his lady. But Steingerd was not to be mollified. She only replied: "Thou didst let me go once for all; and there is no more hope for thee." In vain Cormac rescued her twice from pirates when her mean husband Thorvald refused to risk himself; it was all no good, and even when Thorvald, shamed, said: "Go along with Cormac, for he has fairly won you, and manfully," Steingerd said: "Nay, I will not change knives." Cormac's great mistake, in fact, was that he behaved like a refined modern man. Just at the critical moment he sang songs to his mistress, and gave her the option of going with him or not, and Steingerd, no doubt, would have responded to somewhat rougher treatment. However, the reader can study the Saga for himself and see whether he is of our mind.

Mr. Collingwood takes his readers into his confidence in his introduction, and lays before them all the difficulties of translating adequately the Skald's verses. We cannot be ungrateful for the manifold experiments and the great labour these must have cost him, and we do not doubt that the form he has finally settled on is one that reproduces the characteristic features of the original. We must, however, admit that we find the verses a little too obscure and a little too difficult to read to get much pleasure from. We much prefer the alternative form he gives us on page 14 of his introduction, and we hope that, later on, he will give us a version in the short metre. Meanwhile we can only thank him heartily for the care and skill with which he has edited the Saga, and the admirable prose style of which he and his co-editor have command.

A Lippo Lippi of Poetry.

SKELTON: A SELECTION FROM THE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN SKELTON. With Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. By W. H. Williams. (Isbister. 2s. 6d.)

WE may be grateful to Mr. Williams for these specimens of a very curious and unique author—the more curious because, with all his popularity during his life, he exercised no influence upon the after-development of English literature, but remained a sport and by-product (so to speak). It has very careful and scholarly notes, besides the needful glossary; and a judicious introduction, summarising the little known about Skelton's life, and the references to him in subsequent literature; besides giving a list of his works, lost or extant, and a brief but sufficient critique of his merits and place in English literature. The book, as Mr. Williams says, though designed primarily for students of early Tudor literature, has also an eye to the possible general reader; though we fear that vaguely formidable person is like to let it severely alone. The four poems chosen are fairly representative of Skelton's better work; though to be representative of all his characteristic aspects it should have comprised some such ribald poem as "The Tunning of Eleanor Rummyng," with its coarse but lively pictures of lower-class life under the first Tudors. And we could have desired that most charming Skeltonism which celebrates—

Merry Margret,
That midsummer flower,
Gentle as falcon
Or hawk of the tower.

But as a whole it gives a very good idea of Mr. Alfred Austin's Tudor predecessor.

A strange and far from reputable voice in English song was John Skelton; a kind of poetic and very Anglo-Saxon Lippo Lippi. Whether he were a Cumbrian or a Norfolk man is uncertain: we should be disposed to fancy him Cumberland by birth and early residence, Norfolk by connection and subsequent rearing. His university associations are just as mixed: he seems to have been educated first at Cambridge, and afterwards to have become connected with Oxford, which made him laureate. Then he was tutor to Prince Henry, afterwards the truculent Henry VIII.; and (perhaps for the purpose) took Holy Orders, becoming priest, and ultimately Rector of Diss in Norfolk. His Court career, as favourite of Henry VIII., who called him his "Vicar of hell," was reckless enough, one may guess; and ended in disgrace and imprisonment. Taking up his position as Rector of Diss, he seems to have been a devil-may-care rector indeed, if tales told of him have any truth; and his lampoons and epigrams on his parishioners do by no means suggest a man of God. His poems would alone bear out the stories of his life. They are reckless, satirical, ribald, fanciful, graceful; the very metre (which is all his own) is a metre in a state of dissolution—wild, light, flexible, with a Bohemian happiness. The substance is like unto the man: pedantic, smelling of the scholar-priest, yet withal vigorous, vernacular, caustic, abusive, and strangely shot with wild and dancing lights of daintiness. Not a great poet, not even an important poet, not a considerable poet—nay, doubtfully a poet at all; yet with suggestions of neglected and haphazard powers: interesting to the scholar rather than the general reader. Not a man of principle: he began as hanger-on and eulogist of Wolsey, then turned his audacious satirist; once a courtier, then a popular advocate, an assailant of abuses in Church and State. In this style can he write, when he makes a damsel mourn her sparrow:—

Sometimes he would gasp
When he saw a wasp;
A fly or gnat
He would fly at that;
And prettily he would pant
When he saw an ant;
Lord, how he would pry
After the butterfly!
Lord, how he would hop
After the gressop!
And when I said, Phyp, Phyp,
Then he would leap and skip,
And take me by the lip.
Alas! it will me slo,
That Philip is gone me fro!

But he can also pour out the coarsest ribaldries: altogether a vagabond voice of English song. And at that, after all, we must leave him.

Old-World Moralities.

THE BOOKE OF THENSEYGEEMENTES AND TECHYNGE THAT THE KNYGHT OF THE TOWRE MADE TO HIS DAUGHTERS. (Newnes. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS quaintly-named book is a selection (comprising about half of the original) from the rare translation by Caxton, of which there are two copies in the British Museum. There is an earlier translation than Caxton's, which never went beyond MS., made by an anonymous translator in the reign of Henry VI. It is of more literary merit than Caxton's (for the celebrated printer knew French ill, and was diffident as to the quality of his English); and the Early English Text Society published it in 1868. Caxton's version seems to have been chosen for the present selection solely because it is rare and has not been reprinted—surely an inadequate reason, when the other is admittedly superior. The French original was written in the latter part of the fourteenth century by the Chevalier Geoffroy de la Tour Landry, for the purpose of teaching his little daughters to read, and also imparting to them all the lessons of morality and behaviour suitable to young demoiselles of good birth. In those days, you see, when a papa wanted a First Reader for his little misses, he went and made one—if he was able. The Knight of the Tower (as Caxton calls him) was able; and he made a reading-book which should instruct his mediæval young ladies after his own heart. It found favour in the sight of other mediæval French papas; for it was immensely popular in the land of its nativity. Perhaps the papas (not to speak of the mammas) themselves were not above reading it; and this would not be surprising. A great many English misses nowadays would be glad to substitute this collection of quaint (the much-tried word is unavoidable) and curious stories for the not too seductive compilations on which they cut their literary milk-teeth. Caxton considered that it taught tender demoiselles "how they ought to govern them virtuously in this present life." That is as may be; but the point, from the learner's standpoint, is that the stories are most unscholastically interesting.

If a young lady is to learn the evils of vanity, and the desirableness (from the parental standpoint) of economy in dress; how shall she absorb the lesson more delightfully than by reading the tale of the knight with three wives? It was the first wife who had an extravagant wardrobe. And the result was that a holy hermit had a vision of her, after her death; of which, in our extract, we take leave to modernise the spelling:—

He saw the poor soul before Saint Michael the Archangel, and the fiend at the other side, and was in a balance, and her good deeds with her. And at the other side was the devil with all her evil deeds, which grieved and troubled her sore. It were her gowns that were of much fine cloth, and furred of calabre, letuce, and ermine. And the devil cried with a high voice and said, "Sire, this woman had ten pair of gowns long and short, and ye know well she had with half of them enough, that is, a long gown, two kirtles, and two cotes hardies or two short gowns, and therewith she might have be pleased and sufficed, as a good and simple lady, and after God and right she hath had of them too much by the half; and of the value of one of her gowns, fifty poor people had had fifty ells of burell or frieze, which have suffered such cold and such misese about them, and yet she never took pity on them." Then took the devil her gowns, rings, and jewels that she had had of the men by love, also all the vain and idle words that she had said of other by envy and taken away their good renomme . . . but all this together he did put in the balance. And . . . much more they weighed than did all the good that ever she had done.

A very statistical devil, and of a good conscience, with much zeal for the poor, and speaks as though he were a husband himself. Then is there the pie (magpie) that betrayed the wife's eating of a "great eel," to her husband who designed it for a present; and was plucked by the irate lady. Wherefore, when any man "bald or pilled" came to the house, the said pie cried, "Ye have told my lord of the eel." Such are the simple old-world japes and moralities of this book; the ancient spelling of which, however, may frighten off the children, though their elders will find it both curious and diverting.

Superfluous.

GEORGE DOUGLAS BROWN. By Cuthbert Lennox. (Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

Six months ago the author of "The House with the Green Shutters" died, and already we have his biography put into our hands. Such haste, at best, could hardly be justified, and in the present case we feel that no need existed for such a book at all. Brown wrote one successful and most promising book; on that his reputation stands. We cannot think that the public desired any detailed life, and certainly no real service is rendered to Brown's memory or to letters by this volume. The note is pitched too high; hardly more could have been said for Brown if he had produced half-a-dozen works of genius, instead of one work of distinguished talent. We have no desire to depreciate Brown's accomplishment, but it is necessary, it would seem, to defend his true position from the eulogies of indiscreet friendship. We are told by Mr. Lennox that "The House with the Green Shutters" became the most talked of book in literary circles, both in this country and America." We cannot speak for America, but certainly at no time was it the "most talked of book" in London.

The details of Brown's life, as set forth by Mr. Lennox, present no particular points for comment; they represent the usual struggles and difficulties which have been the commonplaces of the literary life to scores of men who have had to make their way, and to scores of men who are making their way to-day. Brown, perhaps, took himself more seriously than most men; he meant to be a novelist, and to that end he made some sacrifices. But in that he was not singular, as Mr. Lennox seems to suppose.

Mr. Melville, whose reminiscences of Brown, reprinted from "The Bookman," follow Mr. Lennox's memoir, is on the whole rather more discreet; yet even Mr. Melville insists upon saying the wholly unnecessary. When Brown's success came, we read, "he neither rioted in it nor shunned it. He was not humble about his book and its success, but he remained practically unaffected by it. . . . His dress was as careless as ever, his habits Bohemian as they had always been, his visits to his friends as unexpected, and his conversation of the same range and quality as during the time of his obscurity." Why should such things be set down? It is surely no compliment to the memory of a man to say that he remembered his friends, that he was perhaps wiser than his eulogists, and that he continued to talk after success as he had talked before it came. The impression left by such a volume as this, indeed, is by no means that which the authors would appear to have intended. They make the ordinary decencies of life and social conduct into signs and tokens of the greatness of the individual. We need hardly say that the point of view is absurdly narrow and without any broad justification whatever.

It is the same with regard to Brown's religious views. Those views, so far as we can gather, appear to have been the views which most young men of talent and strong personality have held at one time or another. Mr. Melville writes: "I hope it is not necessary to explain that it is not intended here to claim Brown for an orthodox Christian. That he never had been, probably never could have become." And then Mr. Melville proceeds to talk about "his royal arrogance of intellect." Such "royal arrogance" is usually the indication of an immaturity from which Brown suffered, no doubt, in common with many greater men.

Mr. Lang's introduction is the best part of this otherwise superfluous volume. It is human, kindly, and not overloaded, and its conclusion will touch most readers:—

In thinking of him and reading about him, I am reminded of two others who never reached success, and of one who did—Thomas Davidson (the Scottish Probationer); R. F. Murray, the student poet of the scarlet gown, and Robert Louis Stevenson. It is natural to regret that Mr. Stevenson never met Mr. Brown; often, on a hundred occasions, one misses him, and his power of appreciating things and men. "They all are gone into the world of light."

Other New Books.

THE CRICKLETON CHRONICLES. By W. Carter Platts. (Jarrold.)

THERE are some books that give themselves away with their titles; and this is one. The practised reader would guess that the "Crickleton Chronicles" would be funny after the manner of Albert Smith, a manner which still subsists and earns innumerable halfpennies in "Funny Cuts" of various names. Many things happened at Crickleton. For example, Widow Macwillin married old Grigson, and insisted on a musical service. But the organist was taken ill. However, the best man remembered that his neighbour had a mechanical organette that could play "The Voice that Breathed o'er Eden," and other things. He borrowed it. You foresee the obvious and infuriating sequel. Of course the organette, as the couple marched down the aisle, struck up "The Wrong Man." And then we have a picture of old Grigson finishing the organette in the chapel yard. London is full of errand-boys to whom the joke will come as a revelation.

But the essence of the book is the cowboy's courtship. He had come from "the Rockies" to Crickleton, and picked up Miss Carson on the verandah with the idea that she was his sister. He kissed her. "'Sir!' she indignantly cried, blushing crimson as the hot blood surged to her face and neck." You foresee the awful anguish of Jack Raeburn when the mistake is discovered, and the confusion of Miss Carson. That is the convention. But the reality would be simply a laugh at the mistake. However, Jack Raeburn and Miss Carson fall into each other's arms, only to discover that the grandfather of the one flogged the grandmother of the other in Delaware some half century ago. That, of course, in the opinion of the squire (her father) and of Miss Carson (for a time) settles it. A man may not marry his grandmother, but he is responsible for his grandfather. That is the conventional attitude of the squire in fiction. We will not follow out the story to its end, but the conclusion may be given. It occurs in chapter twenty, which by a rare stroke of humour appears at the beginning. "So they were married at eleven o'clock this morning, and have lived happily ever since."

A WOMAN'S WANDERINGS AND TRIALS DURING THE ANGLO-BOER WAR. By Mrs. (General) De la Rey. (Unwin. 2s. 6d.)

MRS. DE LA REY'S narrative has the value of directness and simplicity; beyond that, as a contribution to the history of the war, it is of small account. Mrs. De la Rey has that kind of sincere piety which expresses itself in the continual use of Biblical quotation, generally apt enough, but sometimes almost funny. The book reveals a personality eminently domestic, eminently practical, and quite incapable of more than one point of view. The singleness of the point of view was, of course, to be expected: the Boers were God's chosen fighting for freedom. Of the true facts of the situation Mrs. De la Rey has no idea; she was merely the wife of a soldier in what to her was the just cause. Yet even in her narrative, with all the inevitable prejudice which marks it, we see with what magnanimity the war was conducted. The more we read of the South African war, indeed, the more it becomes clear that no war was ever waged with more of true courtesy. In Mrs. De la Rey's story it is the kaffirs and not the "khakis" who made themselves objectionable. The author, naturally, has to tell of things which appear terrible enough, but there is no hint of unnecessary or meaningless destruction. And Mrs. De la Rey was herself sometimes a woman first and a partisan second. When Lord Methuen was a wounded prisoner Mrs. De la Rey went to see him in memory of the days when he had sent her out of Lichtenburg:—

When I got there, one of our people, a man called Tom, said that he did not want to see any visitors. . . . All the same, when he heard that I was there, he said that I might come in—that he would like to see me. I went into the tent; there lay the great, strong man wounded above the knee, right through the bone. . . . I had a fat chicken killed, and took some biscuits and sent them with the chicken to the wounded lord.

Yet even concerning so small an attention there were people who could ask why it should be bestowed "upon such a man." Of many of the hardships incident to most warfare this book has no hint. There was food, and even reasonable shelter, for the women and children. Mrs. De la Rey's younger children enjoyed the fun.

A DESCRIPTIVE GUIDE TO THE BEST FICTION. By Ernest A. Baker. (Sonnenschein. 8s. 6d. net.)

A LABORIOUS compilation, running to over six hundred pages. The author says:—

The object of this book is to supply a fairly complete list of the best prose fiction in English, including, not all that interests students, but all that the ordinary reader is likely to care about, with as much description of matter and style, for the guidance of readers, as can be condensed into a few lines of print for each book.

Books which in the author's opinion are masterpieces or peculiarly representative are marked by asterisks, and a number of translations have been included. The volume opens with the names of three authors under the Fifteenth Century; under the Sixteenth Century there are seven names, and under the Seventeenth five. In the Eighteenth Century the names and works begin to multiply, and the Nineteenth marshals in an innumerable host. Perhaps of necessity this innumerable host includes much which cannot by any standard be considered to come near the "best" in fiction; but, as Mr. Baker says, he has been able "merely to select a few thousand novels from the legions and legions that have issued from the press." On the whole the selection is reasonably good.

NEW EDITIONS: The latest volume in Messrs. Macmillan's three-and-sixpenny edition of Mr. Thomas Hardy's novels is "Jude the Obscure." Mr. Hardy's brief and memorable preface is of course included.—In Messrs. Dent's reprint of Thackeray's prose works, "The Irish Sketch Book" has just reached us. Mr. Walter Jerrold's bibliographical note is brief and to the point.—Messrs. Newnes's thin-paper edition of Lord Lytton's "Night and Morning" strikes us at first with a sense of strangeness. One always felt that only ordinary paper could support Lord Lytton's style. But a glance at these pages reassures us of the fact that Lytton was a born story-writer.

THE LITTLE RED FISH. By Philip Laurence Oliphant. (Arnold. 6s.)

THE only condition upon which one can consent to be interested in a Hindu fetish upon which depends the welfare of a native dynasty is that it shall be made convincingly to appear to fulfil its mission. A fetish that in the most deplorable way fails to come within shouting distance of success might just as well have been made in Birmingham.

The heroine of Mr. Oliphant's tale possesses in the red fish a kind of title-deed to the territory of her maternal grandmother, who had made a mésalliance with a no more than respectable European. In a country house where her uncanny tricks gave her an evil reputation, she encounters an English officer, who in South Africa (of course) had distinguished himself by carrying out the Wonderland principle of "Sentence first"; and that, said Kara in effect, is the man for me. So she showed him her treasure and swore him to secrecy, and hypnotised and kissed him; but failed on the whole to persuade him to become her ally. And when she arrived in state at Moralsapur to reap the fruit of a coup d'état, this Gerald Paulett had already been appointed by the Government of India to the post of President of the Council. A last appeal failed, and the next morning Kara is found dead by her own hand.

The other string to the author's bow is the love story of Paulett with a charming widow, and Paulett's appointment to a post at the War Office affords an opportunity for an exposure of the system which the author, who is ingenious in the invention of chapter-headings, embraces under the title of Tape Vermilion.

On such lines the book is worked out handily enough to keep the reader for an hour or so pleasantly concerned.

THE RED HOUSE. By E. Nesbit. (Methuen. 6s.)

IT is a question whether it is not always a pity to write a story in the first person. The fact that some of the best stories in the language have been written in this way does not affect the question at all, because there is no reason why they should not have been better stories still if they had been written impersonally. The children's instinct to avoid what they call "I stories" is probably the right one. But, in any case, most people will agree that for a woman-writer to tell a story in the guise of a man is a distinct risk, and a risk not worth taking. And E. Nesbit is a particularly feminine woman-writer; that is the secret of her charm. So we feel resentful when she cheats us of what she has taught us to expect from her, for the sake of masquerading in doublet and hose. "The Red House," while not by any means a strong book, would be a very pretty study in sentiment if the narrator had been the wife instead of the husband. But so feminine is the whole purpose and outlook of the book that it is difficult at times not to forget that the "I" of its pages is the person called Len, and not the one called Chloe. We wish very heartily that it had been the person called Chloe, for by letting her husband tell the tale she has left us to form the impression of a most effeminate and rather tiresome young man, who would never, we feel sure, have deserved all the kisses he seems to get in the book. And talking of kisses, we come to the story itself. There is very little story, for the plot deals only with the doings of a very young married couple, who go to live in an old house that is much too large for them, and tumble in and out of mild scrapes and difficulties in consequence. The only value the book could have would lie in the way it is done; and we have said what we think of the way in which it is done.

The young married couple by this time needs more careful doing than it is likely to receive at the hands of a man who has all the while the heart of a woman. That kind of man is all very well when he is explained by a woman, but when he explains himself on every page of "The Red House,"—well, it makes us want to go back to "The Treasure Seekers," and all the other delightful books where E. Nesbit is not pretending to be some one else.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER. BY MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

The history of Julie Le Breton, the central figure, is known to a few of the habitués of Lady Henry Delafield's drawing-room. Some of them knew her mother, Lady Rose, and the reason of her flight to Belgium, where she died. All feel the influence of Julie Le Breton's fascination, particularly two men, a self-seeking soldier and the heir-presumptive to a dukedom. A searching and sympathetic study of character, the theme being the purifying and ennobling power of love. (Smith Elder. 6s.)

THE BETTER SORT. BY HENRY JAMES.

Eleven characteristic short stories. Some of the titles are "Broken Wings," "The Tone of Time," "Mrs. Medwin," "Flickerbridge," "The Beast in the Jungle." The first story opens with this sentence: "Conscious as he was of what was between them, though perhaps less conscious than ever of why there should at that time of day be anything, he would yet scarce have supposed they could be so long in a house together without some word or some look." (Methuen. 6s.)

THE GREY WIG. BY ISRAEL ZANGWILL.

"This volume," says Mr. Zangwill in a prefatory note, " . . . embraces my newest and oldest work." The book contains eight stories in varying moods, though most, as the author tells us in the dedication, "are mainly a study of woman." The title story is Mr. Zangwill almost at his best; in the second, "Chassé-Croisé," we have the ironic Mr. Zangwill. "'Love!' Her voice was bitter. 'Any bench in the park, any alley in Highmead, swarms with love.'" "The Big Bow Mystery" looks rather out of place in this collection. (Heinemann. 6s.)

PEARL MAIDEN. BY H. RIDER HAGGARD.

"A tale of the Fall of Jerusalem." The story opens at Cæsarea. "Herod Agrippa . . . now at the very apex of his power, celebrated a festival in honour of the Emperor Claudius, to which had flocked all the mightiest in the land and tens of thousands of the people." We hear of "the new sect called Christians," some of whom are to be cast to the wild beasts in the circus. (Longmans. 6s.)

THE HILL OF TROUBLE. BY A. C. BENSON.

A collection of twelve short stories, the note of which is struck in the quotation from Sir E. Burne-Jones which introduces them: "I mean by a picture a beautiful, romantic dream of something that never was, never will be—in a light better than any light that ever shone—in a land no one can define or remember, only desire—and the forms divinely beautiful—and then I wake up with the waking of Brynhild." The stories are touched with allegory, and have a quiet distinction and charm. (Isbister. 6s.)

HER LADYSHIP. BY T. W. SPEIGHT.

"A Romance of the House of Valmore." When the story opens "the eighteenth century was moribund, and the lurid star of the great-little Napoleon, newly risen above the horizon, was drawing all men's eyes to itself. . . ." We are introduced to Philip Gervis Valmore, Baron St. Oswyth, and then Mr. Speight proceeds to develop one of his familiar mystery stories. The last sentence runs: "One mystery they were destined never to fathom, and that was why her son did not succeed to the St. Oswyth peerage." (Chatto. 3s. 6d.)

CORNET STRONG OF IRETON'S HORSE. BY DORA GREENWELL MCCHESENEY.

A vigorous and effective historical novel. "'To-morrow,' said the man at length. 'So long I have been withheld by sickness and captivity; but to-morrow I must set forth.' 'It is the Lord's Day, but the work is His,' assented the woman, and laid a steady hand on the sword hilt." The story takes us to Marston Moor and Newbury Field, and skilfully suggests the fever and action of the time. The book also has human feeling and a strong sense of form. (Lane. 6s.)

MARTY. BY JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

Marty's mother conducted a second-hand clothes business, first in Great Castle Street, and then at a small villa in Rose Diamond Road. Marty married a clerk in a Government office with aristocratic connections, and then realising that her husband had "married beneath him," went away in order not to ruin his career. Mrs. Stannard tells the story with the ease and simplicity familiar to her readers. (White. 6s.)

'BERT EDWARD. BY HORACE HUTCHINSON.

The story of a golf caddie. "It was some years ago that 'Bert Edward arrived at St. Rule," and Mr. Hutchinson tells us that the picture of Pat Rogie does not hold good for the young professional golfer at St. Andrews in the present day. For "golping Scotland has arrived at a general standard of sobriety that would have shocked some of the older generation very badly." 'Bert Edward came from the Highlands, where an accident to his foot made it impossible for him to walk the heather. There is a "love interest." (Murray. 2s. 6d.)

THE KNIGHT PUNCTILIOUS. BY ARTHUR MOORE.

A complicated will story. Lady Fratton's will, made upon "one of those admirable printed forms—only fourpence half-penny at the stores," decides the destiny of the chief characters. Miles Vandale, who unexpectedly came into the money, was punctilious in the discharge of his father's liabilities. In obscurity he had entertained literary ambitions. (Methuen. 6s.)

SEAWARD FOR THE FOE. BY HEADON HILL.

"The long-threatened war-cloud had burst at last, and Great Britain stood face to face with allied France and Russia for the death-grip." A French submarine gunboat appears at Bournemouth, and Lieutenant Lesource calls at the Bath Hotel to demand of a South African millionaire who happens to be staying there, an indemnity of £500,000. "If not paid Captain de Boutron very much regret his duty to lay the town of Bournemouth in ashes. He beg me to say the 'Vengeur' carries six 19-centimètre guns, throwing melinite shell. 'They make a lot of mess,' added the lieutenant persuasively." (Ward Lock. 3s. 6d.)

DORRIEN OF CRANSTON. BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

"General Dorrien sits at the breakfast table in the cheerful dining-room at Cranston Hall, with a frown upon his face, and an open letter in his hand." The letter is from his eldest son, who had left the country eight years ago in disgrace. There is another son—his mother's favourite, "who would have taken first prize at an unlicked cub show." The entail ceases with General Dorrien, and hence the uncertainty of the succession, and the plot of the novel. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

Music or Mathematics?

CERTAINLY something is the matter with music. The youngest of the arts, started so gaily and with so firm a step on her career, she can scarcely have found a check in the nature of things already. Yet where are we? Ignore the ballad-concert and the "musical comedy"; take the Symphony Concert, as it is at the Queen's Hall this season. As signs of the times we may observe; first, the visitor who fixes the orchestra with his opera-glasses during, of all things, a superbly rendered Beethoven Symphony, as if to see the music; second, the votary who intently reads his programme during a Strauss tone-poem, as if to spell the music; and, last and most horrid portent, the reciter who, in a voice entirely unlike any other manifestation of energy in the universe, declaims, in a Greek costume, an English mistranslation of a Norwegian Saga to an orchestral accompaniment by Grieg, as if to shout music. How comes it, then, that in these days we try to see, spell, or shout music, which is neither vision nor words nor street cry, but beautiful sound?

It is the distinction of music that it has a scientific basis. Indeed, this is the apotheosis of mathematics. The prelude to "Parsifal" might be written, of course, in a series of vibration-numbers, each representing certain tones and qualities of tone. Hence one may find, embedded in a work on physics, surrounded by terrifying equations and formulæ, a definition which is the basis of music. A sound, it says, consists of rhythmical vibrations and is a musical note, or of arrhythmic and is a noise. It is this scientific basis which has given music its organic character of growth and development, until it has reached the stage of parasitic incrustation in which we see it to-day.

The musician's material is preordained to beauty. Ugly music is a contradiction in terms. Hence music fulfils, as no other art can fulfil, the definition of art as "the creation of beauty." To this must be added the singular anomaly that a mathematical criterion is available; so that we can say, in theory, that this will be a fine chord, in that its vibration numbers are as 4, 5, 6, 8 (the common chord), or a splendid voice, in that its overtones bear some correspondingly simple relation to the fundamental note.

To our mind, the explanation of Strauss, with his tone-poem dealing with the blackguardly history of a village thief; and of the audience which will listen unconvulsed to the discords between a woman's shouting voice and a dozen violins, and will gather up its traps and depart for afternoon tea in the midst of Mozart—the explanation is to be found in a positive degeneration, threatening to become a disappearance, of the ear for beauty. We speak of the cities, whose musical taste determines the fashion. How much the noise of the cities has to do with this, we cannot say. Certain it is that the ear of a child will shrink from the tone of a shrieking soprano, or the "crimson blaring" of a badly played trombone, whilst its seniors listen complacently, and if they have "culture," will speak of "power," "intensity," "vitality," or indeed of anything but beauty—which is quite out of the question. Our theses at this time are therefore: first, the loss of the sense of beauty in sound; and, second, the recent disordered action of the scientific principle in music.

As to this second, let us compare, as typical, two works performed, one in the afternoon, the other in the evening, in London on the first day of this year. They were "Die Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss, and the "Messiah," by Handel. Each deals with a worthy theme, a great life. Strauss's work, which takes much the less time to perform, took a little over two years, we believe, to compose. Handel wrote every note of the "Messiah" (done as it is nowadays by the Royal Choral Society under Sir Frederick Bridge, without the additional accompaniments by Mozart) in eleven days. His every phrase is lucid, unmistakable, final. In Strauss's "Hero's Life" the complexity is such that you must study the full score for many weary hours before you can begin to understand it. This is the result of the development of the sciences of counterpoint and orchestration which Berlioz and Wagner so greatly furthered, and which Strauss has carried to a stage that leaves the higher mathematics far behind, as it certainly does the power of the human ear to follow and understand. A comparison more precise than that between a choral and an instrumental work is to be found in the song. Compare a Gregorian chant, or Beethoven's "Nature's Praise of God," or Schubert's "Hymn to the Almighty," with Strauss's "Song of the Priestesses of Apollo," introduced to England by Miss Marie Brema last week. We will not comment upon the frightful discord of the brass in the accompaniment, nor upon the cymbals in the peroration. Take the thing as a whole. To begin with, it is not a song. The voice is a very secondary affair compared with the orchestra. Nor is there anything even distantly suggesting melody observable anywhere throughout. Go from this attempt to render praise in music, to hear the choir at the Brompton Oratory sing a "Gloria in Excelsis" by Haydn or Mozart. You cannot call both music—the term would cease to mean anything. Yet Strauss has moments of beauty. But he is obsessed by this idea of development, of scientific progress in music; not realizing that the hearing ear is the only judge. It cares not whether the work took a year or a day, whether it be for an unaccompanied solo violin, or written on special paper with forty staves for the biggest orchestra on record. It says, "Give me beauty": having which it is satisfied.

But the same want of simplicity and sense pervades nearly all modern work. Last week, at the Broadwood Concert, we heard Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's settings of some lyrics of Tennyson. Sir Charles in the "Revenge" gave us some moments worthy of the dignity and beauty of that ballad. To-day, however, he is older and must, of course, show the "development of his genius," as the misleading phrase has it. (We have heard a critic declare that no one familiar with Wagner's later work would suspect him of "Lohengrin," which it would certainly be impossible for such an one to sit through!) Well, Sir Charles's genius has developed, or rather he has allowed it to be swamped, thus. He takes the lyric "O! Swallow, Swallow, flying, flying South," which Schubert, who knew nothing about musical "science," would have made immortal, and sets it for four voices, two male and two female. Just imagine the inanity of making two men and two women sing together, for the sake of technical composition, words like those of "O! Swallow"! And, when this heterogeneous quartet has worked through the individual and personal apostrophe and has reached the last line—"tell her that I follow thee"—which is the be-all and the end-all of the poetry, lo! and behold, the technique or the "science" demands that the music shall fizzle out in guominy, as if the lover had said, after all his fine talking, "Well, thank goodness I haven't got to cross the Channel in this beastly weather." We venture to say that a child, singing those lines impromptu on its way up to bed, would make something more of the parting message, "I follow thee."

To the lover of beautiful tone, of simple melody, and of the true harmony it comes with the greatest shock to be told by the most modern critics that his idols were slaves of form. One of these critics, an admirer of Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (and why Strauss does not drop a brick at the back of the orchestra to represent the hanging of that rascal we know not), raised his startling eyebrows—"startled" his eyebrows—at an allusion to Handel, and disposed of that lovely air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," with the remark that it was "music made to order." Well, for ourselves, we prefer beauty and order to the not "admired disorder" of ugliness apeing beauty.

An Author at Grass.

THE critic is probably never so true to his office as when he wishes to resign it under an impulse to accept and enjoy a book that touches him intimately. Speaking, no longer as a judge, but as a man overcome, he would say: "This book interests, nourishes, calms me; it is a permanent addition to my pleasures; I shall read it often."

We think that not a few critics would be content to offer only this personal witness in regard to Mr. George Gissing's book, "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft." Under a veil of biography Mr. Gissing has given us a more compact and direct revelation of himself than can be captured in his novels. That such a revelation was worth having will not be questioned. To have read "The New Grub Street," "The Whirlpool," "Born in Exile," "Demos," "The Year of Jubilee," "A Life's Morning," "The Charlatan," "The Town Traveller," is at least to have learned that Mr. Gissing has an interesting mind. These twenty years he has been known for an intellectual novelist who unites observation made keen by experience with a literary power fed by scholarship. Mr. Gissing's "public" may not be large, but each one of his adherents has been individually won, not hustled into the ranks by a craze or a coterie. The career of no living novelist has been more individual. Year by year there has grown up a band of readers who, though they have never used the name (or invented a hymnology of discipleship), are sworn Gissingites. Some one said of a book, "If Daudet wrote it, I want it," and to-day there are those who say, "I will read anything of Gissing's." This is literary success: terms like fame and genius may wait.

Many may differ on Mr. Gissing's achievement; but few will demur to any praise, however warm, of his native ability, his acquired skill, and his singleness of mind in an age of literary opportunism. Unlog-rolled, unboomed—alas! that we should use such words—he has fared on through periods and popularities, winning nothing more showy than the hearty respect of everyone who can recognise a true man of letters. Averse from pyrotechny of thought or phrase, he has produced books which the panting fuglemen of reputations could not read while they ran. Excellent error! Yet he has that to offer which grows rarer every year, a slow, cultured, and sagacious grasp of reality. He has plunged into life with the crowd, then written of it with the grave solicitude of a thinker who knows that art is long and the world very old. It is inevitable that such work will engage men's minds afresh, will have a new and enlightened welcome.

And now, before his readers are really mustered, Mr. Gissing writes a book which, in a manner, is the coping-stone of his literary life. "Hoc erat in votis" are the simple Horatian words on the title page, and we are told of the suppositious Ryecroft: "I suspect that, in his happy leisure, there grew upon him a desire to write one more book, a book which should be written merely for his own satisfaction." The whole note of this, his imputed book, is heard in its personal testimonies of joy and regret. It is the man who is served by the author; the last touch of professional writing is gone; the things which had been said in character, or with circumstances of indirectness, are said with testamentary dignity—the gold of a life, hoarded and minted and rendered to Caesar. Perhaps every novelist of worth ought to write such a book, though to demand it would be presumption. Still, it would be good, if at the last, or earlier, a novelist would emerge from his world of creations and open his meaning in direct communications like these. That Mr. Gissing has written such a book is matter for gratitude; that, being written, it makes such correspondence with all his work is a proof of intellectual consistency.

We have no mind to describe the book in detail, nor shall we ask the reader to see in many quoted fragments the charm of the whole. We might dwell on its long sigh of relief at escape from the London literary scramble; its long sigh of contentment with unlooked-for leisure to taste the earth, the simple realities, and the inner spirit of books. We might bring in the intimacies and repulsions of place from a memory which has stored the dreariness of the City Road in fog, and the whiteness of a little town on the Acroceranion promontory. We might pass from Dickens to Tibullus, from Gibbon to Xenophon. We might seek the personal equation in many an arresting proposition. For the book remains the "incondite miscellany" to which its four chapters, named after the four seasons, lend a semblance of order sufficient for the eye and the approach: a revelation of self must needs be broken and diverse to have the unity of truth.

With unusual feelings we leave these delectable pages. It is seldom that a new book seems fit to be wedged between old. As we close it the winds of March are already sweeping through the night; the rain flings cold on the window; in the blackness the poplars sway and despair; and, when these voices are still, the immeasurable soft tumult of the distant forest rises like some vaster synthesis of all that men feel and would fain utter in books. How great a gift is any book of which one is quietly aware that one will read it when twenty Marches have stormed over roof and field.

Impressions.

XXII.—Stars and a Ship.

It was late in the evening in an hotel at Venice, and the tired sight-seers were gathered in the withdrawing-rooms that opened from the hall, chattering and reading the American and English newspapers. The talk—such as you may hear in any drawing-room in London or New York, slight, trivial, pleasant—was at its loudest when the Sailor came quietly through the swing doors. About him was the air of one who had passed his life under wide skies, in the company of his own simple thoughts. His clear eyes looked out from his bronzed face in search of his friends. Having found them, from the corner of the room to which they welcomed him came his deep voice, giving forth sonorously, in lulls of the general conversation, startling fragments of his adventures during his last voyage. Into that upholstered room leaked something of the wonder of the world. By degrees the sight-seers retired, till at last nobody was left but the Sailor and his friends. I joined them.

As the night wore on he talked more freely, and when one asked him what sights had made the most impression on him during the disastrous voyage, he answered, "The Stars and a Ship. As I have said, we were on the island three weeks before we were rescued. It was flat, and at night, lying awake, stretched on my back, there seemed to be nothing in the whole world but the great Southern sky blazing with stars, and myself. I had always cared about astronomy, and as I lay there night after night bits of knowledge, half forgotten, came back to me, and, piecing them together, I brooded myself into that immensity till I seemed to understand. I realised with extraordinary vividness the procession of the Great Nebula in Orion across the firmament. And in the middle of that stupendous fire mist was the great multiple star. I saw, I think, some of the faint stars, so remote that if the tidings of the first Christmas at Bethlehem could have been flashed by telegraph to them, the message would still be travelling through space. Then I gazed at the nearest star, Alpha Centauri, visible in those latitudes, and I saw the two great suns of which it is composed slowly revolving round each other, doing their part in the stupendous movement of the heavenly worlds in a plan that has been unchanged since the beginning of things. Nothing else seemed worth doing, but to lie there at night and dream of the evolution of those bodies eternally obeying the will of the Creator.

"It was in the very early morning that the ship which rescued us came. It was light, there were no stars, the sea was a great desolate waste, as if man had never done anything to disturb the early simplicity of the world as it looked when ready for man. I was staring idly out at the sea when suddenly I heard a whistle, and from behind the headland shot out a big steamer. The apparition was so sudden that I could not signal. Action was impossible in the thought of all that vessel meant. Out of the brown earth, with nothing but his own hands to help him, man dug and made for his use every appliance, every luxury that that vessel contained. Steam, the compass, lighting, books, foods, clothes, everything had been found and fashioned by him with no help but his own brains and hands. It seemed so wonderful, that I said to myself—"

"Yes?"

"I hardly like to say it here, but that steamer alone on the sea put it into my head. I thought the Creator must be a little astonished at all the things man has grubbed out of the old brown earth."

Egeria's Childhood.

In her pretentious preface to a book, "The Romance of My Childhood and Youth," by Mme. Edmond Adam (Heinemann), whose chief charm should consist in its simplicity, Madame Adam (Juliette Lamber) makes the mistake of taking herself seriously as a writer; whereas her sole claim upon our notice is the fact that she has been a public woman, one who held in days now almost forgotten a political salon. As a writer Juliette Lamber does not count. To-day in Paris you will hear malcontents assert that Madame Adam is the true type of the sort of woman who wins her way into a conspicuous place under Republican rule—the epitome of pretentious mediocrity—without a particle of distinction. There is no use in reminding these malcontents of the Dubarrys of Royalist rule. Théroigne de Méricourt is at present being held up to reactionary reprobation, since M. Hervieu has recalled her to public consideration, as the epitome of the Revolution. Perhaps when the annals of Gambetta's times come to be ransacked for literary or dramatic purposes a hundred years hence, some playwright or literary portraitist will seize the personality of Madame Adam, and throw slight upon the Third Republic by showing up the common and inferior quality of its Egerias. True Madame Adam has now, by her conversion, gone over to the turbulent and so-called patriotic minority. But in this light she plays no more part than Théroigne at la Salpêtrière. To live in the memory of men she must be content to be known as Gambetta's Egeria, as the lovely president of an intriguing political salon which was a kind of succursale of the minister's cabinet. Later on she associated herself with the Russian Alliance through her review, "La Nouvelle Revue," and a complaisant coterie helped her to believe in her own political importance long after the hour of sunset.

To come forward with the romance of her childhood and youth, as that of a woman who has lived life to the full, sought repose from the complications of varied romances and politics in the writing of a few unreadable novels, is a thing perfectly justifiable in itself. But why preface it with such arrant stuff as Madame Adam's inflated commonplaces translated into common English? Here is a sentence taken at hazard: "It requires time to discover the master thought of any work of real worth in order to disclose its high morality, its art tendencies." Could anything be in more doubtful taste than such writing as this set before a record of childhood? "Art tendencies" may be American for aught we know, but it is very vile English. Another long quotation from this impossible preface will give the author's measure: "The asking of a question or two, and even the explanation of a phenomenon which is often as clear as day, can be undertaken as we hurry along, but simply to examine the 'whys and wherefores' of things, or to attempt to discover the laws of facts, or group them methodically, giving the logical relations of these laws in general origins—verily, only a few vulgar, slang words can express the impression made on the minds of those who wish to be considered 'modern men,' with respect to these very problems of which we of the elder generation are so fond, and which are called by the modern stuff." I have not read this choice passage in the original French, so cannot pronounce upon the injustice it may have suffered at the hands of the translator, but it is not encouraging as an invitation to perusal of the book.

Childhood is always an interesting study, but the absence of style and of what Madame Adam would grandiloquently call "art tendencies," but what I prefer to call the revelation of the artist, is here so conspicuous, the place being so lamentably filled with a tiresome pedantry, an unchildlike tone of speech and reflection, that "The Romance of My Childhood and Youth" falls flat as entertainment, and adds nothing to our knowledge of a complex and engaging period. From the point of view of literature, the French is so utterly common, so undistinguished, so lacking in all the qualities of French prose, that no translation could do it signal injustice. The book opens with a description of the romantic grandmother, which contains all the elements of an original portrait, but on the fourth page we are repelled by a confession of a childish instinct carried out so faithfully in after life. "Between my father and my grandfather I applied myself, instinctively at first, determinedly later, to be something. Was that the starting-point of my resolve to be somebody?" This is the parvenu's touch: genius is spontaneous and unconscious in its early revelation. We hear of relatives "very properly educated." The story of the grandmother's romantic search and choice of a husband, if told prettily and quaintly, would make a charming tale, but grace, wit and humour are not qualities we must look for in Madame Adam, and so our consolation lies in the fact that these sketches may serve a future novelist or short-story teller, who, having Molière's belief that he must take his material where he finds it, would do well to steal this odd and amusing Pélagie and her lover Pierre Seron, and serve them up again renewed and vitalised by art.

Madame Adam's father, a Jacobin of the Revolutionary school, is a sympathetic figure, the mother insupportable, and all the family troubles and quarrels dull enough in spite of the originality of some of the characters. Little Juliette was spoiled between them all, and being talkative and quick she was soon accepted in the domestic circle as a genius, and allowed to dominate everybody, grandfather, grandmother, and father. Only her mother had sense to recognise that she was "a pretentious little chatterbox." "My grandfather did not wish that they should 'clean' me every day, water he declared made pimples on the face. . . . One cannot imagine nowadays how little they washed themselves in our Picardy in the year of grace 1839. They soaped their faces only on Sundays in the kitchen, and their hands every morning."

Quite the prettiest thing in the book, almost pretty enough to justify it, is the visit to the great-aunts. The donkey and these three old ladies, living like recluses, never having once in the course of their lives gone beyond their garden, and dressing like peasants, are really delightful. "I was less of a child than these five women, including Marguerite, who ate at the same table with us. They were interested in little nothings: my manner of talking, my funny ways, my assurance and important air were taken in earnest whenever any great questions were discussed. My aunts were delighted to find their minds in constant movement under my impulsion." Aunt Sophie teaches her Latin and translates the "Bucolics" to her, they talk together of Homer and Virgil, and Aunt Constance teaches her to cut grass and clover for the donkey while they discuss Sismondi's history of the Italian Republics. Bred in such an original atmosphere, the amazing thing is that Juliette Lamber did not turn out an original character herself. The refined and gracious charm of these delicate little old ladies of Soissons, preserving intact the quaint features of old maidenhood shut out from the world, cultured and obscure, is worthy a tale of Hawthorne or Mrs. Gaskell. Not dull old ladies their niece represents them, but "witty, quizzical, and gay," we are not surprised that the last surviving at eighty told her niece "she did not like her epoch." Nothing could be more unlike them than the further development of their niece with her youthful politics, her inexplicable marriage, and its no less inexplicable consequences. The book reads better in English than in French, and is interesting as the story of a full and active life.

H. L.

Lamb's Composite Portraits.

To his confession: "I love to lose myself in other men's minds," Lamb might well have added: "and I love to lose other men's minds in my own." Books thought for him, giving to his receptive mind striking passages which, appropriated with no conscious effort of memory, became part of his mental wealth to be re-issued when called for in forms differing in some instances so slightly from their originals as to appear what they purported to be—virgin quotations, verbally untouched. But on examination, the work of the meddler becomes apparent; and we see how, as with his own loved Izaak Walton, his quotations are but what he thought them to be; to verify them he troubled himself in no way. In many cases what he undoubtedly considered actual transcripts were unmistakable improvisations.

Akin to such attitude was that which permitted (or prompted) him to carry into his writings names, occurrences, characters, combining, deleting or adding to as the whim moved him with the result that those seeking now-a-days for Lamb-origins and prototypes find themselves in a bewildering maze.

That in every case Lamb's characters had their respective prototypes cannot, I think, be questioned. To build up a character, it was necessary that he should have a "somebody" to work from: he nearly always discarded his model after it had furnished him with the required start, but he needed some definite personality to begin with.

How careful he was to hide away his model on the first possible opportunity might be seen in his treatment of "Captain Jackson." Here it would appear that immediately he touched his original he thrust it from him, in some overpowering dread. Little wonder that "Captain Jackson" has so far "baffled research"!

"Captain Jackson" originally appeared in the "London Magazine" for November 1824; and the paper, it will be remembered, begins: "Among the deaths in our obituary for this month, I observe with concern 'At his cottage on the Bath Road, Captain Jackson' He whom I mean was a retired half-pay officer." The essay is—well! Elia, and as such offers scope to all students of Lamb who care to pursue the subject. Suffice it for us here to direct attention to the obituary column of the "London Magazine" for December 1821, where particulars are given of the death of Lamb's old friend Captain (recently gazetted Rear-Admiral) Burney, at his house, St. James Street, Buckingham Gate, in his seventy-second year.

Then with reference to Mrs. Battle—"old Sarah Battle (now with God), who, next to her devotions, loved a good game of whist!" Lamb tells us that she died in "that haunted room" in Blakesmoor in H-shire. Some particular elements of her composition probably did, but others clearly continued to exist in the personality of Mrs. Burney, whose "determined questioning of the score, after the game was absolutely gone to the d—l," was one of the old images revived in Lamb's mind by a letter of Ayrton's in 1830.

We all know of the intimacy between Lamb and Tom Hood. Hood, it will be remembered, married in 1824 a daughter of Reynolds, the writing-master of Christ's Hospital, who lived in Little Britain. About this time Hood wrote a facetious proposal of marriage in verse addressed to "Mrs. Battle, care of Mrs. Reynolds, Little Britain"; and this prompts us to enquire whether any Mrs. Battle was known to the Reynoldses. If not, one of two conjectures might be correct: either that in the Reynolds circle some one lived answering sufficiently to Lamb's picture of the immortal Mrs. Battle to cause friends to conclude that she was the original; or that, as a result of Lamb's presentment of Mrs. Battle as the incarnation of the temper of the game, anyone devoted to whist became known as of the tribe of Battle, and that one such enthusiast lived, at the time of Hood's writing, under the Reynolds's roof. We incline to the opinion that Hood knew no actual Mrs. Battle.

As to the name Sarah Battle! If the two Mrs. B.'s—Battle and Burney—were identical, we have not far to seek for part of it. Mrs. Burney's Christian name was Sarah. For Battle we must go further a-field.

Before me as I write lies a little octavo in old brown calf, entitled "Vulgar Errors in Divinity Removed," published in 1683. The Dedication is signed Ralph Battell. It is just such a book as Lamb would have picked up for a few pence on one of his rambles. Between its pages is a letter in the autograph of Allan Cunningham, dated August 28, 1822, regretting his inability to accept his correspondent's welcome invitation, adding: "In the course of eight or ten days I will hazard an evening call on you—your prints and your company will be enough—the addition of Irish whisky would make a feast for the gods." I like to think that this book was once the property of Lamb, and that this letter was addressed to him, escaping in some way the fate of his friends' communications. But there is no proof of this, and the name of the addressee is wanting in the letter.

It is, however, possible that the name of the author of the book furnished Lamb with his "Battle," as Mrs. Burney's had given him "Sarah." There is also, I think, sufficient similarity between some of the text of Battell's "Vulgar Errors" and that of Lamb's "Mrs. Battle's Opinions on Whist," to make it likely that a copy of the former was not only in the possession of Elia, but was also read by him, about the time his essay was written.

Lamb probably also took from this old author's name the "Ralph" of his "Ralph Bigod" (the John Fenwick of "The Two Races of Men," an essay written about the same time as "Mrs. Battle"). Lamb's "The latter are born degraded: 'He shall serve his brethren,'" appears but a compression of the old author's "The elder shall serve the younger, as it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated. . . . These words are not spoken of 'Jacob' or 'Esau's' persons, but by a figure the person of either is put to represent and shadow cut the condition of their Posterities," and so on.

Another Lamb production of this period was "A Quakers' Meeting." Anyone reading it together with passages such as "He assisting us with inward motions, carrying forth our affections with zeal and fervency, further than naturally they would tend," might easily be pardoned for associating with Elia's production the chapter Battell entitles, "Vulgar Errors Concerning Praying by the Spirit Removed."

Take again the case of Lamb's Mr. Hedges, who for some reason seems to have been associated in his mind with his friend Tobin. In a letter to Southey, August 9, 1815, Lamb writes: "Tobin is dead. But there is a man in my office, a Mr. Hedges, who prosed it away from morning to night, and never gets beyond corporal and material verities. . . . When I can't sleep o' nights, I imagine a dialogue with Mr. Hedges, upon any given subject, and go prosing on in fancy with him, till I either laugh or fall asleep." In his "Christ's Hospital Five and Thirty Years Ago," Lamb gives us the picture of a monitor, "one H——, who, I learned in after days, was seen expiating some maturer offence in the hulks." (Do I flatter myself in fancying that this might be the planter of that name, who suffered—at Nevis, I think, or St. Kitts—some few years since? My friend Tobin was the benevolent instrument of bringing him to the gallows.) This petty Nero actually branded a boy, who had offended him, with a red-hot iron; and nearly starved forty of us, with exacting contributions, to the one-half of our bread, to pamper a young ass," &c. Was the Mr. Hedges of the India House, with his "material verities," the grown-up H——, the "petty Nero" of Christ's Hospital? His fellow-clerk Pitman once got Lamb to solve for him the riddle of the initials and asterisks of the "Essays of Elia," and against this "H——" Lamb set down "Hodges," a disguise we can well understand, if the Hedges of his office was really the individual intended. The MS. to which I refer lies before me, and the alterations in it in Lamb's autograph are interesting. Against "S——" he had at first written "Stevens died in Bedlam," and "M——" had been interpreted as "Middleton dismissed school." "Stevens" was subsequently altered to "Scott," and "Middleton" to "Maunde." But the o in "Hodges" did not become an e.

It might interest readers to know, in connection with the above, that Lamb presented a copy of his 1798 "Rosamund Gray" to a certain Henry Hedges.

Drama.

The Seriousness of Comedy.

I TAKE it that the quality which chiefly differentiates true comedy, not only from farce, but also from the various forms of pseudo-comedy, is its extreme seriousness. The end of farce is sheer laughter, the crackling of thorns beneath the pot. The end of the so-called comedy of intrigue is a narrative interest, in the neat unravelling of an ingenious plot. True comedy, on the other hand, has always its strenuous outlook upon life. Through laughter it aims straight at the moral sense, and more than one reformer has found with Mr. Bernard Shaw that its incidental merriment is the best of anæsthetics, when the knife of progressive ideas is to be applied to the slow intelligence of a bourgeois society. Herein it has the advantage, if one likes to put it so, of tragedy. Aristotle said—perhaps in the regrettable absence of Mr. A. B. Walkley I may be allowed to quote Aristotle—that tragedy is more philosophical than history. He might have gone on to say that comedy is more ethical than tragedy. Tragedy, indeed, is hardly concerned with ethics as such at all. It awakens the pity and awe which spring from the clash and collision of the great with the greater. Moral greatness may be, and often is, one of the forces which it marshals, but in the tragic view moral greatness, like any other form of human greatness, must inevitably be overwhelmed in the collision with fate or circumstance, or stupidity, or something still greater than itself. And is the issue of suicide, which is generally the ultimate expression of the pessimism of tragedy, anything else than the negation of that will to live in which, when rightly understood, the moral sense is found to be rooted?

It is, of course, this ethical character of comedy which makes it attractive to so serious a mind as that of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones. For the mere manner of comedy Mr. Jones has not, to my thinking, any special aptitude. His humour is rarely irresponsible. His dialogue does not flower naturally into epigram. He relies largely upon his interpreters—safely enough when they are Mr. Arthur Boucher and Miss Violet Vanbrugh—to put the fun into his plays. But the moral purpose, which is the heart of the matter, he can generally be trusted to supply. "Whitewashing Julia," now, at the Garrick, is just what a comedy should be, a deft entertainment, and an adroitly insinuated sermon on the desirability of social charity. Its theme is a variation on that of "The School for Scandal." Lady Pinkney is the Lady Sneerwell of the Scandal Club in the little cathedral town of Shanctonbury, and the Hon. Bevis Pinkney, who is married to the bishop's daughter, combines the parts of Joseph Surface and Sir Benjamin Backbite. The opening scene is placed in the refreshment tent of a charitable bazaar, and the club is engaged in the congenial task of passing a social ostracism upon Julia Wren, who has returned to Shanctonbury, the home of her childhood, under the shadow of a somewhat vague scandal, in which a Grand Duke at Homburg and a puff-box standing where it ought not are conspicuous features. Julia, if I understand Mr. Jones aright, is an essentially true-natured woman, although I am bound to admit that Miss Vanbrugh gave a touch of ambiguity to the part by occasionally reminding one of the adventuress in "My Lady Virtue." Nothing is more tedious than the analysis of the plot of a comedy; and I do not propose to relate the steps by which, mainly through the agency of the genial and broad-minded amorist, William Stillingfleet, the overthrow of the Hon. Bevis and the rehabilitation of Mrs. Wren in Shanctonbury society are brought about.

Mr. Jones' moral, for all its very different expression, is precisely that of the Tolstoyan juryman in "Resurrection," whose sole contribution to the trial of the Maslova is the reiterated truth, "We are none of us saints!" The best of it is that the true story of the puff-box, like that of "ould Grouse in the gun-room," is never told. I observe that such of my colleagues of the daily papers as were allowed to be present at the first night's performance are inclined to make a grievance of this. No, no doubt, were the good folk of Shantontbury. To me it seems to reveal a lighter touch than is quite usual with Mr. Jones. Perhaps he has been studying in the school of Mr. Henry James.

The twentieth-century critic is ashamed of nothing so little as of ignorance. And why therefore should I hesitate to confess that my enjoyment of Sudermann's "Es Lebe das Leben" at the Great Queen Street Theatre was very considerably interfered with by a most imperfect acquaintance with colloquial German. Nor is the guttural speech of our distant kinsmen and temporary allies, apart from the ideas which it is used to convey, precisely—like the sweet sound

That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odour! Enough; no more!

As a matter of fact I made my pilgrimage to Great Queen Street less to see Sudermann's play than to see the distinguished Berlin actress, Madame Rosa Bertens, who had come to London to take her original part of Beate von Kellinhausen. It was well worth while. Madame Bertens acts with great intelligence, with real emotional force when necessary, and with an absence of restlessness and exaggeration from which some of our own tragédiennes might well take example. For the study of the mimic art it is perhaps in some ways an advantage rather than a drawback to be slightly at sea with the language. You learn how much really depends upon gesture, upon facial expression, upon intonation, upon all the shade and colour which a trained interpreter instinctively adds to the bare outline of the text. But the play itself may serve to illustrate what I have already said about the essentially unmoral character of tragedy as compared with that of comedy. I speak, of course, of its direct didactic intention, not of the purification of the imagination and the emotions which accompanies it. Beate von Kellinhausen has lived her life, and has brought it into an inextricable tangle. She is divided between her affection for her husband and children, and her old passion, now no more than a loyal friendship, for Richard von Völkerlingk. Richard's own life is bound up in his political future, which is threatened by the disclosure of his former relations with Beate. For the sake of this future and for the sake of her daughter who is to marry Richard's son, Beate will atone. She takes poison and leaves her secret buried in the hearts of her husband and her lover. She has lived her life. My point is that, while such a theme touches close upon realities of human existence, it does not pass any judgment upon them. It states facts as they are, traces the interwoven motives of action, and shows the sorrowful issues to which they lead. But it does not offer a solution of those issues or suggest an ideal from which they may be excluded. It does not, directly, condemn or teach. The "ought" is left out of it. Now comedy, however much it may adorn its lesson with arabesques of wit and fancy, always has its eye on the "ought."

Art.

Grave, New, and Gay.

FIRST, the Grave: what word so fitly describes the best old English mezzotints? Under the austere command of this art, which modern haste has hustled into desuetude, even the portraits of beautiful women of a past day take on a gravity and repose that their youth does not deserve. The old mezzotints are no longer within reach of slender purses: they are in fashion now, and humble admirers must seek them in the windows of shops in bye-streets, or in such an exhibition as that open just now at Messrs. Colnaghi's in Pall Mall. Last year at this season Valentine Green's work was being shown, now James and Thomas Watson are honoured. The Watsons were not related, and little is known about these two industrious men who left to the world so much that is beautiful. James was born in Ireland in 1739, he exhibited at Spring Gardens, and he died in 1790. Thomas was born in London in 1743, he kept a print shop in Bond Street, and he died in 1781. As patient unambitious men one thinks of them, hard-working, poring over the plates year after year, well content to be the interpreters of the creations of greater men, and spreaders of their fame. For one man who has seen a particular portrait by Sir Joshua, thousands know it through the mezzotints of such engravers as the Watsons. There are fifty-three mezzotints at Messrs. Colnaghi's, and thirty-four are after Sir Joshua Reynolds. Many of the pictures from which they are engraved are familiar. Who else but Sir Joshua would and could have painted C. J. Fox sporting with the Ladies Sarah Lennox and Susan Strangways, which James Watson engraved? Who else could have given that group the distinction of the grand manner? One elegant companion stands with Fox, gazing upwards, the other leans from a window holding a dove in her hand. In another of James Watson's mezzotints, Mrs. Hale, as Euphrosyne, walks swiftly and lightly across the plate with sandalled feet; in a third, the strong, eloquent face of Edmund Burke gazes out at the spectator. Among the mezzotints by Thomas Watson, who is the finer artist of the two, there is Sir Joshua's beautiful Mrs. Crewe. She is seated against a tree, her chin resting on her hand, reading, against a background of water and hills. Here, too, is the celebrated set of "Windsor Beauties" after Lely, and after Sir Joshua the unforgettable portrait of Garrick, the Bartolozzi, and Warren Hastings in a flowered waist-coat. The same feeling of repose and gravity informs all. The Watsons, and their fellow-workers, having mastered the art, were content to go on quietly, improving if possible, but not seeking other channels of expression for their talent. To pass from these mezzotints hanging on the walls of their quiet room to the twenty-first exhibition of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers and Engravers on the other side of Pall Mall, is like being taken from some venerable ancestral house to a modern hotel quite new, very luxurious, and cosmopolitan.

Second, the New: stand for a minute in the middle of the gallery where the two hundred and seventy-three exhibits of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers hang, and you will recognise that "the New" is a fitting description. A few still practise mezzotint: fewer still interpret the work of other men. Who would think of making a mezzotint of a Sargent portrait? We are painter-etchers now, and engravers with ebullient temperaments. Mr. Alfred East pauses in his painting, and takes a plate to express his vision of "A Cotswold Farm" or "Stow-on-the-Wold." The result is interesting, decorative, akin to tapestry, new, very new, an expression of individuality, but not the frank English country we saw as a background to Thomas Watson's mezzotint of Sir Joshua's "Mrs. Crewe." The climes have been explored for subjects. On the walls of this exhibition my eye is caught by a scene where polar bears are the chief actors; by a woman of fashion driving in a smart carriage; by a Russian Rabbi; by the Shambles, York; by the Debtor's Door, Newgate Prison; by George Fox on the Haystack; by Beggars at a Belgian Church Door; by a scene from the second book of Esdras; by the Cradle of a Mermaid. But with the memory of the grave Watson mezzotints over the way still with me, it was M. Helleu's large, slight, brilliant presentments of Parisian ladies that spoke in clearest voice of the new methods of the new men. There, Catherine, Lady Bampfylde, and the Beauties of Windsor—here, Mme. L. and Mdle. X. The contrast between the two methods is suggestive, and illustrates the change from the old to the new. Over one of these etchings of fashionable beauties—dainty, delicate, soulless—the arrangement of their hair, the design of their frocks illustrating the latest mode, M. Helleu spent an infinitesimal portion of the time that one of the Watsons took to complete a mezzotint. They look it. There was a time when these Mdle. X.'s were novel and seemed very attractive, but the eye tires, appreciation droops, when one sees them year after year, always pretty, always smart, and always conforming to the same type. M. Chahine affords another example of the cleverness which titillates without leaving any abiding sense of pleasure. His "Viel Ouvrier Sans Travail" slouching down the pavement is extremely clever, and no doubt a typical presentment of one of the French unemployed. It should be judged on its merits as a brilliant specimen of the work of a modern painter-etcher, but that other portrait of Edmund Burke, the grave mezzotint by James Watson, with its velvety texture and rich blacks loomed up before me, and, without fuss, displaced the brilliant "Viel Ouvrier Sans Travail." Some of the etchings, however, stood their ground—some which express a personal and restrained note of accomplishment, such as the work of Mr. Frank Short. The lines of his "Old Steaming Box at Lynn" have real beauty: this etching shows once more how a quite ordinary object can become pictorial in the hands of the man who has mastered the difficult art of knowing what to reject. Mr. Charles Holroyd is also an accomplished master in the art of rejection, not so much in his interiors, but certainly in his landscape plates. In the absence of Mr. Strang and Mr. Cameron, who have retired from the Society, I find in Mr. Holroyd the etcher whose work gives me the most pleasure. Again and again I returned to look at his "Cypress Trees near Siena, the Osservansa in the distance." Here is the true feeling for Italian landscape. The six trees stand up, in noble simplicity, on the hillside, filling and decorating the spacious country, giving its sentiment and its character. Fine too, and dignified is his "Great End, Scawfell, and Sprinkling Tarn," so simple in composition, with the dark rock reflected in the still water. Mr. Holroyd's work is new and modern, as the intense feeling for landscape is modern, but his work has also something of the simplicity and dignity of the old.

Third, the Gay: gaiety is the note of the two hundred and more little pictures by members of the Langham Sketching Club now being shown at the Woodbury Gallery. The Club, which was founded in 1838, meets every Friday evening during the winter season, "when its members devote two hours to producing sketches of given subjects, and afterwards sup together." Here are crowds of little pictures done in high spirits, against time, the activity of his neighbour urging each one to excel, and supper at the end. A grave subject may find a place, or a sad one, but the note of these pictures done at high speed is gaiety—a right note to end on.

Science.

A Chain—or a Spur?

It would be but superficial to regard Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace's remarkable article in the "Fortnightly Review" as a mere matter of idiosyncrasy. But colour is lent to this view by the ease with which his statements may be refuted. In brief, his conclusion is this: The earth is the actual centre of the universe, and the position of man upon it is special and probably unique. The supreme end and purpose of this vast universe was the production and development of the living soul in the perishable body of man.

This paper is certainly the logical outcome of the curious course of Dr. Wallace's mind during several past decades. Worthless in itself, it is yet to me of the gravest significance as a study in mind—in mind using wrong methods. Long ago Dr. Wallace independently conceived the theory of organic evolution. He fought well for it when people cared and fighting was needed. So much work, indubitably, has Dr. Wallace done for the world. The good remains. His name will be remembered in its relation to the supreme discovery of the ages, the discovery of which the publication of the "Origin of Species" in 1859 may be taken as the landmark. The generalisation of evolution is the lasting legacy of that century to its successors. But the deductions from that fact are entirely another matter. A materialism astoundingly crude was the expression of the swing of the pendulum in the 'sixties. It is rampant, of course, to-day, though in a very different form.

In a recently published letter Ruskin expressed his opinions upon Lord Avebury's list of the "hundred best books." Amongst those through which he dashed an angry pen, as objectionable and dangerous, was Darwin's thunderbolt above referred to. And how wise were his reasons. The book seemed to him dangerous, because it attracted a crowd of idle, curious people concerned with the secondary question of their history and descent, whilst forgetful of their proper realm of thought, the primary question of their immediate personal business here and now. To all such, Darwin, in Ruskin's delightful words, was "like a dim comet wagging its tail of phosphorescent nothing across the steadfast stars." The comment was only too just. The deduction from evolution was, that if man be brother to the worm, he is practically but a worm; that if his ancestor be Simian and gibbering—the "dead-sea ape" of Carlyle—to the body of this death he is for ever chained. Dr. Wallace's attempt to reinstate the Ptolemaic Cosmogony, and to prove that man is the very centre and apex of all things, is the reaction from this hopeless view. Both methods of reasoning are faulty. But, of the two, the later is infinitely preferable, infinitely nearer to the truth. Wisdom is justified of her children. Dr. Wallace's wisdom is in the conviction—innate, intuitive, call it what you will—the truth of which he has sought by a method as futile as superfluous to prove.

For my Simian ancestry perturbs me no whit. I cannot for the life of me see why the means of my production should affect the validity of me. The evolutionist, with whom Dr. Wallace was himself so long identified, and from whom he has now so completely sundered himself, has lost the glory of to-day and the promise of the future in the unmasking of his past. If evolution be purely a matter of retrospect, Ruskin's expurgation is justified, and Dr. Wallace's wild article is a splendid, if desperate protest.

If a given sun or planet were proved to be the centre of the universe, that physical relation, great indeed to think upon, would be nothing worth beside the smallest of the unselfish acts or noble thoughts of man. That is to say, if the dwellers on that supposed centre were merely beasts or blackguards, then Mother Earth and her brood would take precedence of them by right divine. Therefore the mere question of position in space, upon which Dr. Wallace has argued at such length, is beside the point. But, to his mind, it is part of the argument. Man's value to the universe, he thinks, depends in some measure upon the position of the globe which he inhabits. Now this is an indication of the folly of Dr. Wallace's method. He seems to me to be trying to prove the great instant fact of the present by reference to the past. For, despite himself, he is an evolutionist at bottom; and, among scientists, that is to be, with rare exceptions, like Lot's wife. She, as they of themselves, knew whence she had come. She, like them, must vainly look backwards. They, like her, are therefore become pillars of salt.

And this is where I follow Stevenson and Tennyson and Drummond. There is no need for splendid revolt against evolution, no need for wild theorizing. It is correct, I am told, to decry Tennyson's later work. Mr. Andrew Lang, in his lifelet of the seer, makes no mention of one or two poems which, for their relation to the great thoughts of a momentous epoch, are certain of immortality. Now I adore the melody of the Juvenilia. "Where Claribel low-lieth" is a line that ever delights me. But, among his unread work, Tennyson gave us a line that has another value: "As he stands on the heights of his life with a glimpse of a height that is higher." Now it is a matter of interest only remote and speculative to me how much headway they have made in Mars. I have one or two friends with whom I would dare challenge the best of any race on any planet, central or circumferential, in the Universe. They establish our "Place in Nature" finally enough for me. I do not need Dr. Wallace to argue from the depth of the Atlantic or the nature of atmospheric dust that man is a little lower than the angels. A few among our fellows make that patent enough—thank God—to most of us.

The monkey is to man the pledge for posterity. When I know what he implies, I cease to consider him further. Ourselves and our children are far more interesting. Ages yet unborn will recall the nineteenth—as Dr. Wallace has called it, the "wonderful"—century for its establishment of the supreme theory of evolution. They will forget the deductions of that century. It had made such an astounding induction that its power of reasoning forwards was in abeyance. I would have the men of the twentieth century to be remembered as well, and perhaps even more gratefully, by posterity. How we should respect the monkey if we knew that he had guessed the truth and had planned and plotted to make the most of his latent possibilities—that we might be! So, in a distant æon, ere the sun has grown too cold, may the transfigured men who wear our form, but who have achieved all that our noblest have but dared to dream—may they look back on us and say, "The men of the nineteenth century found the Truth, but the men of the twentieth looked 'before and after,' and pined and strove for what indeed was not, but, by the promise of that Truth, assuredly was to be."

The Characters of Theophrastus.

SIR,—With reference to your "Bookworm's" paragraph concerning the new translation of the "Characters" of Theophrastus, in which it is stated that "the most modern version till now, has been that of Isaac Taylor (1836)," will you permit me to point out the singular omission of all mention of Prof. Jebb's admirable translation, published in 1870 by Messrs. Macmillan? This, I believe, is now out of print. As it is obviously out of the question to suppose that the new translators are also in ignorance of Prof. Jebb's edition, it is difficult to conceive an adequate reason for their work of seeming supererogation.

Nietzsche.

SIR,—Apropos of the review of Nietzsche's "Dawn of Day" in last week's ACADEMY, may I suggest that the erratic way in which the English translation of Nietzsche's works is being issued may in some measure account for the imperfect understanding and slight appreciation his writings have met with in England.

No author is more difficult to sample haphazard than Nietzsche. To begin at the wrong end with "Der Fall Wagner" and the esoteric prose poem "Zarathustra," then to jump a little further back to "Morgenröthe," is a course well calculated to baffle and perplex the reader. But to read Nietzsche's works in their proper order, as they came hot from the forge of his fiery brain, is to follow tentatively the evolutions of a remarkable mind not least remarkable for its plasticity, and to gain a clear insight into an astoundingly complex personality. One should first make acquaintance with Nietzsche in "Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik," that glorious "first careless rapture" of youthful enthusiasm written under the magic spell of the sunny Greeks and Richard Wagner. To the same period belong the four masterly essays, "Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen," dealing respectively with Strauss, Schopenhauer, The Teaching of History, and Richard Wagner in Bayreuth. "Menschliches Allzumenschliche" marks the crisis in Nietzsche's career when he separated himself from Wagner. "Morgenröthe" and "Die Fröhliche Wissenschaft" show him groping in the blind alleys of materialism towards the mountain-top on which he emerges as the rose-crowned Zarathustra. After came "Jenseits von Gut und Böse; Zur Genealogie der Moral," and the bombshells hurled at Wagner and all old idols and existing institutions in the volume called "Götzendämmerung," which also contains "Antichrist," the only fragment extant of what was designed to be Nietzsche's masterpiece, the great "Umwerthung aller Werthe," the gospel he would have proclaimed for "Uebersmenschen" of the future, when the eclipse of his intellect came, and he sank into eternal night.

Between the "Birth of Tragedy," published in 1871, and "Antichrist," in 1889, lies the Homeric combat of a soul. Those who have not traced it phase by phase as it is recorded in Nietzsche's successive works, cannot hope to get any clear grasp of his philosophy or to estimate its significance.—Yours, &c.,

"To a Nightingale."

SIR,—Reading your "Art on the Dissecting-Table," I am led to send you the following, written when Prof. Wm. C. Wilkinson was bold enough to tamper with the ode, "To a Nightingale":—

As she of old was famed to do,
And of her victims blinder none
Than William can't C. Wilkinson.

Children and Words.

SIR,—The paragraph in the ACADEMY concerning the coinage of words by children, reminds me of a child of my acquaintance who invariably "off" her hat or boots or gloves, and "unparcel" any package. "Bettern't" I have heard used by several different children.—Yours, &c.,

"John Buncle."

SIR,—Our attention has been drawn to the paragraph in your issue of the week before last, wherein you suggest that a reprint of Amory's "John Buncle" would be of interest to-day. Such a reprint is at the present moment in hand with us. The book will form one of the volumes of the forthcoming series to be entitled "Half-forgotten Books," which will start, under the editorship of Mr. E. A. The International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers.

SIR,—The next exhibition of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers will be held in Buda Pest, opening early in April.

The British Section of the Society was last year invited by the Hungarian Society of the Fine Arts, the national, official, representative artistic body of Hungary, to make an exhibition at Buda Pest, and this was so successful, that the International Society has again been invited by the Hungarians to contribute and arrange a British Section.

Some seventy pictures, representative works of nearly all the members, were last week sent to Buda Pest; including contributions from the President, Mr. Whistler, as well as oil paintings by Messrs. Lavery, Sauter, Walton, Priestman, Muhrman, Cameron, Henry, Grosvenor, Thomas, and others; water colours by Condor and Anning Bell; lithographs by C. H. Shannon; etchings by Pennell; black-and-white by E. J. Sullivan; colour prints by Morley Fletcher; a very representative collection of much of the best work that is being done in Great Britain.—Yours, &c., for the Society,

JOSEPH PENNELL,

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 180 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best brief criticism of any play, new or old. Thirty replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss Eva Lathbury, Gladysbohae, Didsbury, Lancs, for the following:—

"HEDDA GABLER."

Other and cleaner people than Ejler Lövborg whisper the name of "Hedda Gabler" with cautious fascination: she embodies memories, possibilities, witcheries, degradations. But, though monstrous, she is human: though compounded of evil it is the evil flesh is heir to.

She stands naked, and too self-absorbed for shame against a clever background:—Tesman, the rock of definite and provocative disappointment; Brack, the ring-master, now coaxing, now forcing her tendencies to declare themselves; Thea, standing ineffectual and fore-doomed between a woman's bold curiosity and a man's half-explored, sin-bespattered intelligence.

But Hedda's boldness is never courage: her pistols are for the unarmed; with the weapon of scandal at her own head she stands confessed a coward: her ferocity is for the feeble spark of noble shame, for unlicensed and timid devotion, for the humble spinster and the unborn child threatening her freedom, and yet, through all these moods she earns acknowledgment; she is consistent, possible, and we follow her irresistibly to the annihilation she aims for, on to the culminating scene of Act III, where, in a frenzy of blindness, she fancies herself at last mistress of life and its issues, the great god in the machine, for it is here she ends for us: that last act is but a burying of dead, a rubbing-in of morals: who cares for, or believes in, the ignominious touch lent to Lövborg's end, or hears the click of Hedda's property pistol? No! Hedda ended with her full and final revelation of herself, and the portrait is too convincing to be repudiated, too alarming to retain: we stumble back into everyday conditions, crying ineffectually with Brack, "but, may God take pity on us—people don't do such things as that!"

Other replies follow:—

"THE COUNTESS CATHLEEN."

"The Countess Cathleen" is of all Mr. Yeats' plays the most human, real, and convincing. "The Land of Heart's Desire" is an enchanted fairy play, "Where There is Nothing" an allegory, the teaching of which is obvious, for all its beauty; but "Countess Cathleen" though mediæval, is finely and universally human and spiritual, for it deals with utmost self-sacrifice not for love, but for pity, which is the very essence of Christianity.

The play is not well fitted for acting. Its dramatic crises are few; its characters, except the heroine, too shadowy; there is no relief to the deepening gloom through which Cathleen moves, and the lost souls and supernatural existences are impossible to represent. Besides, the play appeals to associations and traditions alien to the majority of theatre-goers, except in Ireland.

As a literary play, things are far otherwise. The verse has all the haunting melody and charm of the best Celtic poetry, there are some wonderfully fine soliloquies, and beauty of thought and language are indissolubly wedded in some few magnificent lines, which yet have not the obtrusive self-consciousness of "purple patches." Cathleen's restless wanderings, her awakening to the woe around her, her efforts, failure, self-surrender, and redemption, are very finely shown, especially her farewell to Heaven and the Saints. The pious old peasant women are faithful types of much that is best in Irish country folk, as the mad poet lover, who lives in the past with gods and heroes of old, typifies much in modern literary Ireland. There is strong realism and character-drawing in the bargaining peasants, and the worthless souls whose joy is to lure others to ruin, while the soul-merchants shine with lurid gleams from the land of their heart's desire.

[M. T. E., Lampeter.]

"THE ALKESTIS OF EURIPIDES."

Even the mere reading, in this late day, of the wonderful old Greek play, "that strangest, saddest, sweetest song," the Alkestis, grips at one's heart-strings with an appeal for sympathy not to be withstood. And to take oneself back, with Charles Reade's good old Pagan monk, to find the play, like some rich, long-lost jewel, replaced in its own setting—spoken under the open sky, "the audience a seated city"—this is to catch at one golden thread of that many-coloured web of glorious life.

The motive of the play finds its counterpart in all generations—the struggle of a man with himself, his downfall, his awakening, his victory, and final triumph. Admetos lies his young wife die in his own stead, bewailing her untimely fate, but blinded by selfishness to the enormity of his crime. She bids farewell to the light and leaves her children motherless. While she lies dead within the house, Herakles, bound on a journey, comes seeking quest-right; and Admetos, inconsolable, but callous still, sees with dim eyes the noble thing to do, and bids his guest enter and be of good cheer—pretending that he mourns for some strange woman. It is this spark of the man's noble nature, not wholly dead though buried deep, that brings him his happiness at last: for Herakles, learning the truth, and perceiving that better things are to be, conquers Death and brings Alkestis back. The realisation of his ignoble deed has come to Admetos in the meantime, and it is a man purged by suffering who, scarcely believing his own rapture, receives his wife again.

Made clean by suffering—victorious over self—this is the keynote of the play; this is its claim, in all ages, to comfort and uplift.

[E. L. G., Rochester.]

Competition No. 181 (New Series).

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

A new book by the late Mr. Max Müller is being prepared by Messrs. Longmans. It is called "The Silesian Horsekeeper" ("Das Pferdebürla"): Questions of the Day answered by F. Max Müller, with a preface by Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter. This is a translation of a work which was published some years back in Germany, but which is now for the first time translated into English. It consists of a controversy on religion carried on between Prof. Max Müller and an unknown correspondent in America.

Messrs. A. and C. Black will publish shortly "The Diary of a Turk," a volume dealing with social, political and religious matters in Turkey, and containing a considerable amount of information on subjects frequently misunderstood in this country. The author is H. Halid Effendi, M.A., M.R.A.S., who, after having retired from the service of the Sultan's government on account of his liberal views, settled in England. Mr. H. Halid is now teacher of Turkish to student interpreters (for the Levant) in the University of Cambridge.

"Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada," by the late Clarence King, has long been out of print. A new edition is to be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin next week. Its author was not only an eminent geologist, but a writer with considerable literary gifts.

Lady Butler's book on the Holy Land, shortly to be issued by Messrs. Black, consists of letters written to the author's mother, and is illustrated by reproductions of her water-colour drawings done in the course of an Easter pilgrimage. This is Lady Butler's first appearance as a writer, and almost her first appearance as a landscape artist. The drawings are reproduced in colour.

Messrs. Methuen are about to issue a little book entitled "The Education Act—and After," by H. Hensley Henson. In this little work Canon Henson renews the earnest appeal which he recently made in the pulpit of Westminster Abbey to the Nonconformists to unite with the English Churchmen in working the Education Act.

Mr. Bourdillon's new translation of "Aucassin and Nicolette" will be published in a few days by Messrs. Kegan Paul. It varies a good deal from the well-known translation which he made some years ago.

Mr. Edward Arnold has just completed arrangements for the publication of "The Memoirs of M. de Blowitz." Contrary to the general belief, M. de Blowitz had been engaged for some time before his death in putting into shape for publication some of the more remarkable incidents of his career as Paris Correspondent of the "Times." The book is being arranged by his adopted son, M. St. Lauzanne de Blowitz, the Editor of "Le Matin."

A fully illustrated "Popular History of the Free Churches" is to be published early in March by Messrs. James Clarke & Co. The author is the Rev. C. Silvester Horne, of Kensington.

Messrs. Skeffington and Son, publishers to the King, who have carried on business in Piccadilly for more than half a century, are removing on March 18th to much larger and more convenient premises at 34, Southampton Street, Strand, as their old premises in Piccadilly will shortly be pulled down.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

IN consequence of simultaneous publication in America, the issue of "RED-HEADED GILL," by RYE OWEN, originally advertised for February 16th, was postponed to March 5th. So few new English authors are now accepted by American publishers that the compliment paid to RYE OWEN by one of the leading New York firms is an indication of the interest "RED-HEADED GILL" is likely to excite amongst novel readers who desire not only a strong plot but also good literary work.

British Weekly says: "A strange, weird tale, excellently told."

3s. 6d."THE GUARDIAN" of August 6th, 1902, says:—

"Chalmers possessed a personality which simply fascinated such diverse people as R. L. Stevenson, the sailors on the Pacific Station, and the native tribes of Rarotonga and New Guinea. To Chalmers belongs the honour of carrying the Gospel to these new regions, and in the opinion of the present Governor, even the martyr's tragic death will have advanced the cause so dear to the heart of one who has not unfrequently been called 'The Livingstone of New Guinea.'"

"THE DAILY NEWS" of August 7th, 1902, says:—

"This book ought to have for its sub-title 'The Acts of a Modern Apostle.' Mr. Lovett has given us a picture of a strong and brave man, who knew no fear, courted not the praise of men, and calmly faced death when his hour came. It is the best missionary biography that has appeared during the last twenty years. It is a book that will live and take rank as a missionary classic."

LADY
ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

BY

Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

AUTHOR OF "ROBERT ELSMERE," "MARCELLA," "SIR GEORGE TRES-SARDY," "ELEANOR," &c.MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"We have spoken of Mlle. de Lespinasse as an eighteenth-century predecessor of the heroine of this story, since Mrs. Ward goes out of her way to remind us that this far-famed amoureuse was in her thoughts when she drew the character and devised the experiences of Lady Rose's daughter. Not that the novelist has transplanted more than a phrase or two from that repository of molten passion. Mrs. Ward, whose first task it was to imagine the life of her heroine, was too fine an artist to attempt to identify with that imaginary life a real life which, one might almost say, still seems to quiver in our view. . . . Her Mlle. de Lespinasse has intellectual associations and aspirations proper to her own age, and a character as well as a life belonging to herself."SCOTSMAN.—"The work suggests comparisons with some of its writer's prior stories, but does not suffer so; for being itself a masterpiece, it must enhance even so brilliant a reputation as hers."WORLD.—"Julie le Breton is presented with consummate skill. . . . The novel, which possesses high literary excellence, is distinguished by evenly sustained interest, the completeness of the personality of every actor in the drama, and the skill with which the author, never straining probability unreasonably, makes them all subservient to the purposes of Julie le Breton."

The Literary Week.

SEVERAL weighty books have been published during the week, many of them in two volumes. Charlotte Yonge's biography has, we are glad to see, been compressed into one volume. Although politics are scarcely referred to in Mr. Molloy's "The Sailor King" he has taken two volumes to tell the story of the seven years' reign of William IV. Two volumes were also necessary for the late Robert Adamson's "The Development of Modern Philosophy: with other Lectures and Essays." Among the interesting books of the week we note the following:—

WORDSWORTH. By Walter Raleigh.

A critical study of Wordsworth's work and its tendencies and influence. Prof. Raleigh's purpose has been "to approach the poetry of Wordsworth with a favourable predisposition; to attempt to read it as he would have wished it to be read, and to find in it what he attempted to express." The author concludes his introduction with these words: "A lifetime of strenuous poetic energy cannot be recaptured from oblivion or fully understood. But if the attempt be wholly vain and fantastic, then Wordsworth must be content to be judged by standards that he repudiated, and to be valued for reasons that have little to do with the inspiration and motive of his work."

SIR HENRY LAYARD: Autobiography and Letters. 2 vols.

Edited by the Hon. William N. Bruce, with a chapter on Sir Henry Layard's parliamentary career by the Right Hon. Sir Arthur Otway. Sir Henry Layard was born in Paris in 1817, and died in London in 1894. "He won distinction as traveller, archaeologist, politician, diplomatist, student of the Fine Arts." When Sir Henry retired from the public service he set to work on an account of his life. These volumes carry us down to 1861, on the eve of his departure for Madrid. The gaps left in Sir Henry's narrative have been filled, as far as possible, by extracts from his correspondence.

CHARLOTTE MARY YONGE: Her Life and Letters. By Christabel Coleridge.

A sympathetic record of a simple, successful, and quiet life. "I have endeavoured," says Miss Coleridge, "to share with others my impressions, my knowledge, of Charlotte Yonge . . . In one way the task has been easy, for so consistent, so harmonious a life has surely never been described, and rarely been lived." The volume opens with an autobiography which runs to one hundred and twenty pages, and describes with some detail the formative influences of the writer's early surroundings and friends. Towards the end of the autobiography we have some account of the intercourse with John Keble and his wife and sister which formed for Miss Yonge "the great conscious influence of her life." The volume is illustrated by portraits.

To the latest volume in the revised edition of Tolstoy's works Mr. Aylmer Maude contributes an interesting preface. The volume contains Tolstoy's three plays: "The Power of Darkness," "The First Distiller," and "Fruits of Culture." When Mr. Maude said to Tolstoy, "and what about 'The First Distiller'?" he "only waved his hand contemptuously, to show that 'The First Distiller' was not worth talking about." "The Power of Darkness" has been acted in most European countries, but never in England. Perhaps so moral and terrible a play would hardly find a welcome in London at present. "Fruits of Culture," on the other hand, as Mr. Maude says, is "a play brimful of laughter and merriment, and enough by itself to refute the accusation, sometimes brought against Tolstoy, that he lacks humour." These three plays were written in the years 1886-1889, so that they belong to the later years of Tolstoy's activity. The remaining volumes of the edition the translators hope to complete at the rate of two a year. "Each sentence," says Mr. Maude, "and almost every word has to be carefully weighed, and, Tolstoy having written more than 3,000,000 words, the task is one which, under the most favourable conditions, must occupy a number of years, and cannot be completed by my wife and myself alone."

On October 5th of last year Mr. J. W. Mackail delivered the first Larnier Sugden Memorial Lecture at the William Morris Labour Church in Leek, its subject being "The Parting of the Ways." The personal element of the lecture, a printed copy of which lies before us, was William Morris. Morris, it will be remembered, went to Leek to learn and experiment in certain technicalities of weaving and dyeing. But he found time to write the greater part of "Sigurd the Volsung," and often sat down to work with "fingers so stiff from the blue-vat that they would hardly hold the pen." Of the man himself Mr. Mackail said:—

Perhaps there may be some present who remember his heroic and romantic figure in those days; the noble tempestuous head with its grey eyes and delicate mouth, the blouse and sabots, the hands dyed deep in indigo. Whatever may be the chances that await Leek and its townsfolk, they are not likely to see so great a man moving among them on his daily work again. But if there are any here whose recollection goes back to those days, they can hardly have known or suspected then the inner workings of his spirit, or the strange seas of thought through which he was voyaging, chiefly in silence and alone.

We cannot here follow Mr. Mackail through the Socialistic themes which he discusses, but as a record of certain phases of William Morris's development this booklet is of distinct value. The lecture concludes:—

In a sense, there was never any parting of the ways for Morris, because throughout life his way was to a degree almost unexampled in our time, single and straight-forward. As soon as he was convinced that a thing was right, however strange or difficult or imprudent it were, his choice was already made, and he simply did it. In this, at least, if not in his other more unapproachable qualities, he has left an example that we may humbly attempt to follow. That immense and all-embracing outlook is only for the great minds of the world, and is by them only attained through long labour and vigilant discipline. But to all of us, if our heart is fixed on doing right within our daily sphere and the limits of our narrower horizon, Socialism must needs be as Morris called it, a belief involving the very noblest ideals of human life and duty. For this church and for all believers, the motive forces of life are manifold. One or other of them will take a place before the rest in different minds; the love of beauty, the pursuit of truth, the glory of freedom, the law of kindness, the joy of brotherhood: but above them all, before them all, beyond them all, is the hunger and thirst after righteousness.

In an article in the "New Liberal Review" on Lady Gregory's "Poets and Dreamers," Mr. W. B. Yeats contributes some thoughts of his own to the eternal question of the possibilities of Irish nationality and the revival or creation of an Irish literature. Concerning these Galway people he says: "I do not think imagination has changed here for centuries, for it is still busy with these two themes of the ancient Irish poets, the sternness of battle and the sadness of parting and death." These two themes are, of course, universal, the more primitive the people the stronger being their hold. Later Mr. Yeats says:—

There is still in truth upon these great level plains a people, a community, bound together by imaginative possessions, by stories and poems which have grown out of their own life, and by a past of great passions which can still stir them to imaginative action. One could still if one had the genius, and had been born to Irish, write for these people plays and poems like those of Greece. Does not the greatest poetry always require a people to listen to it? England or any other country which takes its tune from the great cities and gets its taste from schools and not from old custom, may have a mob, but it cannot have a people.

To what "imaginative action" does the past of "great passions" stir these people? And does Mr. Yeats seriously believe that even if the genius came they would hail him for what he was? Personally, we very much doubt it.

When Mr. Yeats says that England "cannot have a people," frankly, we cannot follow him. It is so easy to say things like that, and so difficult to support them reasonably.

A CORRESPONDENT of the "Morning Advertiser," apropos of Mr. H. A. Jones's little difficulty with "The Times," has sent to the "Advertiser" particulars of "a wordy protest from the then (1876) manager of Drury Lane Theatre against adverse criticism," which, in that case also, had appeared in "The Times." Mr. Chatterton, the manager, admitted that critics usually treated him with fairness, but that "The Times" had fallen foul of "Richard III." without warrant. Nine years before "The Times" had said that Mr. Barry Sullivan would soon "be acknowledged as the leading legitimate actor of the British capital"; the later critic (or was he the same?) sneered at Mr. Sullivan as "an actor high in favour in America, and on our own provincial stages, but less known, perhaps, in London." And now we have the old story all over again, only in the modern instance it is the author and not the actor who considers himself aggrieved. Well, perhaps we should be grateful to Mr. Jones for a certain amount of mild amusement.

THE "English Illustrated Magazine" prints an article by Serge Nelidoff on "Newspapers as Public Characters." Mr. Nelidoff illustrates his text by certain caricatures, which he somewhat needlessly explains as "not personal." "The Times" is represented by a heavy and prosperous individual of the typical John Bull sort; the "Daily Telegraph" by a stout person in a fancy waistcoat carrying a cricket bat and bags of "shilling funds"; the "Daily News" by a lean and earnest man in gaiters, and so on. Concerning papers in general, Mr. Nelidoff says:—

The character of "The Times," the "Standard," the "Daily News," the "Morning Post," the "Telegraph," the "Chronicle," is made up of traditions which each succeeding editor and each succeeding staff regard as inviolable. Every member of the editorial staff of either of the great dailies is aware of its history and peculiarities; and almost unconsciously he entertains the prejudices of his predecessors concerning any personage, institution, or event. We should not be at all surprised if that valuable compilation known as "The Times Index" is consulted by no one more assiduously than by the present editor of "The Times." "What have we said before on this subject?" was one of Mr. John Walter's most constant inquiries, as we learn from one of his associates in Printing House Square.

As an instance of the survival of tradition the author gives the following:—

One of the most curious happened when one morning a few years ago the "Standard," to the surprise of every one, and none more so than its proprietor, and even of its literary editor, published a leading article severely depreciating Mr. George Meredith. It was apropos of the birthday of the venerable novelist, and to his admirers it came as a bolt from the blue. It is said that the article was written quite without animus; it did not represent anybody's opinion, but was a continuation of the judgment passed upon Mr. Meredith in a leading article in 1861, or soon after the appearance of his first novel, "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel."

Such continuity of tradition as that suggests a conservatism which we should not have suspected even of the "Standard."

THE committee of the Institute of Journalists appointed to arrange for the memorial to newspaper correspondents who died in South Africa have received the following names as coming within the terms of their reference:—

Mr. George Warrington Steevens, "Daily Mail," London—died at Ladysmith; George Alfred Farrand, "Morning Post," London—killed at Wagon Hill; Albert F. Adams, Exchange

Telegraph Company—died of fever at Aliwal North; W. J. Lambie, "Age," Melbourne—killed at Slingsfontein; Robert Mitchell, "Standard," London—died of fever at Ladysmith; Ernest G. Parslow, "Daily Chronicle," London—killed at Mafeking; H. H. Spooner, "Evening News," &c., Sydney, N.S.W.—died of fever at Deelfontein; Lieutenant Joseph Smith Dunn, Scottish Horse, Central News, London—died of fever at Johannesburg; Miss Mary Kingsley, "Morning Post," London—died of fever at Simons Town; Mr. F. Slater Collet, "Daily Mail," London—killed at Schoerman's Farm; E. D. Scott, "Manchester Courier"—killed at Elandsfontein; W. T. McKenzie, Reuter's Agency, London—died of fever at Aliwal North.

It is a terrible and pathetic list, and the Committee ask for supplementary information. Such a bare statement brings home to us with painful vividness the price paid for our breakfast-table news in war time.

WHAT appears to be a rather foolish piece of vandalism is reported from Salisbury. Over one of the three archways leading into the Close there was a statue of Charles II. This, on the plea of its being "decayed and mutilated," has recently been removed, and its place taken by a brand-new effigy of Edward VII. The Legitimists, naturally, are very angry, but the matter is one of wider than merely Legitimist interest. Surely the statue of Charles II. might have been restored? The inner Chapter's loyalty, we presume, was not in doubt.

MR. MARION CRAWFORD recently said to an interviewer of the New York "Bookman": "I could not write at all, if I did not delight in such employment. I know of no one who has written many books who would willingly lay down his or her pen. After twenty years of continuous writing it has become second nature to me. I should be unhappy if I stopped. Can you name a well-known writer of romance who is not in harness, or has not died in harness?" Mr. Crawford, as readers of his books know, does not believe in novels with a purpose. Indeed, any true presentation of life needs no definite "purpose" to give it force. There is in it the inherent and often unconscious purpose of human action.

THE same journal has been endeavouring to get "authoritative light" on the sales of certain popular books in America, to which end it requested their publishers to furnish figures. The publishers of "Audrey" wrote:—

Replying to your favour of the 28th, we would say that the latest advertised figure on the sale of "Audrey" is 170,000 copies.

Another firm said:—

Answering your inquiry of the 28th inst., we give you herewith our latest figures for the following books:

"The House with the Green Shutters"	21,858
"The Hound of the Baskervilles"	83,558
"The Two Vanrevels"	80,154

The publishers of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" were almost shy. They wrote:—

Our reasons for not making public the total sale from time to time have been: (1) the sale, while it has been rather extraordinary, has not yet approached the "great" figures of "Richard Carvel," "David Harum," et al; (2) the sale is so continuous that any figures made public one week would be considerably surpassed before the news got well out; and (3) we have had a kind of sentiment against "working" the public, and making them buy "Mrs. Wiggs" because it is "a big seller." The book itself is too delicate in its motive to be handled in that way—at least, so it seems to some of us.

But having said this they add: "We do not mind the announcement that the sales of 'Mrs. Wiggs' have considerably exceeded two hundred thousand, and are going merrily on." We are glad to hear that delicacy of motive is taken, if only nominally, into consideration.

By the early death of Lieutenant-Colonel George Henderson the army has lost a distinguished instructor and literature a man who wrote with force and ability on themes which are generally, though for no apparent reason, counted as outside literature. Colonel Henderson's "Stonewall Jackson" was a fine lesson in the means and end of strategy, and it was on account of his special knowledge that he was selected to edit the official history of the South African War. From a communication to "The Times" by "Linesman" concerning Colonel Henderson we extract the following:—

Men more famous have vanished, yet few with more promise of fame, and none more beloved. The dread gazette of death has never removed a soldier whose commission is handed back to its great Giver more unsullied, its oath of allegiance more faithfully kept, its injunctions to duty more honourably obeyed. If the confused patchwork of life has stainless parts, Colonel Henderson surely filled one of them, and the tearing of it so suddenly away leaves a grievous rent to us who rejoice in its purity.

SIR WILLIAM RICHMOND's lecture before the members of the Institute of British Decorators on "The Decoration of St. Paul's Cathedral" was at any rate a personal vindication of some account. Of Sir William's early reminiscences not much is to be said; apparently he felt that he was, as it were, set aside for the work of decorating St. Paul's:—

When he was a little boy of about thirteen his mother took him to hear the service at St. Paul's, and they sat in the choir. He looked up at that naked roof—that was before he had ever been in Italy or seen a piece of mosaic—and on going out he said, "Mother, some day I will cover that with mosaic."

Such prophetic vision is, perhaps happily, rare in children of thirteen, but in the case of Sir William Richmond it came true. He deliberately prepared himself for this prospective work by visiting "all the churches covered with mosaic in Italy, many in Asia Minor, and all in Greece." When the commission for the decoration came to him he took a strong stand; he told the committee that he was not going "to submit his designs to the approval of the British public. He knew the British public, and he knew the British critic," and neither could ever make up its mind as to what it liked and why it liked it. So Sir William went on in his own way, and used his mosaic as he thought best. Concerning colour decoration in general the lecturer said some wise things, though his manner of saying them was not always happy. The Parthenon, he said, was coloured "from top to toe"; "top to toe," of a building, is curiously unhappy.

A PLEASING little booklet of "Lays and Lyrics from German Poets," by Sydney Hesselrigge, reaches us from Nottingham. Mr. Hesselrigge appears to have aimed, and properly, at absolute simplicity, as the following translation of Heine will show:—

Once there came a lovely picture
 Into my life's dreary day;
 Now the night has closed around me,
 For the picture slipped away.
 Little children in the darkness,
 When their courage fast grows cold;
 Try to ease their hearts by singing,
 Till their fears away have rolled.
 Thus do I, alone in darkness,
 Like a child, begin to sing;
 Care not if my song be merry,
 Should it only comfort bring.

We referred recently to an offensive method of book advertising by means of postcards. In America a new method, and if possible an even more objectionable one, has been hit upon. In a New York paper the following appeared:—

STIRLING.—By suicide in the Hudson River, poet and man of genius, in the 22nd year of his age. Chicago papers please copy.

Shortly afterwards there was issued the diary of Stirling, who had, of course, not committed suicide at all.

A CONTEMPORARY says, in reviewing Mr. Buckley's "Croppies Lie Down," that it "makes sure of an Irish audience." We wish we could feel equal confidence. The writer of Irish stories is unfortunately aware that the native market for them is very small. A writer of Scotch stories, on the other hand, is pretty sure of a reasonable sale.

Bibliographical.

THE next best thing to a book is a catalogue of books, especially if that catalogue be in any particular unique. Unique, surely, among the catalogues of circulating libraries is that of the London Library, just issued. Here is a tome of 1,626 pages (in double columns), containing references to about 220,000 volumes. The entries (save of course in the case of anonymous or pseudonymous books) are under the names of authors, arranged alphabetically. A subject-index is to follow; but, in the meantime, some of the more important topics, such as "Shakespeare," have a special treatment, by which the student is guided to works on sub-divisions of the theme. I do not, personally, like the arrangement by which the works of a writer are ranged under his name in alphabetical order; this makes reference easy, but the chronological order would be in some ways more instructive. Dr. Wright, the editor, has done well to follow the example of the British Museum Catalogue in giving, in many cases, brief descriptions of the authors; and one could even wish that the principle had been carried further. Thus in plain "Adams, Henry Cadwallader," everybody may not at once recognize our old friend the Rev. H. C. Adams, the author of "Schoolboy Honour" and so forth. The introduction of the "Rev." might have been a help to many. Happily, Dr. Wright does not follow the bad example of the British Museum Catalogue in entering notable authors under names by which they are not usually indicated. Thus Mrs. Hemans figures under "Hemans," not under "Browne, Felicia Dorothea," as (if I remember rightly) the old lady in Bloomsbury has it. In respect of accuracy this London Library Catalogue is monumental; I have been browsing over it from time to time, and have found only a single entry which is in the least degree misleading, and that of minor importance only. As a whole, the Catalogue is a triumph not only of industry, but of knowledge and good judgment.

One reflection a cursory examination of the Catalogue does suggest, and that is, that the Library would have been all the better for a little "weeding-out" before the Catalogue was put in type. The process is one to which all libraries, and especially all circulating libraries, should be submitted at suitable intervals of time, because there are some books of which time alone can finally establish the value, whether fleeting or permanent. Again, one notes in the Catalogue, as one notes even in the British Museum Catalogue, gaps which one feels the responsible parties ought to busy themselves in filling up. There are certain standard authors, one feels, who should be fully represented in a library—an ideal which its controllers or custodians ought to keep steadily before them.

In the case, unhappily, of a circulating library, there is always a demand for new books which has to be met, even though the librarian knows that most of those books have no element of permanence. This is one of the banes of the perfect librarian's existence.

Talking of catalogues, I may record the publication of the "English Catalogue of Books" (S. Low & Co.) for 1902, the sixty-sixth annual issue. The work of compilation has been carefully done, and the information given can be relied upon. "The Catalogue" is, indeed, an institution, and, unlike most institutions, scarcely susceptible of improvement. Space could, I think, be saved here and there, and I should like the names of authors to be given (at least once, where there is more than one entry under them) as fully as the title-page allows. But these are counsels of perfection.

The "Index and Epitome" of the "Dictionary of National Biography" will, of course, be welcome to many; but still more people will be pleased when the proprietors of the "Dictionary" begin to issue it (if they ever do so issue it) in sections, each covering a single subject, such as soldiers, sailors, lawyers, doctors, painters, musicians, actors, and so forth. Tastes and studies are much specialized nowadays, and there is very, very much in the "Dictionary" which does not appeal at all to the average man. I may add, I am heretical enough to hold that very many of the biographies in the "Dictionary" are by far too long, and that the work as a whole might profitably have been less bulky than it is. In the cases especially of monarchs, statesmen, and politicians, the historical element is too often permitted to overwhelm the purely biographical.

There have been several references lately to the preface which Mr. Shorthouse supplied for an edition of "The Temple," published in 1882. He wrote at least three other prefaces—one to Molinos' "Golden Thoughts" (1883), another to Morse's "Peace, The Voice of the Church to her Sick" (1888), and another (on the Royal Supremacy) to Galton's "Message and Position of the Church of England" (1899). His paper "On the Platonism of Wordsworth" was printed in 1882.

We are promised, from the pen of a lady (Mrs. E. H. Fremantle), a new translation into English of the works of Heine. This, I presume, would include the poems, which in themselves would tax very severely the powers of any one translator. Hitherto, one may say, they have managed, as a body, to elude complete fusion into our tongue, despite the well-meant efforts of E. A. Bowring, C. G. Leland, Sir Theodore Martin, Emma Lazarus, and others. Mrs. Fremantle, we are told, was introduced to Heine by the selection from his poems (in English) published in the "Canterbury Poets" in 1887. In this instance many translators were judiciously drawn upon. But is Heine's verse translatable at all?

The list of forthcoming "King's Classics" is undoubtedly appetising. Early in it stands the Life of Margaret Godolphin, written by John Evelyn, and edited by Bishop Wilberforce in 1847. An abridgement of this "Saintly Life" came out in 1853, and again in 1864. The "Life" was also edited by William Harcourt in 1888. Then we are to have, under the title of "Monastic Life," a translation of the Chronicle of Jocelin de Brakelonda, monk of St. Edmundsbury, the full text of which was published by the Camden Society in 1840, the English version by T. E. Tomlins following in 1844. Next, by way of companion to the last-named, we are to have "Convent Life," an English translation of the thirteenth century "Ancren Riwele," a version of which, by J. Morton, was issued by the Camden Society in 1853. Extracts from the "Ancren Riwele" were added to the Clarendon Press publications in 1884.

MORE LETTERS OF CHARLES DARWIN: A RECORD OF HIS WORK IN A SERIES OF HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED LETTERS. Edited by Francis Darwin and A. C. Seward. Illustrated. (John Murray 32s. net.)

THESE letters are supplementary to the three volumes of the "Life and Letters," published in 1887. Primarily, they are a record of work—work of such value, scope, and unity as can with difficulty be paralleled. They illuminate, as could no other source of light, any previous conceptions of the worth of Darwin to the race. It was well to retain these letters until this present. Their publication now, in a century which has such distorted views of Darwin, will be a boon to the student, the historian, the prophet, and the public at large. Passionless as a scientist, a man of peace, patient, minute, and almost incredibly accurate as an observer, Darwin was a man who must be loved. Humour, sensitiveness, sympathy are writ large on every page. Of his intellectual honesty and self-criticism, and the power of sheer prevision that were his, we must attempt the portrayal in relation to these letters.

Born in 1809, the year that gave us so many great men, Darwin has left a delightful fragment of early recollections far too good to be garbled by part quotation. The first letters are from Edinburgh, where he went to study medicine. But the chance of a half-cabin offered to a naturalist who should embark on a ship voyaging westwards was too good to be missed, and we find him next at Monte Video. Long afterwards, speaking of the doctrine of Design (as it then existed), he alludes to this theory in relation to varying lengths of nose, and tells us that "the shape of my nose (eheu!)" very nearly made Captain Fitzroy refuse to accept the offer to accompany the "Beagle" on her trip. The young naturalist who, as a child, had longed to know the origin and nature of each of the many-coloured pebbles before his father's front door, writes home the most jubilant letters of his many finds in botany, zoology, and geology at Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Ayres. Of the Andes he writes:—

I cannot tell you how I enjoyed some of these views—it is worth coming from England once to feel such intense delight; at an elevation from 10,000 to 12,000 feet there is a transparency in the air, and a confusion of distances and a sort of stillness which gave the sensation of being in another world, and when to this is joined the picture so plainly drawn of the great epochs of violence, it causes in the mind a most strange assemblage of ideas.

On this voyage Darwin visited the Galapagos islands, where the first conception that species might not be immutable crossed his mind. Twenty-four years later was fruition. On his return he became engaged to Emma Wedgwood. A noble tribute he paid in after years to his "greatest blessing," of whom he says "in my whole life I have never heard her utter one word I would rather have been unsaid." We pass over many pages dear to truth, and quote an allusion to Owen, of whose part in the most vital period in the history of science it is kindest not to speak. "What wretched doings come from the order of fame; the love of truth alone would never make one man attack another bitterly." And, indeed, in these 782 letters of one of the greatest lovers and finders of truth in any age, there is not one word of bitterness, though calumny, misrepresentation, and what Goethe, his great predecessor, called the most dangerous thing in the world, "ignorance in motion," faced him all his days. All honour to the living and the dead for the relations between Darwin and Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace. If ever it is worth while to squabble about priority, it was in their case. Instead they loyally fought for nothing but one another and truth. Observe the elder's manner and method: "As I am writing my book, I try to take as much pains as possible to give the strongest cases opposed to me and often such conjectures as occur to me." To Huxley: "What you have written agrees with what I have been writing, only with the melancholy difference for me that you put everything in twice as striking a manner as I do"; and "Farewell, my good and admirable agent for the promulgation of damnable heresies!" To Sir Joseph Hooker: "Adios, you terrible worrier of poor theorists," and "I believe I am the slowest (perhaps the worst) thinker in England."

Darwin was much concerned with a letter from Sedgwick accusing him of "departing from the spirit of inductive philosophy," and was relieved by Mill's assurance that his method was sound. The most recent work on Variation demonstrates how sound that method was, and how needless the words, taken from a letter of 1862: "I look at it as absolutely certain that very much in the 'Origin' will be proved rubbish; but I expect and hope that the framework will stand." At this hour, the doctrine of pangenesis, of which his wife said it "sounded wicked like pantheism," and of which he always spoke with a half-melancholy humour, is being found necessary, in a modified form, to correct the theory of Weismann, with whom Darwin so often and so valuably corresponded. And what an illustration from bacteriology is the remark that "the struggle for life is sometimes between forms as different as possible, for instance, between grasshoppers and herbivorous quadrupeds." What would he have said of the tubercle bacillus as an illustration, discovered three weeks before his death?

Darwin was pleased with a letter of Kingsley's which contains a story of a heathen Khan in Tartary who was visited by a pair of proselytising Moollahs. The first Moollah said, "Oh! Khan, worship my God. He is so wise that He made all things." But Moollah No. 2 won the day by pointing out that his God is "So wise that He makes all things make themselves." And in a letter to the greatest of geologists, Sir Charles Lyell, Darwin says, "I do not wish to say that God did not foresee everything which would ensue." In this connection we may quote from the "Origin": "There is grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one; and that, whilst this planet has gone cycling on according to the fixed law of gravity, from so simple a beginning, endless forms, most beautiful and most wonderful, have been, and are being evolved."

We must quote the following:—

To Lyell, 1860: "I cannot explain why, but to me it would be an infinite satisfaction to believe that mankind will progress to such a pitch that we should look back at ourselves as mere Barbarians." Observe the early date to understand why he says "it would be," not "it is." Note also how completely this sentiment is shared by Tennyson, born so near to him in time and place. Compare this, to Sir Joseph Hooker:—

I quite agree how humiliating the slow progress of man is, but . . . this sinks into my mind into insignificance compared with the idea, or rather I presume certainty, of the sun some day cooling and we all freezing. To think of the progress of millions of years, with every continent swarming with good and enlightened men, all ending in this, and with probably no fresh start until this our planetary system has been again converted into red-hot gas. Sic transit gloria mundi, with a vengeance.

In a letter dated 1877 we have the historic fact:—

When I was on board the "Beagle," I believed, in the permanence of species, but, as far as I can remember, vague doubts occasionally flitted across my mind. On my return home in the autumn of 1836 I immediately began to prepare my journal for publication, and then saw how many facts indicated the common descent of species, so that in July 1837, I opened a note-book to record any facts which might bear on the question; but I did not become convinced that species were mutable until, I think, two or three years had elapsed.

Darwin's disapproval of theorizing beyond the point where facts stopped is shown in a letter to Lyell: "I demur also to your putting Huxley's 'force and matter' in the same category with Natural Selection. The latter may, of course, be quite a false view; but surely it is not getting beyond our depth to first causes." Of all his followers that have got beyond their depth, Haeckel is the first, and the present editors deeply regret his publication (without permission) of a letter, in which Darwin comments severely on Virchow.

An instance of prevision is in a letter to Wallace:—

With respect to the differences of race, a conjecture has occurred to me that much may be due to the correlation of complexion (and consequently hair) with constitution. Assume that a dusky individual best escaped miasma, and you will readily see what I mean.

Recent work demonstrates more clearly every day the truth of this proposition, as is shown in Dr. Vernon's authoritative book just published. This quotation from the same letter has a practical bearing to-day:—

Our aristocracy is handsomer (more hideous according to a Chinese or Negro) than the middle classes, from having the pick of the women; but, oh! what a scheme is primogeniture for destroying Natural Selection!

In one of a valuable series of letters to Mr. Francis Galton, Darwin points out the error into which that great philosopher and (we may add) Tennyson had fallen—"so careless of the single life"—and puts it thus:—

Surely Nature does not more carefully regard races than individuals. Would it not be truer to say that Nature cares only for the superior individuals and then makes her new and better races.

Many allusions to children are of interest. Of the "Darwin's tubercle" on the ear, hinting an ancestral pointed ear, he writes to an observer of children, "Could you not get an accurate sketch of the direction of the hair of the tip of an ear?" Pregnant are his suggestions as to the beginnings of music: "Children make an interrogative noise, before they can articulate, and others of assent and dissent, in different notes." Elsewhere he writes:—

Facility in the utterance of prolonged sounds may possibly come into play in rendering them musical . . . those who vary their voices much, and use cadences in long-continued speaking, feel less fatigued than those who speak on the same note.

Space fails for quotation from letters dealing with Darwin's work on earthworms and their incredible value to the soil, or his theory of subsidence of coral reefs, which was proved in 1891 by the method of boring such reefs suggested by himself ten years before. We can only refer the readers to the volumes for all the work in geology and botany which they so admirably illustrate. We should wish to mention the sane views of this gentle man on vivisection, and to refer to his gratitude for Mr. Herbert Spencer's criticism and his adoption of Spencer's term "survival of the fittest," as explanatory of his own constantly misunderstood term, "Natural Selection."

The editors have done their work well in providing a complete index and admirable portraits. The combination of the human and the scientific interest in these volumes is rare.

The Good Man Triumphant.

TWO BIOGRAPHIES OF WILLIAM BEDELL, BISHOP OF KILMORE.
Edited with Notes and Index by E. S. Shuckburgh.
(Cambridge University Press. 10s. net.)

MR. SHUCKBURGH is to be congratulated on this very satisfactory and complete edition of Bishop Bedell's Life and Correspondence. Credit for the initial undertaking and for the collection of the material, the introduction tells us, must be given to Prof. Mayor, who also published, in 1871, one of the Lives here reprinted. Mr. Shuckburgh has, however, completed the work undertaken, and his scholarly edition is in every respect worthy of the traditions of the Cambridge University Press.

The life of William Bedell (1571–1642) will be treasured to-day not so much on account of the theological controversies in which the Bishop engaged, as for the rare picture it presents of the Good Man triumphant in the naughty world. Bedell, who was of English Puritan stock, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, became noted for his great gifts as a scholar and philologist, was made a Fellow, passed to Venice as a chaplain of the English Ambassador, returned to England and accepted a country living, and sixteen years later was nominated by the Crown as Provost of Trinity College, Dublin. It is here that the chief interest in his life as a human document centres. For Bedell, who became Bishop of Kilmore in 1629, construed his charge to be actually that of shepherding his flock of poor Irish sheep, and, as a man of God, he girt up his loins and denounced the scandalous abuses and corruptions in Ecclesiastical Ireland, wrested back property stolen by ecclesiastics from the Church, protected the native Irishry from illegal spoliations in his diocese, nay, he even stood up against the authority of Laud and Strafford, who were then dominant in Church and State. In pursuit of his spiritual ideas, seeking to teach the poor Irish, protect them and minister unto them, Bedell, this sturdy old Protestant, became as highly obnoxious to the majority of his fellow bishops as he became beloved and respected by the Catholic Irish round him. So undeniable was his great learning, so versed in theological controversy, so skilled in law, so upright his life, and so obstinate and pertinacious was he as an antagonist that, marvellous to relate, Bedell carried his points in the teeth of his powerful adversaries, won most of his lawsuits, and retained his Bishopric. It was the triumph of the fearless, conscientious man of saintly life against the powers of the world. So much was Bedell beloved by the Irish that when the Great Rebellion broke out in 1641, the Bishop was assured by the Catholics that he should be the last Englishman to be expelled from Ireland. And indeed the Irish saw that no harm came to him, and when he died of a fever contracted in the little castle of Loughwater where they had confined him, chiefly for his safety, the Irish gathered at his funeral and gave him military honours. Truly Bedell was the true shepherd of his flock, and had he lived in the days, ten centuries earlier, when Christianity was struggling to make headway against heathendom, he would have come down to posterity as St. Bedell the Wise.

The Life by his son William Bedell is so delicious a document that we heartily wish it could be printed as a pamphlet and distributed broadcast among modern biographers. It is the very model of what a life should be. Everything that is of interest is presented in pithy and picturesque phrase, and all the platitudes, all the non-vital tedious trivialities with which the modern biographer stuffs out his redundant and circumlocutory volumes, find no place. Bedell's severe rectitude and honesty of purpose are depicted in the quaint and vigorous style of which, a century later, English writers lost the secret. "There is yet farther to be noted in his domestical course of conversation his behaviour towards the beggars, bedlams, and travellers, that use to come to men's doors," says his biographer. "These he would not fail to examine, mixing both wholesome instructions and severe reproofs. Nor rested he there; but if they had any passes to travel by, he would be sure to scan them thoroughly, and finding them false or counterfeit, his way was to send for the constable, and after correction given according to law, he would make them a new pass, and send them to the place of their last settlement, or birth. This made him so well-known among that sort of people that they shun'd the town for the most part, to the no small quiet and security of him and all his neighbours."

The account given by Bedell's two biographers of the Rebellion of 1641 is full of curious details, inasmuch as both writers—Bedell's son and his son-in-law—were eye-witnesses of the scenes, and participators in the sufferings of the unfortunate English settlers who, stripped of their lands, houses, and goods in a single day, fled for safety to the few fortified towns. The surprise of the English in Cavan was complete. The last thing, seemingly, they had anticipated was that the people they had subjected should endeavour to get their own again. Thus we read of "one Mr. Arthur Cullum and his wife, whose father Sir Hugh being a captain under the Q. in Tyrone's wars, had that fort committed to his trust, for the keeping of which he had a large proportion of lands given him; but his son that knew nothing of the wars of the Lord, neglected the place so much, where the magazine ought to have been kept for the defence of the country against sudden insurrections, that tho' he said 'he had in his hands' (when he was taken prisoner) 'ten pounds worth of sugar and plums, yet he had not one pound of powder, nor one fixt musquet for the defence of it.'" The Irish of Cavan, not wishing to bring on themselves the hostility of the Scotch, at first proclaimed that their quarrel was with the English alone; but the Scotch settlers, canny folk, stood to arms in two small castles, and for months beat off the Irish attack which was not very long in coming. Eventually, however, the Scots, wearied out, obtained an armistice, and marched away towards Dublin. The sequel we give in the narrator's words:—

So, on the 15th day of June, 1642, in the eighth month after the Rebellion, we marched away above 1,200 men, women, and children, after they had eaten the cowes' hydes that had covered their cabbins and huts, from Christmas to June. A sad company of poore people we were, as ever were seene together. Some loaden with children, some great with chield, some two children on their backs, many with little ones in their armes, yet all rejoicing in the Lord for our enlargement at last. About 2,000 rebels accompanying us for our lyfe-guard, according to the articles of our agreement.

The country had orders to bring us provisions for money, as was artickled, which they did in great plenty. Though there were many plots to cut us off by the way . . . yet the Lord of Hosts was with us, and his glory did shlyne over us, as in a cloud by day and a fyre by night, for our defence, and restrayned their malice, and brought forth this little flock. . . . On the 22nd day of June, Sir Henry Titchbourne, the governor of Drogheda, with Captain Gibson, met us with a party of horse and foot within ten myles of the garison of Drogheda, and conducted us safely thither by the good hand of our God upon us. The rebels that conducted us took sollemne leave of us, being sore afrayed at the sight of our English force . . . and many of them wept at our parting from them that had lived so long peaceably amongst them, as if we had been one people with them. . . . Most of our poor pillaged company came towards Dublin, a poore exhausted city of refuge, which was neytheir able to lodge us nor relieve us with things necessary, thousands dying every weeke, being pierced through for the want of the fruits of the earth, as is at largeset forth in the booke of Dr. Jones, Deane of Kilmore, who wrote the history of the horrid Rebellion. . . .

The Child.

CONCERNING CHILDREN. By Charlotte Perkins Gilman. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 2s. 6d.)

NOTHING points so much to a revolution in our views of childhood as the increasing production of books about children. Whether these are done humourously, as in the majority of cases, or seriously, as in "Concerning Children" by Mrs. Gilman, the impulse that produces them is the same, and it is an impulse towards the better understanding of children. The old idea that children should be kept in their place is giving way, in fact, to the newer one that the place, if it is to be limited at all, should be a very different one in the household. There is no doubt a good deal to be said for this change of attitude towards children. It is quite time we began to recognise the child as an intelligent being with a personality of its own, instead of as one of a class that exists mainly for the amusement of adults; and books like Mrs. Gilman's are at least useful in putting this growing tendency into words. Whether they are of value in suggesting a counter-treatment to the one they condemn, is another matter. To us it seems that Mrs. Gilman is more eloquent in stating the wrongs of childhood than practical in suggesting their remedy. In the chapter called "The Child and the Slipper," for instance, she condemns very logically the practice of arbitrary punishment; but her plea for punishment by natural consequence does not altogether convince us. The unimaginative child, if allowed to burn itself not too seriously, as the author proposes, will probably learn to avoid the fire more effectually than if it were whipped for playing with it; but we have a shrewd suspicion that the enterprising child, of whom there are many, would chance the pain on another occasion for the sake of making further fascinating experiments. Nor do we think with her that a continual appeal to the child's intelligence is altogether a good substitute for training it to obedience. After all, in either case, the child is being guided by the adult; and the success of either method depends upon the wisdom of the one who employs it. A wise mother will never exact blind and unreasoning obedience; an unwise one might very well awaken the child's intelligence in the wrong direction. Of course, we are aware that Mrs. Gilman means the child's intelligence to awaken more or less unaided by the adult; but the smallest practical observation of children proves the fact that as long as the adult is about, the child's instinct will be to copy that person rather than to initiate a rule of conduct of its own.

There is another danger, too, in this new discovery the world seems to be making of the child's intelligence. Education, whether in the nursery, the kindergarten, or the school, that is based on a perpetual appeal to the intelligence, would result, it seems to us, in something like brain pressure before the children had reached their teens. Over-development of the reason almost inevitably means a warping of the imagination; and many children, taught to use their reason in their play as well as in their work, would end in having their individuality driven out of them as completely as if they were the victims of the old system of blind obedience and the slipper. We say many children advisedly, for Mrs. Gilman in common with most enthusiasts is inclined to forget, in spite of her assurances to the contrary, that rules can no more be laid down for children than for men and women. Every child has to be studied separately, and it is difficult to see how this is to be done better in the crowded baby garden or the baby school, even though the teachers are all trained and certificated, than in the home where the mother has love and instinct to guide her. It is true that Mrs. Gilman places love and instinct far down in the list of qualities necessary to the bringing-up of children, and considers a mother chiefly as the person who keeps the bed aired for her child when it returns home to her after a day spent with the people who are trained to understand it; but we should like to take the vote of the nursery on these points before we admit that she is right. Personal experience has shown us on more than one occasion that the intelligent way of learning to read, which is now superseding the old way of learning columns of words by heart, is producing a race of girls and boys who cannot spell; and this fact makes us pause and wonder whether the child who is taught to govern its conduct by its reason will not grow up with a system of morals that is, to say the least of it, as unconventional as its spelling. Morality, like the spelling of English, stands a poor chance if approached only with intelligence; and the conventionality which is so largely responsible for both must be learned in the old-fashioned parrot-like way, or it can never be learned at all. And if we know anything about children, their intelligence will be all the fresher at fifteen if they have not been over-using it ever since they were five.

There is much in Mrs. Gilman's book that we have not space to touch upon here; for it is an exhaustive study of child psychology, and deserves consideration if only for its obvious sincerity. But as we began by saying, it has more value as a treatise about children than as a guide to their better education, and we should be sorry to see the misunderstood and persecuted child of Mrs. Gilman's imagination changed into the priggish sort of superior person that her book suggests to ours.

The Higher Etiquette.

THE MINOR MORALIST. By Mrs. Hugh Bell. (Edward Arnold. 4s. 6d. net.)

It is not easy nowadays to find a literary gap which someone or other has not stopped with a book. But Mrs. Hugh Bell thinks, with some reason, that she has discovered one, and in these seven essays, carefully, thoughtfully, suggestively written, she rather points to the gap than claims to have filled it. The gap yawns somewhere between the "Critique of Pure Reason" and the latest book of etiquette, between Kant of Königsberg and "Comme il Faut" of the "Lady's Pictorial." A man may talk learnedly of the antimonies and never make a mistake in the number of cards he leaves upon his hostesses, yet be a most uncomfortable person with whom to share the world. For between these two desirable accomplishments there lie huge possibilities of mistakes in everyday dealings with relatives, servants, acquaintances and strangers, which may be regarded as the subject of the higher etiquette—or the minor morality—which you please. In her initial essay Mrs. Bell pleads for some regular teaching of manners—not the mere avoidance of an improper use of the knife in eating peas (that is corrected by a rap over the knuckles from the governess), but a kind of second-grade instruction, which shall give the manners that make up personality. And the average man's success in life, as well as his enjoyment of it, depends largely on his secondary manners—his higher etiquette. Genius, of course, is above law, and a Dr. Johnson may pant and snort over his plate and interrupt conversation with a sure welcome. At present we simply tell our young people (when they have learned not to attack the gravy with a spoon) that "good manners proceed from a good heart," and expect them to fill in the details, as though one should tell the law of gravitation and expect them never to tumble.

We allow them to try by practical experiment whether it is by being pompous, offhand, or patronising that you can make yourself the most disagreeable, and how long other people will enjoy talking to you if you are looking the while with ill-concealed inattention over their shoulder. And yet these are things which should be deliberately taught, and not left to chance.

Now these rules of the higher etiquette, thinks Mrs. Bell, should be formulated, put into a book, hung in school-rooms by the side of "Thou, God, seest me," and committed to memory by the young. It would be a great task, with a great result, for the field is a wide one, and if the book is to be written—the book of the higher etiquette—Mrs. Bell has certainly a claim to be author. Here is an instance. The person who has had a bad night, who suffers from a chronic complaint, who is in trouble with servants, never gets consolation. The only reply is a capping of the story:—

Notice, for example, round a breakfast-table in a country house, how, if one person says he has been awakened by a thrush at 3 a.m., he will in one moment be in possession of the experience of the entire table, without one word from any one of comment or sympathy on the experience of others.

Let one of the simple rules to be obtained in our book, then, be never to say how you have slept yourself when your neighbour tells you what sort of a night he has had.

That puts a premium on the man who is first with his woes. But breakfast would be pleasanter without a rechauffée of the night. And the rule might be hung by the electric light button on the bedroom wall, as Mrs. Bell saw "No gentleman to dance in a great-coat" on the walls of the "Peopletown Social."

In treating of the minor matters of life Mrs. Bell is always suggestive, and most suggestive perhaps in her comments on the relations of "Mothers and Daughters." There are few things more pathetic than the gradual severance of the child from the mother, who as years go on sinks from a paragon to a problem. From two years onwards the child loses gradually its absolute and unquestioning confidence in the mother. When the daughter is grown up, there is the case of two adult women living in the same house (supposing the daughter has not a husband or house of her own), looking at life from points which are a generation apart. There is a problem for the higher etiquette. Daughters of to-day are apt to depart and set up their bachelor-girl establishments. Mrs. Bell is somewhat in favour of this, and in discounting the "oddness" of a revolting daughter makes a very sensible comment:—

The misery of being talked about exists mainly in our imagination; it is not often, if ever, that we actually hear the things that are said about us! We only imagine them.

Of the relations of servants and mistresses and the absurd deification of thrift by people with large incomes Mrs. Bell writes lucidly and amusingly. And we should be glad to see her rules formulated and hung by every bedside, for the higher etiquette is the real lubricant of life.

A Belated Journal.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR IN THE HIGHLANDS AND WESTERN ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND IN 1800. By John Leyden. Edited by James Sinton. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)

THE MS. of this volume had a long and uneventful history. About five years ago it was bought at Sotheby's; but the Editor "has been able to discover nothing of its former owners." Dr. Leyden himself, however, was well known in his day. From the bibliography appended to this work it is manifest that he was a scholar of wide and varied interests, and he was held in high esteem by Sir Walter Scott. Sir Walter, indeed, wrote a biography of Leyden, a work from which Mr. Sinton quotes in his preface. The journal now before us Sir Walter, writing in 1811, declared to be a curious monument of Leyden's zeal and industry in the matter of "the decaying traditions of Celtic manners and story which are yet preserved in the wild districts of Moidart and Knoidart." It contains, he wrote, "much valuable information on the subject of Highland manners and traditions, which is now probably lost to the public." Sir Walter dealt very generously with his learned friend. About Highland manners the journal tells practically nothing at all, and Highland traditions are treated allusively, in a mode so casual that really we are obliged to wonder what Sir Walter was talking about.

Dr. Leyden's interest in the Highlands was mainly geological. Only at rare intervals do we come upon a passage of more than local concern, and the passage is never quite complete. For example, there is the story of Connal,

"the Thirsites of the Fingalians," who excelled in arranging an army in array of battle. Connal, we are told, had made three resolutions. He would never see a door without entering it; he would never see a feast without sharing in it; he would never see the landlord of an inn frowning without giving him a box on the ear. Now, one day, seeing Hell open, Connal entered, found the devil dining, and sat down. Satan looked surly, and Connal smote him on the ear. Here we have all the conditions necessary to a fine how-dye-do; but Dr. Leyden touches upon the matter only in order to mention that he "did not learn the issue of the business." Similarly, at Glenelg Dr. Leyden finds himself in the company of a party of sportsmen, "which consists of clergymen, seamen, and our hospitable landlord"; and at the very moment when we expect him to become humanly interesting he breaks off to say that he "seized some trifling pretext for leave of absence in order to escape from the surprising anecdotes, related with so much glee, of the sagacity of pointers." A few pages of the sportsmen's talk would have been much more attractive than the many pages which Dr. Leyden devotes to his fruitless endeavours to solve the mystery of Ossian's poems.

Those who are interested in agriculture will find what may prove a useful suggestion in the entry in Dr. Leyden's journal recording a visit to Inveraray. The Duke of Argyll of a hundred years ago managed the hay crop in a way peculiarly his own. He had a barn "in the form of a semi-circle, with numerous ventilators. The low story forms a double range of stalls for black cattle in winter. The floors of the upper stories are formed of boards placed at six inches distance, and the walls and roofs are provided with wooden hooks for suspending sheaves of corn or bundles of hay, which are deposited green or new-cut, and are soon dried in the wettest seasons." As storing the crop in silos, which is the most modern method of saving the hay, has not been wholly successful, the ancient plan at Inveraray seems worth consideration.

Whilst we cannot write much in praise of this work, we quite realise that at the time it was written, when the Highlands were an unknown region to practically all save those who dwelt in them, Dr. Leyden's journal and letters may have been fresh and entertaining to his friends.

The Romantic Drama.

THE TREASURE OF THE GARDEN. By Jack B. Yeats. (Elkin Mathews. 5s.)

So many in these days are for reviving the romantic drama, for bringing to life—

The mellow glory of the Attic stage, and for restoring the arts of acting and of speaking verse, that we have come to regard the exposition of a new theory without emotion; the advent of a new play without excitement. Our romantic dramatists take themselves too seriously, and aim at expressing rather the sorrows than the joys of life. Since the world has heard the beauty of the muted string it has forgotten that life ever went merrily to a pipe, or to the Arcadian, but penny, whistle. It has forgotten the song, and the old tune, and the old story. It has forgotten that the drama ever shook men's hearts, and has come to prefer that it should help to digest men's dinners. We want—

The old laughter that had April in it.

Now perhaps the chief reason for the dulness of modern plays is the somewhat exclusive attitude of the playwright. His appeal is no longer to the world. His appeal is to an audience. No breadth of range, no scope, is allowed to him. He has lost touch with the external forces of daily life. An introspective study, an allegory of the state of his own mind, is the most we can look for from him.

But in Mr. Jack B. Yeats we recognise the makings of a dramatist of an older order; a writer of plays that are written in the intimate speech of the folk-ballad. While his contemporaries argue, wrangle and disagree as to what is music, and what is the best music, and what music saves a man's soul, he, like the hero Finn, is content with that best of all music—

The music of the thing that happens.

His play of "The Treasure of the Garden" carries on a tradition that shook the stage before playwrights became self-conscious and before poets aimed to please the high foreheads in the stalls. There is no mental dyspepsia in his characters. They present no problem. Their aim is to be real. To be glad and sorry for a little while on a miniature stage measuring a foot across.

Many will regard this tragedy as a jeu d'esprit, a piece of dainty fooling, but it is more than this. Here is his old emigrant speaking. "Come away, neighbours, the poor captain is feeling sad in his heart. The poor man, like the rest of us, doesn't like leaving the dear silk o' the kine." That gentle sentence is "not altogether fool." One should note, too, the delicate tact and rightness he shows in his handling of the recitative. How actual, how pregnant with jolly sarcasm, is Bo'sun Hardbite's speech in Scene I.: "Well, good bye, cap, sit there on yer old iron mushyroom till the seaweed grows on you."

The coloured figures and scenes at the end of the book are designed to be cut out for use upon a toy stage. They show the author's peculiar gift for catching a quick effect of natural action. The colours are all that could be desired. Of the figures we prefer Plate IV., a tragic effect. Of the scenes, the charming harbour sketch in Plate II.

Other New Books.

LIBERAL JUDAISM. By Claude G. Montefiore. (Macmillan. 3s. net.)

THIS essay would be of wider interest but for the author's modest disclaimer of authority. He speaks, he tells us, for himself alone; not as the apologist of that important section of his race which is striving, much upon the lines of our own Broad Churchman, to disentangle from traditional accretions a substratum of the national religion upon which the intelligent and educated may stand firm against the consequences of modern destructive criticism. It would have been easier to grasp his position, we may add, if he had been at pains to provide his book at least with chapter headings and a table of contents. But it is not very long.

The Reform Jew would seem to reject the Law, and to rest upon the Prophets; but he does not accept every jot and tittle of these as authentic or as inspired. If Israel is to be regarded as a chosen people, that is only in virtue of the illumination bestowed from on high upon these men, since theirs surpassed the measure of the seers of other peoples. He believes in one God as declared through them. His religion is a monotheism that rejects as destructive any such refinements as those enunciated by the dogmas of the Christian Church. The point he has most difficulty in making clear is the way in which Judaism in this broad sense is to be distinguished. That, in fact, he never succeeds in making very plain. But in practice he strongly dissuades his brethren either from joining themselves to Unitarian or Theistic bodies, or, more especially, from lapsing into indifferentism. And it is in the interest of the rising generation in particular that he urges fidelity to the customs and rites handed down from their forefathers. The essay breathes a spirit of sincere conviction.

AS WE ARE AND AS WE MAY BE. By Walter Besant. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

HERE are a dozen papers from a dead hand. They cover the ground upon which Sir Walter Besant laboured as a social economist. His view was always a practical one, limited by the conditions and formed in accordance with the tendencies of his day. He was the soberest of dreamers. To him the world had no great significance; human life had no infinite import. But conscious beings for a little space had the possibilities of well-being—intellectual well-being and physical. To enlarge the mental outlook and to multiply pleasurable activities was the end of the social movement he did so much to stir. Since we are alive, let us try to have a good time. His kindly soul had compassion on bright boys growing prematurely jaded in ill-paid drudgery, on the befringed factory-girls three abreast and their mirthless laughter, on the marriages contracted in mere vacuous recklessness, on the troops of neglected children. Let us teach them to dance, he said, to sing, to sew, to act, to carve, to paint, to read. The idea is no longer unfamiliar. The settlements of various kinds whose work is conducted in the spirit of which he was in his day the principal spokesman are a familiar fact of labouring London. As in the paper entitled "From Thirteen to Seventeen" his passion for sane and healthy life could sometimes touch the commonplace of his style with passion.

Everybody has been young [he writes], but somehow we forget the sweet spring season. Let us try to remember, in the interest of the uncared-for youths and girls, the time of glorious dreaming, when the boy became a man, and stood upon some peak in Darien to gaze upon the purple isles of life in the great ocean beyond, peopled by men who were as heroes and by women who were as goddesses. Our own dreaming was glorified, to be sure, with memories of things we had read; yet, as we dreamed, so, but without the colour lent to our visions, these sallow-faced lads, with the long and ugly coats and the round topped hats, are dreaming now. For want of our help their dreams become nightmares, and in their brains are born devils of every evil passion.

Well, it has been in a good measure taken to heart, the object lesson that in this essay he shows us on Hampstead Heath.

THE HISTORY OF LUMSDEN'S HORSE. Edited by Henry H. S. Pearse. (Longmans. 21s.)

THIS history gives no elaborate descriptions or criticisms of operations, but is intended to be a regimental record enlivened by the personal experiences of the men themselves. The editor has collected his data carefully, and the letters here introduced are taken from the Indian papers where they originally appeared. These letters furnish the reader with a sufficiency of the psychological side of war.

Lumsden's Horse was raised and equipped in India, and natives and Europeans alike determined that the corps should be fully representative. A corps of planters it might have been called, for they outnumbered all other occupations. Naturally the selection of 250 men gave rise to much jealousy and heart-burning on the part of the rejected, and one disappointed applicant issued the following manifesto: "I am not a planter. I am willing to shoot a match up the range with the best man selected from Behar, run him a given distance, ride him on strange nags, and in the end with my weight and other recommendations beat him."

All might Africa be called a place of strange meetings: in the uttermost corners of the earth who had, perhaps, not seen each other for years, foregathered there; a rough word of careless greeting, a hand-grip, a light laugh, and then a jaunty "So long, old chap!" and they parted again. And, then, the baptism of fire. "How did I feel?" you ask. "Well, to be strictly honest, I didn't like it. Do you know, I just felt as if I were outside the headmaster's room waiting for a dashed good hiding. I think that hits off the sensation." The famous corps saw all the fighting they wanted, and the tablet in St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta, tells the tale: "They died for England, and the least made greater her great name." An excellent map, several plates and indexes, go to complete this souvenir volume.

CAN TELEPATHY EXPLAIN? RESULTS OF PSYCHICAL RESEARCH. By Minot Savage. (The Knickerbocker Press.)

IN this little volume Dr. Savage attempts to illustrate from records collected by the Society for Psychical Research his thesis that telepathy, which he takes for granted, cannot explain "spiritualistic" phenomena. He refuses to call himself a spiritualist, however, and prefers "spiritist," for reasons which he explains at somewhat obscure length. His sixty-four chapters practically consist of accounts of "spiritistic" phenomena, without encumbrances of proof. It is stated in the preface, however, that the reader "may rest assured that there is nothing in the volume which has not been subjected to the most rigid tests of scientific verification," which, without the "not," would be, we suppose, an accurate enough statement. Any value the book possesses may be found in the appendices. The first quotes the opinions of well-known men, such as Victor Hugo, Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, Dr. A. R. Wallace, Thiers, Flammarion, &c., and is of much psychological value. The second appendix consists of a partial list of those who have believed in communications with spirits, and though the list dwindles astonishingly fast in modern times it is long and wide enough.

COLLOQUIES OF COMMON PEOPLE. By James Anstie. (Smith, Elder.)

THE author of this volume is unquestionably an acute dialectician, but he must be also something of a humourist. For common people would find in, let us say, "The First Principles" of Herbert Spencer, on one hand, and in the "Sartor Resartus" of Carlyle on the other, an infinitely clearer insight into the meaning of symbolism and the essential evasiveness of all human knowledge than in the 530 closely reasoned pages of this book.

Here is what may be taken as a fairly typical extract from this long dialogue:—

MIDDLETON.—Then all you have left is a set of notions which do not correspond to anything in nature which you have any reason to believe exists.

LAWSON.—This is exactly what I have been labouring to make you understand; and now you have found it out yourself.

ELLIS.—I, for one, have never doubted that sensible impressions were things in nature, if nature exists . . .

If nature exists—surely these three words are suggestive of another volume.

NEW EDITIONS: We are glad to welcome a new edition of Clarence King's "Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada" (Unwin). The book was originally published in 1871, and has been long out of print. Its publication was discontinued owing to the author's desire to make certain emendations in the text; a few such emendations, as indicated by him, have been made in the present issue. The literary quality of the book is far above the average of such work: "It is the mountaineer's privilege to carry through life this wealth of unfading treasure. At his summons the white peaks loom above him as of old; the camp-fire burns once more for him, his study walls recede in twilight reverie, and around him are gathered again stately columns of pine."

Fiction.

LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Smith Elder. 6s.)

JULIE LE BRETON, the central figure in "Lady Rose's Daughter," was suggested by the career of Mdlle. de L'Espinasse as Madame du Deffand supplied the framework for Mrs. Ward's Lady Henry Delafield. But Julie Le Breton, in the pages of this book, is no mere historical figment. She is a living woman, and the power she exercises over all with whom she comes in contact is suggested with such intellectual appreciation of the moods of her genius, that not only does she become one of Mrs. Ward's most attractive characters, but also one of the most convincing. We meet her early in the book, the story revolves around her, and we part from her in the end regretfully. She has been scorched and purified by the fire of experience, and of the two men who loved her, one, things being as they were, was not unhappy in dying; the other we leave happy in his life, through her. Julie is very human, not in the least a saint, richly endowed, inheriting from her parents those moods and impulses that made Lady Rose, her mother, choose exile with a lover, to respectability with a husband she disliked. To Julie comes a similar temptation: she, too, runs to meet it, and is only saved by chance, and the devotion of another of her adorers. That man was Delafield, a dreamer, mystic, and individualist, who eventually succeeds to a Dukedom. This is how Julie appeared to him:—

He meanwhile, as he advanced further in the knowledge of her strange nature, was more and more bewildered by her,—her perversities and caprices, her brilliances and powers, her utter lack of any standard or scheme of life. She had been for a long time, as it seemed to him, the creature of her exquisite social instincts,—then, the creature of passion. But what a woman through it all!—and how adorable! with those poetic gestures and looks, those melancholy gracious airs that ravished him perpetually! And now this new attitude as of a child leaning,—wistfully looking in your face,—asking to be led,—to be wrestled and reasoned with.

It is a crowded canvas where Julie Le Breton, Warkworth the ambitious, self-seeking soldier, and Delafield move in the foreground. At first one is inclined to resent the number of titled and distinguished people. There is a Duke, a Duchess, a Cabinet Minister, an Ambassador, a distinguished Editor, and a host of other more or less eminent controllers of affairs, to say nothing of Lady Henry Delafield, the grande dame, old, peevish, half-blind, who has engaged Julie as companion, and who realises that it is the amazing charm of this companion that gathers the select crowd to her house. We certainly feel the fascination of Julie Le Breton, her extraordinary adaptability to circumstances, her power of growth, the diplomacy of her sympathy. "In talking with her, dead walls seemed to give way; vistas of hope and possibility opened in the very heart of discouragement. She found the right word, the right jest, the right spur to invention or effort."

In the latter part of the book we escape from the atmosphere of great houses, crushes and footmen, and the spiritual drama of the action of individual lives one upon the other is worked out by Mrs. Ward with an intellectual sympathy, and a knowledge of the complexities of the human soul, that has not been surpassed in any of her former books. Love is not here the sentimental emotion of the ordinary novel or play, but the power that purges the weaknesses and vivifies the dormant nobilities of men and women. Warkworth, for all his faults, had the courage of his impulses, and few will read that last letter of his, or the sudden news of his death, without emotion. To Julie is left an abiding sorrow, and the humanising of Delafield; his destiny is to tame and console her. Here is a picture of Delafield. The Duchess and Dr. Meredith are watching him from a distance:—

"It's like something wearing through,"—she said slowly. "I suppose it was always there—but it didn't show."

"Name your 'it'!"

"I can't!" But she gave a little shudder, which made Meredith look at her with curiosity.

"You feel something ghostly—unearthly?"

She nodded assent; crying out however immediately afterwards, as though in compunction, that he was one of the dearest and best of fellows!

"Of course he is," said Meredith. "It is only the mystic in him coming out. He is one of the men who have the sixth sense."

"Well, all I know is he has the oddest power over people!" said Evelyn, with another shiver. "If Freddie had it, my life wouldn't be worth living. Thank goodness, he hasn't a vestige!"

"At bottom it's the power of the priest," said Meredith. "And you women are far too susceptible towards it. Nine times out of ten it plays the mischief."

Mrs. Ward writes of the things that matter in the inner, individual life, and in no former book, we think, has her touch been surer, or her insight into motive and character more searching and sympathetic.

IN PICCADILLY. By Benjamin Swift. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE finest thing in Mr. Swift's art is a sort of intelligent inhumanity. Were it conceivable that the claw on a living animal should turn stylus, such writing as his might be the result. In his latest, as in former work, he limns with a curious combination of ingenuity and crudity characters that live in a waking dream of life rather than in life itself. Here we have Piccadilly, and down this Piccadilly move those cautious merchants of their own charms whom Aholibah would have disdained. But Mr. Swift's Scotch eye takes the image freshly, which is so stale in ours, and adorns it with "a misery of jewels." "Night was pouring into London like a drug, but Piccadilly was stark awake," he says, and will have it that she was visited by "the Greek witch Aphrodite . . . the immortal and gaudy idol of the soul's mania." It is an obstinate poeticism that speaks there; but Mr. Swift is not of the crowd who see what they will because they are frightened to see what they may. His picture of a married couple shadowed incessantly and openly by the woman's jilted lover derides the suggestion; so, too, does the brutal study of a valet, whose loathing for livery and passion for authority blossom at last in a reign of terror over his aged Scotch master. Mr. Swift should be the very man to put into art the coercive will-force manifested in hypnotism, which has hitherto been the refuge of bungling sensation-mongers. Both in "The Tormentor," and in the menial Dalbiac of the present novel, the writer exhibits intuitive science. Humour he gives us too; one may cite the cook who made a lamenting Frenchwoman swallow a pastry figure of herself. "Il faut avaler la tragédie!" he said.

In fact Mr. Swift is a power, as the phrase goes, though it were more correct to say two or three powers, the trouble being that they are at issue with one another. It is a mistake to interlace two bizarre stories in one short volume, and to weaken good psychology with arbitrary melodrama. Writing with his two hands, as it were, Mr. Swift is a pathetic figure.

THE JALASCO BRIG. By Louis Becke. (Treherne. 3s. 6d.)

MR. BECKE, when he is telling us the ways of the water and sky in the Southern Seas, is graphic and just; so, too, he can show us the islander with a touch that we recognise as right. Here he spins us a yarn of a stolen ship and of a stainless navigating officer who, by the aid of certain islanders, recovers her for the rightful owners. And in spinning this good enough yarn, we regret to say that he fails to rise above the conventions of his subject matter. "'Shame, Captain Rowley!' he cried thrusting him back, 'shame! would you murder an unarmed man?'"—that, we submit, is the style of the penny dreadful; and unfortunately it is the style characteristic of the bulk of the story. Also the grammar often is wild.

If this is not early work we are the more deceived; and if it is early work, we cannot commend the discretion of an author with a reputation in suffering it to appear. In the two short stories printed between the same covers, we find traces of the Mr. Becke who knows the water and sky of the Southern Seas and the gentle islanders. But what, unless that of filling out a prescribed number of pages, is the business served here by a magazine article on "Fighting Whales"?

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE BANNER OF BLUE. By S. R. CROCKETT.

"Grim, grey, dour, fell the early December twilight upon the seaboard parish of Gower. . . . But up on the side of Bennangour Anton MacMillan, the herd, drew his checked plaid more closely about him, and hummed a cheerful psalm." A story told by various narrators, and full of the dialect and matter which Mr. Crockett affects. A careful piece of work in the main, and marked by the author's usual unfailing invention. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

RANSON'S FOLLY. By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS.

Mary Cahill, the daughter of the post-trader, liked Lieutenant Ranson "because he was no 'cracker-box' captain, but a fighter who had fought with no morbid ideas as to the rights or wrongs of the cause, but for the fun of fighting." Mr. Harding Davis writes with his accustomed vigour. The volume contains three other stories. "The Derelict" is a vivid tale of war correspondents, and of the battle of Santiago Harbour. (Heinemann. 6s.)

A STRETCH OFF THE LAND. By G. STEWART BOWLES.

Sketches and stories of life on board a man-of-war. "The Honour of their Company" conveys a vivid picture of the gun-room mess. "Everyone in a gun-room can sing on occasion. . . . Many and strange are the songs. Songs from English music halls, from Japanese tea-houses . . . songs from the backwoods brought down to Sydney and heard after sunset floating along the great harbour; chancies from the ocean tramps; the songs and catches of all that world which can bring its speech or products to the sea." Mr. Bowles, who was "lately a sub-lieutenant in His Majesty's Fleet," is the author of "A Gun-Room Ditty Box." (Methuen. 6s.)

OVERDUE.

By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

Mr. Stanhope admonishes his daughter Phyllis on her preference for Captain Mostyn of the merchant service. "Hundreds of these men are starving, and you are walking about with one of them." Phyllis confesses that she is already married to Captain Mostyn. Her father turns her out of the house with a cheque for £100. By the fifth chapter Mr. Clark Russell is happy in having her at sea with the Captain. All other methods having failed, she went on board as a stowaway. (Chatto. 6s.)

THE TRIUMPH OF COUNT OSTERMAN. By GRAHAM HOPE.

A novel of diplomacy and of the Court of Peter the Great. The Tzar "had transplanted Russia from Asia to Europe; . . . she was beginning to grow now: she would soon flourish over-luxuriantly he feared, and need the pruning of a wiser gardener." The gardener upon whom Peter relied was his German minister, Osterman, whom he sought to attach to his adopted country by a Russian marriage. The author acknowledges his indebtedness to Prof. Morfill's "History of Russia." (Smith Elder. 6s.)

THE POET'S CHILD. By EMMA BROOKE.

Wynspeare of Wandisforth loved his bride with the passion of a man "who postpones the chief movement of his affections to his thirty-fifth year." But, on a visit to the metropolis, his "white Madonna" made the acquaintance of the Poet. When Lord Wynspeare died his will was found to contain curious conditions. If an heir were born "the act of bequeathment (which was also, in effect, an act affirming legitimacy) would depend on the attachment of her own signature." Lady Wynspeare's position was difficult, for the son she bore was "The Poet's Child." (Methuen. 6s.)

ARMS AND THE WOMAN. By HAROLD MACGRATH.

A story of an American journalist who fell in love, was refused by the lady, came into money and went to London. After that follow adventures in getting copy concerning the Princess Hildegard of Hohenphalia, who had "disappeared again." Also the place of Phyllis is supplied by Gretchen, who promises in the end never to take up the sword again save in her lord's defence. A bustling story, well told, but of the impossible order. (Pearson. 6s.)

CONNIE BURT. By GUY BOOTHBY.

When Maurice Ogilvie left Eton he observed to his housemaster, "I don't suppose I shall have to work for my living, so as I can read and write, and know what people mean when they talk about the Pons Asinorum, I expect I shall manage to rub along." But the estate became involved in debt, and when his father died, Maurice inherited nothing but the Baronetcy. He went to Australia, and was subsequently arrested for the murder of Connie, a lady of the music-hall stage, whom he had known in the days of his prosperity. (Ward Lock. 5s.)

KNIT BY FELONY. By E. LIVINGSTON PRESCOTT.

Louis Tallantyre was the child of an eccentric recluse "whose attitude towards his son was a well-worn scandal of the country side." The boy had shown a disposition to villainy, but upon the death of his father without a will he "began life afresh as a wealthy subaltern in the regiment he had joined as a ragged, despairing recruit." The story moves to India. The author has assigned her pecuniary interest in the book to the "British Home for Incurables." (Richards. 6s.)

The Poetry of Silence.

THE philosophy of silence has been over and over again a favourite topic of the garrulous and the unphilosophic. Every one of us has been at one time or other compelled to listen to a wordy discourse upon the uselessness of words. The futility of all this in itself proves the impotence of words to translate a feigned attitude of the soul. But in literature there have been genuine expositors of silence, brooding souls haunted by the suggestions of a meaning to life wholly alien from the visible contact with men and things. Amongst these interpreters of silence there have been those whose silence consists in the voluntary refraining from speech, such as Sénancour. There have been others for whom silence means a listening in expectation of some new and mysterious vibration, such as Amiel. And finally there have been those who seem really to hear a deep inner voice, such as Maeterlinck. The first is lonely in his silence and remote from human sympathy. The second is paralysed by his very intentness, concentrated wholly upon catching the illusive whisper which is to explain the inexplicable. But for the third the meaning of life seems to be really luminous, and he is profoundly sympathetic with nature and with the human heart.

George Leneveu has called Maeterlinck a "collectionneur d'états d'âme," and in that one phrase he shows us the uselessness of comparing, for example, "Aglavaine et Sélysette" with any phase of modern drama. For Maeterlinck's drama is one in which the action is the expression of the soul rather than of the will. The characters speak, but one feels that this "action" neither commences with their speech nor ceases with their silence. It is infinitely subtle, but it is also permanent. Aglavaine glides through the play, shadowy as a dream, haunting as a dream. But one feels that she is and has always been. She has not told us her story as a woman of flesh and blood, but she has communicated to us the more evasive message of her soul. In other words, just as there is behind the tricks of gesture, the smile, the frown, the interrogative glance, the mocking challenge of ordinary social intercourse, a something which tells the sensitive who is their friend or their enemy, so Maeterlinck contrives to suggest by words that which is behind the mask of language, whether of word or gesture—the state of the soul. And to him these pervading phantoms with whom he communicates and through whom he speaks are nearer and more real than the creations of French drama who "ne peuvent pas se taire, ou ils ne seraient plus."

In a one-act play by De L'isle-Adam we have an extraordinary example of the same attitude of the soul brought into close contact with actuality. We see in this play, "La Révolte," two people for a few hours, and we learn their lives—that much it is the métier of the dramatist to teach us. But we learn more, and yet this little play is strangely differentiated from those of Maeterlinck. Baldly and briefly, Félix, the husband, is a man of commerce, sunk in commerce, lost in commerce. He believes in the gospel of the exact sciences and he sees plainly. For four years, Elizabeth, his wife, has echoed his lucidity and has appeared in all things to see as plainly as her husband. But for four years she has been waiting for the hour of escape, and it is at that hour that the play opens. For in that hour she tells him all, how she has stifled in this atmosphere of regularity and calm, how she has longed for the escape which will give freedom to her soul. No lover claims her. "Je vais," she exclaims, "renouer avec le silence, c'est mon viel ami." So far the motif seems to be that of "The Doll's House" of Ibsen. In each case the woman leaves her husband to seek alone the real meaning of life. But in "La Révolte" the woman returns with the despairing cry on her lips: "Trop tard: je n'ai plus d'âme." They had beaten her in these four years of words and materialism; it was no longer possible for her "renouer avec le silence."

Some time ago Maurice Maeterlinck published twelve short poems which are typical of his inimitable symbolism. The volume has recently been translated into English by Mr. Martin Schütze (Seymour: Chicago). The translator shows in his preface a genuine appreciation of Maeterlinck and of the gospel of the "awakening of the soul." He has sympathy and enthusiasm, and now and again he comes near to caging in our language the illusive, unearthly melody of the Belgian poet. Here, for example, one might also imagine that he had really caught the fleeting beauty of its spirit:—

He thinks it is of strange import,
 He thinks it is a golden vein,
 He thinks it is an angel sport,
 He turns aside to pass again . . .

This is good, the cage is a golden one, but the melody of Maeterlinck comes from outside the bars. Listen to it:—

Il croit que c'est un signe étrange,
 Il croit que c'est une source d'or,
 Il croit que c'est un jeu des anges,
 Il se détourne et passe encore . . .

It is a commonplace that for the haunting vibrations of poetry there is much in favour of our language as compared with French. Moreover, these verses are of an extreme, an almost childish simplicity, and yet—

You are sixteen years my sisters,
 Go far away,
 Take my staff my sisters,
 And seek alway . . .

is very, very far from—

Vous avez seize ans, mes sœurs,
 Allez loin d'ici,
 Prenez mon bourdon, mes sœurs,
 Et cherchez aussi . . .

how far, no subtlety of assonance or rhythm can ever explain. And this fact is the more significant because the translator in his preface dwells upon this poem as interpreting Maeterlinck's own striving for the splendid simplicity of the third "essence," the "sphere" of the soul life.

The syllables of these poems fall like far-off echoes breaking momentarily an immense silence. That is how they come to us. They tell no story of human love or hate, or joy or grief, but they summon us to an altitude at which soul speaks to soul in the subtle language of silence.

M. De L'isle Adam has shown us that it is impossible to translate into the language of action the soul life, which, blighted by materialism, loses its hidden power and dares not face silence. We have called these twelve lyrics the poetry of silence because they must ever remain remote from the common speech and thought of men. Neither Mr. Schütze nor anyone else will ever translate them except in a verbal sense, and mere verbal accuracy brings us but little nearer to them. For they vibrate from an atmosphere remote from us, an atmosphere of which

Maeterlinck has written in "Le Trésor des Humbles": "Les âmes se pèsent dans le silence, comme l'or et l'argent se pèsent dans l'eau pure, et les paroles que nous prononçons n'ont de sens que grâce au silence où elles baignent."

There, bathed in a cold and impenetrable silence, freed from intellect even as intellect has been freed from the senses, soul communicates to soul the secret of a larger harmony.

Contrasts.

THE art of the short story in England is still almost a tentative art. The mere technical difficulties of the form have, we believe, been over-rated; the true difficulty lies rather in our national temperament, which does not run to sharp definition of ideas or verbal conciseness, and in particular may be referred to an inherent modern prejudice against the small thing well done. As a matter of fact, in literature, the small thing well done is not with us over-marketable, whereas for the small thing crudely done thousands of mouths are agape. This fact is clamant in our magazines, where the short story finds its birth and usually its grave. In America, we must admit, the short story is taken more seriously. There are half-a-dozen American writers who have made the short story almost great. One of those whom we propose to discuss is American, but we like to think of him as at least half our own.

Mr. Henry James has written scores of short stories, Mr. Israel Zangwill by no means so many; each has used the short story as a means of actual personal expression, and each has achieved success in a baffling art. No two methods could be more unlike than the methods of these writers; no real comparison is possible; yet the simultaneous publication of a volume of stories by each suggests certain contrasts which may be worth consideration.

Mr. Henry James's "The Better Sort" (Methuen) breaks no new ground. In the main Mr. James's characters are drawn from that leisured class which has always irresistibly appealed to a mind intent on dissecting vital trivialities, if we may be allowed the phrase. One of the stories, indeed, deals with a young newspaper man and a young newspaper woman, but these two talk, on the whole, pretty much as all Mr. James's people talk, which is to say that they play with conversational threads with the dexterity of conjurors. Mr. Zangwill's volume, "The Grey Wig" (Heinemann), has a rather wider range of subjects, and represents the author's work over a number of years. "The Big Bow Mystery" and "Merely Mary Ann" were first published some ten years ago; "The Grey Wig," if we remember rightly, only about twelve months ago. In the long-short story Mr. Zangwill has made distinct advance; "The Grey Wig" is more delicate, more persuasive, than the earlier stories we have named. But Mr. Zangwill, to our thinking, hardly approaches in this more elaborate work to the force and hard reality of certain of his brief "Ghetto Tragedies."

There is this similarity between Mr. James and Mr. Zangwill, that each builds up his fabric on trifles, each has an eye for those small things of life which are the essence of tragedy or comedy. But there the similarity ends. Mr. James works by suggestion, by implication; he demands from his readers not only a sympathetic mood, but also an acute intelligence; he will by no means act the part of conscious guide through the delightful or terrifying labyrinths which he explores. As he makes one of his characters say, "it is not my fault if I am so put together as often to find more life in situations obscure and subject to interpretation than in the gross rattle of the foreground." Mr. Zangwill, on the other hand, has little of Mr. James's elusiveness; he knows precisely what he wants to do, and does it with a firm assurance. But he gives us none of those thrills, none of those sub-conscious recognitions, which spring from delicate art. Such a story as "The Big Bow Mystery," indeed, excellent though it is in its way, cannot be called art at all; it is a piece of clever mechanics, with mechanical characterization and mechanical effects. "Merely Mary Ann" is better, though in that story the study of the servant girl seems to us to miss the essentials in a curious and unaccountable way. Yet it is a story to be read, and gives Mr. Zangwill opportunities for the play of a suggestive and often bitter irony. Better still are "Chasse-Croisé" and "The Woman Beater," though again we feel that Mr. Zangwill's reading of women, at any rate of youngish women, is by no means profound. This, in a book described as "mainly a study of woman," is a defect which forces itself home. "The Grey Wig," which we take to be the best story in the volume, deals delightfully with two impoverished old ladies, and has in it both humour and pathos. As a piece of art, however, it is spoilt by an entirely arbitrary ending, which misses the effect of real tragedy. If we had to say in a word what Mr. Zangwill's work lacked, we should say it lacked beauty. It has no touch of lyrical impulse; its appeal is seldom to the imagination; its outlines are clear, hard, almost photographic. This, in certain of the "Ghetto Tragedies," was pure gain, but in work of the kind before us it is loss. We never seem to approach intimacy with Mr. Zangwill's characters; their cleverness is detached; they are of our world, indeed, but seldom of our household. And yet we should be sorry to see Mr. Zangwill attempt to depict ordinary sentiment, for when he approaches it we find ourselves at once in an artificial atmosphere where even mild passion assumes a pose. Mr. Zangwill has not yet perhaps discovered his limitations. It is important that he should discover them, for we have few writers, within those limitations, so sincere and so well-equipped.

Mr. James, on the other hand, discovered his limitations long ago. We are sometimes inclined to think that he has too deliberately circumscribed his method—his outlook was never circumscribed. There are two or three stories in the volume before us that intrinsically would seem to have been hardly worth doing, yet they are so accomplished in craftsmanship, so assured of touch, that for those qualities alone they remain minor achievements. Who but Mr. James could have written "The Story in It"? We have two women and a man; between a pair of them there exists an irregular affection which is most subtly suggested in a conversation which hovers round the abstract. The second woman loves the same man, but the romance for her consists in the fact that the man does not know it.

Mrs. Dyott continued to gaze. "The object's unaware—?" "Utterly."

Mrs. Dyott turned it over. "Are you sure?" "Sure."

"That's what you call your decency? But isn't it," Mrs. Dyott asked, "rather his?"

"Dear, no. It's only his good fortune."

Mrs. Dyott laughed. "But yours, darling—your good fortune: where does that come in?"

"Why, in my sense of the romance of it."

"The romance of what? Of his not knowing?"

"Of my not wanting him to. If I did"—Maud had touchingly worked it out—"where would be my honesty?"

Later, Mrs. Dyott tells the man all about the other lady's infatuation, and the man sums up the thing like this:—

Not a romance like their own, a thing to make the fortune of any author up to the mark—one who should have the intention or who could have the courage; but a small, scared, starved, subjective satisfaction that would do her no harm and nobody else any good. Who but a duffer—he stuck to his contention—would see the shadow of a "story" in it?

The slightness of the sketch constitutes half its charm; so much is implied, so little expressed. It represents quite typically the remarkable alertness and intuition of Mr. James's mind—a mind which, as it were, thrusts forth innumerable tentacles to select from the mass its proper food. It is perhaps this selective faculty which marks Mr. James as a supreme artist; he seizes the apparently trivial and indicates how the trivial may guide great issues and victoriously assert itself as conqueror in the end. Comedy and tragedy, after all, are seldom heroic; they are compact of the infinite littlenesses which only in their unconscious accumulation load either side of the scales which we label with their names. There are, of course, gross tragedies and gross comedies whose mere crudity robs them of artistic value; those Mr. James very properly leaves to the dozens of writers who exploit them on and off the stage. Mr. James, indeed, always deals with reality; you may now and then doubt his means, you may occasionally be slightly annoyed by his deliberate indirectness, but you can never get away from the conviction that all the time he has his hand on some human pulse.

Of Mr. James's grip of essential tragedy we have a fine instance in the volume before us. "The Beast in the Jungle" is not heroic tragedy, it is pitiful and poignant tragedy, worked out with a precision and an analytical force which show Mr. James at his best. The story tells of a man who lived in fear of some terrible visitation, some beast in the jungle which might at any time leap upon him and bear him to destruction. The obsession is not rare in certain forms of nervous disease, but Mr. James raises the idea far above the regions of pathology. Marcher, when he was young, had hinted at this terror to a girl whom he met casually abroad; ten years later they meet casually again, and she asks, "Has it ever happened?" It had not happened, and the terror is still with him, so the pair glide into an intimacy whose core is the unknown beast. The woman becomes Marcher's protectress, as it were, the sole sharer of his devastating secret, and for years this curious intimacy continues, continues till the woman grows old and has the hand of death upon her. Then she understands, but he does not, and she refuses to tell him what she believes the dread to be. Says Marcher:—

"... I feel your beliefs are right. Therefore if, having this one, you give me no more light on it, you abandon me."

"No, no!" she repeated, "I'm with you—don't you see?—still." And as if to make it more vivid to him she rose from her chair—a movement she seldom made in these days—and showed herself, all draped and all soft, in her fairness and slimmess. "I haven't forsaken you."

And still the man did not see, nor did he see until the woman was dead, and the beast had leapt upon him:—

The escape would have been to love her; then, then he would have lived. She had lived—who could say now with what passion?—since she had loved him for himself; whereas he had never thought of her (ah, how it hugely glared at him!) but in the chill of his egotism and the light of her use.

The whole story is remarkable, not only in itself, but as one of those indirect comments upon life in general which Mr. James delights to give us.

There are indications that the short story in England is likely to assume some real vitality. It is, at any rate, a hopeful sign, though there is at present arrayed against it an almost impregnable want of knowledge and appreciation. With Mr. James and Mr. Zangwill there are others who have set their hand seriously to the work, and to these we look for the emancipation of an art too long fettered to the follies of an arbitrary convention and the assumed needs of a public which it should be the business of serious writers to lead and not to follow.

Impressions.

XXIII.—Our Dream.

THIS is what I read: "Those whom we believe to be dead have entered into real life, and they wait for our dream to finish." Putting down the book and closing my eyes I recalled, without effort, the time long ago when a companion had whispered that communication into my astonished ears. Now, by chance, idly turning the leaves of a volume in a second-hand book-shop, it cried out to me again, bringing back the time when I had first heard it. Was it a dream or reality? Had I really experienced the magnetism of that night, and heard that music?

But the impression of the violinist's personality was vivid enough. I saw her once, and once only, in the rough dining-room of a Bavarian inn among the mountains. She had walked modestly on to the temporary platform, indifferent to the family parties that were gathered at the tables. A young girl, pale, with large eyes and nondescript hair, she stood there for a moment tuning her violin. Then she played, and gradually the babble of talk ceased, heads were stretched forward, and over that assembly came silence. Did she realise the force of her extraordinary gift? Had she any prevision of the years to come when she would hypnotise the world as she held the few in that bare room? Probably not. Her entire sensibility was given to her playing; sometimes the emotion that went in gusts through her slight body, impelling music from the strings, made me start as if a shot had been fired. She played: it was as if we listened to a message from the dead. Voices spoke in the silence of that room. And a living voice, my companion's, whispered: "Those whom we believe to be dead have entered into real life, and they wait for our dream to finish."

Our dream! But when the violinist had finished, the spell that she had woven over us persisted. We were still initiates at a mystery. What happened later remains also part of the excursion into the unrevealed whither the violinist led us; one of the German family gatherings sang a part-song very quietly. This was the song:—

Wo weilt er?—Im kalten, im schaurigen Land.
Wo ruht er?—Am Meere auf steinigem Sand.
Was treibt er?—Er haschet das fliehende Glück.
Was denkt er?—Er sehnt sich zur Heimath zurück.
O grüsst ihn, ihr Wolken im schaurigen Land;
O kühlt ihn, ihr Lüftchen, am steinigem Sand;
O kränz' ihn, du falsches treuloses Glück.
Ich ruf' ihn: "O kehre zur Heimath zurück."

The spell still held. I looked at my companion. Our minds were filled with the same bitter-sweet thought. But for him there was no return, only the waiting for our dream to finish! Then a figment of that dream, a longing that was warp and woof of it, found expression, and the Germans turned, stared, and listened gravely, eyes peering through spectacles at my companion, who sang in English this petition:—

I have desired to go
Where springs not fail,
To fields where flies no sharp and sided hail,
And a few lilies blow.
And I have asked to be
Where no storms come,
Where the green swell is in the havens dumb,
And out of the swing of the sea.

So that episode in our dream ended. It was long ago. I lived it over again in a flash, as the man in the German fable lived three hundred years listening for three minutes to a bird's song.

"John Inglesant."

A FIGURE, curiously incongruous in English fiction, has passed away. It has not been usual for all English novelists, even the greatest of them, to regard their art quite seriously, but the late Mr. Shorthouse was one of the exceptions. The fashions of novels come and go, and occasionally they assume the mask of history. We are given, indeed, names and dates and phrases, but these things do not give flesh and blood to the phantoms that have been evoked so carelessly. There is a something hidden in the centuries which no amount of painstaking accuracy can ever reproduce, and because of this we recognize constantly beneath the sonorous appeals from the past, the imposture of an inadequate ventriloquism. Just now this ventriloquism is particularly obvious, and yet it is not so very long ago since an English book was published which was instinct with the historic sense, and the feeling for an age that had passed. These things give the glamour of tone, of atmosphere, the illusion of art penetrating through history. But there is another illusion to be found in "John Inglesant."

As you read this or that novel of to-day you feel that you are in the atmosphere of a conservatory. With others, again, you feel that you are in a garden, with others in fields, separated in each case one from the other, limited, arranged. Of the elemental influences, the influences of the sea, the plains, and the forest, these authors know nothing, and yet it is precisely by these primitive influences that some of the greatest writers have been dominated. Even to-day we have Pierre Loti, who has expressed with so subtle an analysis the barren passion of the sea, and Maxim Gorki, who translates for us the whisper of the steppes that challenges the wanderer to endless distances. Of the third influence, that of the forest, very few books—"Lorna Doone" is one of them—are more typical than "John Inglesant."

And just as this book is impregnated with a spirit utterly alien from that of the average novelist, so it expresses ideals that to the majority of us have become mere phrases. Briefly these ideals are, setting aside the question of religion, personal fidelity to a personal sovereign and single-hearted reverence for one woman. These two ideals in themselves revive an old attitude of thought towards history. For, since Voltaire, history has ceased to be the register of courts and camps, and, in sympathy with this democratic tendency, the novel has passed further and further away from romance and has drawn nearer and nearer to sociology. That the very word "chivalry" has become almost too meaningless to be used as a sneer is of course obvious, but this fact also can be accounted for by the same general movement. Democracy, which pulled the hero from his pedestal, did not spare the heroine. All men must stand a little higher, but there must be no pedestals: women must have their rights as sensible economic factors, but there must be no exaltation. There must, in point of fact, be very little worship of any kind. Against all this a very strong protest was written, and the protest was "John Inglesant."

This book was proudly called a romance, and in it the romantic as opposed to the sociological spirit is applied to history. It is the spirit which accepts a tradition without criticism and spurs a man to die for it without comment. It is the spirit which made of love the crown or the despair of heroism, a conquest or a martyrdom, anything under heaven excepting a sneer of fatigue. Well, in four vivid scenes these ideals find culminating utterance. The first comes to one with all the tragedy of history: it is the scene in which the king questions Inglesant about the ghost of Strafford. The second is that in which Inglesant allows the woman he loves to pass out of his life. The third scene is the one in which

Inglesant, "fighting a desperate battle for the King's honour, forsaken by God and men," lies for the House of Stuart. The fourth is the one in which Mary Collet dies. In these four scenes, historic and personal—the personal loyalty to the woman merging always in the personal loyalty to the sovereign—we find a picture of life without which literature would be the poorer, a conception of conduct concerning which all words are idle:—

The old familiar glamour that shed such a holy radiance on the woods and fields of Gidding, now, to Inglesant's senses, filled the little convent room. The light of heaven that entered the open window with the perfume of the hawthorn was lost in the diviner radiance that shone from this girl's face into the depths of his being, and bathed the place where she was in light. His heart ceased to beat, and he lay, as in a trance, to behold the Glory of God.

That "glamour" of the forest and that "light" of the soul are symbolic of the romance called "John Inglesant."

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

By the death of Gaston Paris the world of letters loses a most distinguished and seductive personality. In his youth he was known as "le beau Gaston," and his amorous adventures were many and famous. Fifteen years ago, when I came to Paris to settle here, I first met him, and even then, though long past youth, he was remarkably handsome, with a singular charm of manner and conversation. There was inevitably that touch of slightly affected graciousness that marks the conquerors of both sexes, a certain self-consciousness of charm and magnetism which evidently men and women appreciate since it everywhere accompanies fascination. But how admirably, how easily he spoke, with a delightful modulation and a delicate insistence of gesture to accentuate his utterance! I preferred him infinitely in the simpler days, before he became the director of the Collège de France, when I constantly met him at intimate little dinners, and he charmed us all by lamp-shade with his witty and suggestive talk. I have never heard anyone tell a tale so supremely well as he. The mystery to us all who tasted the graceful charm of his conversation was how he managed to write in so cumbrous, so laboured, so involved a style. As a writer he lacked most of the qualities he possessed so pre-eminently as a talker. His touch was heavy and pedantic: he, so sure a critic of French prose, could give to his own nothing of the charm, the grace, the witching lightness and clarity that characterise that matchless medium of wit. This was possibly due to the fact that his serious studies were made in Germany, and the forming years of style were spent over long-winded German sentences. At his instant request I consented to translate his last book, written for Messrs. Dent, "Mediaeval French Literature," and in many cases I have split up his sentences into five or six. One I remember numbered exactly fifty lines. The book did not attract the attention due to it in England, thanks to the unworthy way it was produced, which excited the indignation of many of his disciples in England and France. Such an important contribution to letters deserved a different treatment at the hand of the publishers, and poor M. Paris was so disappointed at the ugly and inconspicuous dress of his last work in English that he did not even send out the presentation copies he had promised to his intimate friends, and wrote me a lamentable little letter, the last I received from him—for almost immediately afterwards his long winter illness began—expressing his great regret that I should have been induced to devote so much labour upon a task so ill-rewarded. In friendship he was extraordinarily faithful and devoted, and he inspired an unlimited affection in his pupils. The modern French novel he abhorred, and when some time ago I attacked this nauseous literature in the ACADEMY, he wrote and thanked me warmly, saying that no foreigners could find books like those of Louys, &c., more odious than Frenchmen like himself. In fact, unless assured by some one on whose opinion he could rely that a new novel was not pornographic, he declined to open it. Even "Gyp" he held to be "infamous," and was seriously distressed when a writer like Anatole France descended to competition with the band of novelists who, as he sternly put it in a letter to me, "enervate and degrade France."

When "La Terre qui Meurt" appeared, we fondly believed that in M. René Bazin a novelist of the first rank was revealed. But since then M. Bazin has given us two novels, "Les Oberlé" last year, and this month "Donatienne," and alas! neither is above the level of mediocre literature. There was an indescribable and mournful charm in "La Terre qui Meurt" which we look for in vain in "Donatienne." The former is a tale that lingers long in the memory with the sweetness and delicacy of an unforgettable melody. It holds its place with "La Mare au Diable" or "La Petite Fadette" of George Sand, but nothing in "Donatienne" arrests or captivates us. It is merely a well-written story, spoiled by an improbable ending. It is quite unlikely that a woman capable of Donatienne's heartless abandonment of husband and young children not even for an overwhelming passion, but for the mere perverse attractions of city luxuries, would be touched by their accumulated misfortunes and return to them in the very depth of poverty. The sufferings of the father and children are great, and the father's dogged peasant pride in concealing from his fellows of the road the humiliating fact that his wife has forsaken him touches our sympathy, but somehow M. Bazin has failed to give his treatment of the subject the note of pathos he so obviously strives for. It is forced and dull, though the writing is careful, deliberate, and finished. But Louarn's miseries do not seem to us inevitable. Having his children there, and all young, one wonders why he should choose to sell his home and wander like a vagabond because his wife, who went up to Paris as a wet-nurse, prefers to stay there instead of returning to her humble Breton hearth. It is doubtful if anywhere in France the mother of young children she loved would be capable of this choice. Donatienne becomes the mistress of a coachman she does not love, and opens a public-house. In this way, after years of suffering and privation, Noëmi, her eldest daughter, is able to communicate with her, and hearing of her husband's illness and infirmity, Donatienne leaves her lover, her public-house, and Paris, and rushes back to her miserable family on the wings of love. We are not convinced that in the flesh Donatienne would have been guilty either of the abandonment or the return.

Léon de Tinseau is a mild and amiable writer whom the Young Person can read without emotion or a blush. "La Princesse Errante" is an interesting story with some semblance of being taken from life, else why make his princess by choice a stewardess? For a French novel it is curiously exotic. A beautiful Swede is betrayed by the prince Royal, and exiled after compulsory marriage. Her life and her daughter's in America are told with a striking air of actuality.

Drama.

The Glamour of Melodrama.

THE devotee of melodrama will find his earthly paradise just now at the Adelphi, where they are giving Mr. Walter Melville's "realistic sensational" piece of "The Worst Woman in London." Already, one understands, the play has had its vogue in districts which very properly plume themselves upon being judges of melodrama. There can be no doubt that it is the real thing. Mr. Melville will have none of your half-and-half compromises. He is no Wilson Barrett or Hall Caine, with their sneaking desire to be literary. Nor does he share the megalomania of Drury Lane, with its craze for scenic splendour, for the well-drilled crowd and the ingenious mechanism. He is content to rely on human flesh and blood, to search the wickedness and exalt the nobility of the human heart. Like Bill Crichton, he "plays the game." The ancient moral issue shall be plainly stated. The villains shall be frankly black; the righteous shall be spotless as the ermine. And in the end, justice shall be done. And so four acts full of dark treacheries and outspoken loyalties, full of plots frustrated and thrilling escapes. Here are all our old friends once more: the broken man in search of his revenge, the lover over whom hangs a wholly unmerited cloud of suspicion, the faithful girl with blonde hair and trusting eyes, the adventuress with copper locks and a wry smile, the amorous and senile pantaloons who falls a ready victim to her snares. And for comic relief what do you want more than the policeman, the cook, the outwitted detective, the "drunks" of both sexes? From such the rill of honest laughter flows perennial. If one may suggest a fault, it is perhaps to be found in a certain dissipation of the dramatic interest, which swells to its stirring situation at the end of each act, while the progressive unity which should bind the acts into a whole is somewhat neglected. The piece is episodic, rather than epic, in its conception.

This invasion of West is not without its amusing features. It is, of course, the occupants of the gallery who set the critical key-note; their unstinted applause which the virtuous sentiments never fail to wake; their groans and cat-calls, which, at the fall of the curtain, send Miss Edith Cole flying in mock terror to the wings. The stalls are less vocal, but I do not think that they are for the most part unsympathetic. There are deaf souls, one fears, in every audience; and certain scenes, notably, a sort of inverted Desdemona business, in which the pantaloons, dressed in a long white nightgown, puts himself to bed in preparation for his murder, evoke in the minority manifestations of unholy mirth, at which the majority wax indignant. For my part I remember the day on which the Philistines sniggered at the live filaments of Mélisande's hair hung out of the window, and am avenged. It will, perhaps, be apparent that I have not the "Open Sesame!" of melodrama. This particular glamour is not for me. Possibly my play-going days came too late. But I am quite aware that it has been a very real glamour for many persons, whose critical opinions I should be the last to despise. Thackeray, for example, loved the "vast, delightful complication of crime" of plays hardly more literary than the "The Worst Woman in London." Charles Lamb, too, one is sure, sat out a goodly number of melodramas in his day. The type can hardly be dismissed as merely the tragedy-comedy of the illiterate. Evidently it must respond to some instinct in the human mind which ought not to be beyond the reach of analysis. I imagine that the very crudity of the melodramatic presentation of things has a good deal to do with the matter. We live, as at the end of the last century we were never tired of reminding each other, in an age of analysis. The task of criticism is the application of psychology to imaginative literature. The realisation of the infinite complexity of human character and conduct, the discrimination of delicate shades of motive, the finer moral judgment: such are the ends at which, not without some difficulty and stress of spirit, we aim. Melodrama is the reaction from all this to what certainly is not a more true, but as certainly is a simpler and less fatiguing attitude towards life:—

In tragic life, God wot!
No villain needs be. Passions spin the plot.
We are betrayed by what is false within.

But melodrama rejects the introspective mood, and finds it far neater and more intelligible to have the recognised and apparent villain. "Purr, the cat is gray!" says the psychologist. "Pooh!" says melodrama, "a cat is white, or it is black, and there's an end of it."

I need hardly say that the tradition of melodrama on the English stage is very much older than that of either tragedy or comedy. The formula of the miracle-plays, with their vast cosmic theme of the Fall and the Redemption, is essentially melodramatic. They have their incarnate villain, in Lucifer, their protagonist of righteousness, their visible heaven and hell, their crude symbolism of white-robed "savyd sowles" and black-a-vised "dampnyd sowles." Falstaff "saw a flea stick upon Bardolph's nose, and a' said it was a black soul burning in hell-fire." The devils, with their horns and hoofs, and clanging chains and beaten kettles, as you might see them not so long ago painted on the walls of the Guild Chapel at Stratford-on-Avon, afforded the comic relief, at least as dear to the mediæval crowd as to the modern gallery. They were also the ministers of poetic justice. It was their business to drag the "dampnyd sowles," into the smoking hell, fashioned like the gullet and jaws of a fabulous monster, while the "savyd sowles" passed up the rickety stairs amongst the choirs of singing angels to the heaven on high. And, naturally, there was not much of psychological subtlety about the moral judgments of the miracle-play. Stay! I do remember one instance. In the twelfth-century Anglo-Norman play known as the "Jeu d'Adam," each of the Old Testament fathers and prophets is in turn haled off to hell after his part has been played, because the time of salvation is not yet. But a distinction is made. After the scene of Cain and Abel comes the stage-direction: "Venientes autem diaboli ducent Chaim saepius pulsantes ad infernum; Abel vero ducent mitius." Damnation for both; but a hard damnation for Cain and a gentle damnation for Abel. The tempering of justice with mercy, inadequate as it is, must be taken as a concession to the psychologist.

Dutchmen and a Recluse.

ADVANCE paragraphs about the opening of the French Salons, with the pictorial orgy they herald, predisposed me to visit the two exhibitions of Dutch pictures that have just been opened in London. With the Dutchmen you may count upon sobriety, repose, and painting that is distinguished and unaffected. Essentially is this so with the Dutch artists of the seventeenth century, a collection of whose works is now being shown at Messrs. Lawrie's, in Bond Street. It is not easy to analyse the intellectual pleasure that such a picture as "The Portrait of a Boy," by Frans Hals, gives. So simply done, with such apparent ease, this portrait rests in its frame in calm assurance that no vagary of fashion, no change of taste, can ever detract from its perfect accomplishment and grave beauty. Nothing in it disturbs or distracts: against one of these faintly lighted walls that the Dutchmen painted so consummately, you notice that pale, studious boy reading. That is all. And this is by that astonishing Hals who could paint a jolly cavalier, a jovial group, or a wanton serving-maid with the same unerring instinct for the true meaning of what he saw before him. How clear and direct was his vision: he saw, rare gift! things as they are, and no wiles of the imagination ever came between him and his work to weaken or falsify it. That Reading Boy remains with one like some august portrait by Velasquez. And Terburg! How describe the particular charm that such a picture as his "Card Party" has! The players are not attractive, there is no particular interest in the incident. A group of card players on the walls of the Royal Academy rouses no emotion, but this family gathering in a Dutch room of the seventeenth century has the elements of greatness, and appeals as only a masterpiece can. Is it because the greatest of the Dutchmen felt intensely what Manet expressed in words: "Light is the principal person in a picture"? But there is light and light. For Manet and his school it was the vibrating light of the sun in the open air. For Terburg, Vermeer, de Hooch, and Hals it was the pale light that filters from grey skies into dark, panelled rooms, giving feeling to walls, and life to the texture of clothes. It was his profound knowledge of the subtleties of imprisoned light that enabled Terburg to give such loveliness to the satin dress worn by the woman in his picture of "The Card Party."

But it is not to the Dutchmen we go for the brilliant light of day on meadow, stream, and harvest field. The French impressionists, among others, made that their province, but those vivid pioneers are not for all moods. Oftener I am drawn to the men of 1830—Corot, Troyon, Daubigny, Michel, &c.—some of whose pictures, from the collection of Sir John Day, were shown last year at Messrs. Obach's galleries, and discussed in these columns in the month of March. We were then promised a sight of the second part of Sir John Day's collection—the Dutch pictures. These are now on view, twenty-nine of them, and all belong to the nineteenth century. I found the first glimpse of this collection a little disappointing. The strong note of individuality, and the exquisite quality of the paint that distinguishes the work of the Dutchman of the seventeenth century, has disappeared. These men of the nineteenth are cosmopolitan, and something of the sadness of the modern has suffused itself into their pictures. They no longer, as a class, delight in painting simple interiors, episodes of domestic and social life for their own sake; and when they step into the open air, one feels that they have not really challenged the light of the sun. Mesdag bears an honoured name in the world of art, but his grey seas, stormy sunsets, and threatening skies lack, for me, the vitality and gusto that would make them entirely acceptable. Israels is another honoured name, but he sees life in terms of weariness and sorrow. His "Anxious Wife" seated in a darkening room peers through the window into the sunset, and not all the glow of the evening light outside can make the picture pleasing. Anton Mauve, who is apparently a favourite with Sir John Day, as he has purchased twelve of his pictures, has seen the sunlight, and followed it flecking through trees and glinting on the backs of sheep nibbling as they walk. Mauve will show you cows ruminating in line against a bare landscape, and tended by a Bastien Lepage figure that stands willfully out from the picture. But Mauve is not a master. Let him be described as one of the talented.

Fortunately for the critic, there is in every exhibition some group of pictures that stirs the imagination, some painter whose personality stands out from the rest, offering himself as a subject for the pen. The youngest of the brothers Maris gave me this opportunity. More than half the pictures in this collection are by one or other of the three brothers. Jacob, the eldest, who died four years ago, was sometimes a great landscape painter. In such pictures as the "Towing Path" and "Ploughing" there is movement and vigour, as there is in the scurry of the clouds in his "Flickering Moon." His later pictures, such as "Amsterdam from the River" and "Near Dordrecht," have a quiet charm in keeping with the Dutch waterways and buildings that grow old so beautifully. William, the second brother, has a daintier touch. Pleasing are the delicate greens of his "Cattle in the Meadows," and you can judge of his disposition by reading the titles of two of his other pictures, "Ducks in a Pond" and "Cattle in the Meadows." But there is little to single him out from other landscape painters of ability.

With the youngest brother, William Maris, it is different. From time to time during the past decade I have seen pictures by him, and always with the feeling that here was a man of personal vision, reproducing in his work some remote, mystical inheritance that transforms all he sees. Like Mantegna, Botticelli, Rossetti, and Burne Jones, his pictures recall the phrase, "beauty touched with strangeness." On each is impressed the illusive outreachings of a complex temperament, on the "He is Coming," which was etched some years ago by Mr. Hole, on the two small pictures by him that stand out in curious isolation in this exhibition. It is difficult to express in words the charm of "The Four Mills." Is it the golden tone of this study of buildings and water? Is it the precision and quality of the painting, or the gay unobtrusive lighting of the picture, with its tiny incidents that only disclose themselves when you peer into it? Wherein lies the charm of his "Feeding Chickens"? Is it enough to say that it evokes the same feeling as a Hans Andersen fairy tale? Matthew Maris is an artist with a temperament. The gift of the inner eye is his.

Eager to know more about him, I referred to "Dutch Painters of the Nineteenth Century," and there I found a long, illustrated article on Matthew. Let me quote two passages. When he went to Paris "the most beautiful pictures were begun, but that eternal dissatisfaction—which was as obstinate as that deep melancholy which penetrates into the innermost soul of a man, until the two become inseparable—took away all his powers of work and destroyed his confidence, which was already wrecked by overmuch seeing and admiring." Later in the article I find this about our "dreamer from the misty North," who is described as having the touch of a van Eyck, with the culture of a Da Vinci: "a visionary wandering and lost in these unsettled times; a stranger whose sensitiveness prevented him from making friends; an idealist not proof against the materialism of to-day; a lonely man in every sense of the word."

He is living now in a suburb of London where he has "found rest and isolation."

The Evidence for Telepathy.

My thanks are due to Sir Oliver Lodge for his courtesy in offering to submit to me the material bearing on the subject of thought-transference or telepathy that has been collected by the Society for Psychical Research during the past twenty years. I was led to the subject by Sir Oliver Lodge's third presidential address recently delivered to that Society, in which he spoke of telepathy as being scientifically proved and accepted. If this were so, which I utterly deny, the fact would be of immeasurable importance. Indeed I am astonished that Sir Oliver does not now devote himself to this subject to the exclusion of all others. His theory of electrons (to which I believe the great problems of heredity may some day be referred) might be left to other physicists. Sir William Crookes' investigations into the occult have led him to a "brick wall"; but Sir Oliver's beliefs on the most fascinating of all subjects for thought would lead him and us (if they be well founded) to conclusions of quite incalculable value. Now that he has perfected his system of wireless telegraphy and has therein obtained an analogy for thought-transference far superior to any imagined or suggested before (and the telepathist loves the argument from analogy), he might crown all by the discovery and adaptation of the laws—for laws there surely must be—that govern the transmission of thought directly from mind to mind.

The difficulty of conceiving an hypothesis for telepathy and the fact—may I be forgiven for alluding to it—that the Society for Psychical Research is, to say the least of it, not a body of physiologists, is no doubt the reason why the Society confines its efforts almost entirely to the unimpeachable and perfectly scientific method of proving that telepathy exists—that it is, in Sir Oliver Lodge's words, an "experimental fact." And if the fact be proven, then the a priori objectors, myself included, must away to the limbo of most of their predecessors. Necessarily, therefore, it would be the sheerest folly for me to attempt to prove that telepathy cannot be, unless I have first sifted the evidence in as judicial a manner as I may. If it be found wanting, then one may venture to suggest the reason.

Needless to say, if, to take a favourite instance, a person at one end of a room guesses correctly a proportion of the suits and numbers of playing-cards which he has not himself seen, and which are turned up at random and earnestly gazed upon by someone at the other end of the room, the question at issue depends upon the relation of these correct guesses to the number which must follow the Laws of Chance. (I use the term "guess," which is an invidious one, not because it favours my view, but because it is convenient and, as such, is used by the Society itself.) And here "let us clear our minds of cant." The Society for Psychical Research has suffered beyond telling from accusations of one or another form of dishonesty. From these I entirely dissociate myself. The Society wishes to get at truth, and is, of course, striving to do so as honestly as any other body or person. In the very nature of things, it labours under exceptional disadvantages in this regard. "Spiritualist cases" and the like must be a bitter pill for the believer, but they have no necessary connection with his beliefs nor should they have with ours. Every word of the Society's "Proceedings," over which I have spent much of the past weeks, must be freed from any suspicion of conscious fraud, and must be accepted and criticised as one would accept (and criticise, if one could) an equation concerning electrons—without for one moment questioning the propounder's good faith.

Now since the protagonist of telepathy must prove that his results are beyond probability, Sir Oliver's paper, to take an instance, in Part II. of Vol. II. of the Society's proceedings, is simply valueless. Let me quote: "In proceeding to the details of the actual experiments, it would take far too long to recount the whole—failures as well as successes; I shall only describe a few from which a more or less obvious moral may be drawn." From a selected few, of course, no moral may be drawn—or certainly not the moral intended. When I asked a representative and official supporter of telepathy how he accounted for failures, he said (I copy the words from my note-book, for they were too good to trust to memory), "Well, it's exactly the same—mind, I don't say that there's the slightest analogy, but it's exactly the same as if you had twenty Marconi instruments all going at once across a given area." No comment on the contradiction in terms is needed. And it will be seen that some form of hypothesis is inevitable. Naturally enough, it takes the form of brain-waves, though

Sir Oliver says I must not attribute any such hypothesis to him. Mr. Podmore, I believe, has suggested some form of ether-wave. Certainly to those who know nothing of the physiology of the grey surface of the brain, the "cortex cerebri," and who imagine that it acts by means of waves, ethereal or other, some such hypothesis may appear tenable. I may here say that electrical waves pass between less and more excited portions of the brain as they do in muscle or, indeed, as Dr. Bosc has shown, in carrots or in tin. The relation of these waves to thought is entirely accidental. Changes in the nerve-cells, especially in their nuclei, are however, to be found associated with thought, with fatigue and with sleep, and well worth pondering over they are. Recently it has been shown that Hertzian waves may affect the brain of the cat; it would be very surprising if they did not; and the effects of thunderous weather in causing headache and the like may be so explained. This, as briefly as possible, is all that is at present known about brain waves. And at this point I may quote—it speaks for itself—an opinion about crystal-gazing expressed in a lecture which Sir Oliver has sent me, and by which he may therefore be assumed to stand. "It is possible that the clairvoyant is responding to some unknown world-mind of which he forms a part." Similarly, when I suggested to my informant quoted above that the brain was the organ of mind, and that before one was qualified to experiment or to express opinions upon the action of that organ, he must study its structure and action in health, must observe it in gross disease and in hysteria, and must then study it for at least three months in a lunatic asylum, he asked: "Can you say that the brain is the only organ of mind?" Well, of course I cannot. Neither can I say that there may not be some obscure corner of the universe wherein the law of gravitation does not act. But if facts were laid before me which suggested some defiance of established law I should attempt to find some simpler explanation before I was prepared to recant my belief in that law. So in dealing with the occult, we must follow Sir William Hamilton's Law of Parsimony, and seek for the simplest explanation, which is the explanation that does not contradict ascertained knowledge, before saying that the brain is not the only organ of mind or that gravitation does not act everywhere.

The most successful experiments recorded were made by Prof. Sedgwick in 1889. To these, as crucial, my attention has been specially directed. The "percipients" were hypnotised and guessed numbers at which the "agent," Mr. Smith (the hypnotiser) was gazing. When the two were in the same room the results were 131 successes out of 644; when in different rooms 9 successes out of 228. The figures chosen ranged between 10 and 90, and a success was counted whether the figures were given in the right order or reversed. The results are far above probability when the two were in the same room. Having carefully studied the account of the experiment, with the conditions as far as they are stated, and with the accompanying conversation, I record my opinion that these experiments prove nothing. I am not going to consider here the possible explanations—such as unconscious whispering, &c.—of the results. I can only say that I believe the Society for Psychical Research has not established telepathy as an experimental fact; that, even if it be a fact, the Society cannot hope to prove it until its members have completed courses in a psycho-physiological laboratory (and that means some years in simpler laboratory work first); and that, meanwhile, it is more than doubtful whether they are not fostering credulity and superstition with all the innumerable and often terrible evils to which the boards of the Regent Street sandwich-men, the advertisements in fashionable papers, the Law Courts, and the experience of every one of us bear implicit or explicit witness.

Correspondence.

Nietzsche.

SIR,—Perhaps a word may be said by way of supplement to Miss Beatrice Marshall's letter, in which she attributes the cold reception of Nietzsche's writings in England partly to the erratic way in which the translations are being issued. No doubt the difficulties and delays attending the issue of the translations have tended to discourage the study of Nietzsche's writings, and the fact that the earlier volumes were supervised and printed in Germany probably made them less suitable for English readers. It seems to me, however, that deeper causes have had a more potent influence. The English mind, more steeped in Christianity, Utilitarianism and Neo-Hegelianism than the continental mind, is less receptive, at present, of ideas hostile to these convenient doctrines. This natural antagonism of the English mind to Nietzsche's ideas has, moreover, been further intensified by the misrepresentations of ignorant and interested parties, who have also exploited Nietzsche's illness, by using it as a popular sophistical argument to prove the worthlessness of his teaching. The brutal criticisms formerly passed upon Nietzsche had doubtless considerable influence, in the first place, in prejudicing the public against his works.

It may also be that some of Nietzsche's friends, who appreciate highly his early works, are too much inclined to belittle his later writings, notwithstanding that the latter—especially "Zarathustra" and the "Genealogy of Morals"—have really brought Nietzsche into prominence. As these later volumes contain Nietzsche's most original ideas, and can generally be tolerably well understood apart from his earlier writings, they were naturally the first to be selected for translation and publication, just as the most important works of other foreign writers—for example, Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason" and Goethe's "Faust"—are generally translated earlier than their less important works. "The Case of Wagner," which is a very short work, was translated first, owing especially to the valuable "Epilogue" it contains, in which the distinction between slave-morality and master-morality is very clearly and concisely set forth. "Le Cas Wagner," in a separate volume, was also one of the first of the French translations of Nietzsche's works, and it does not appear to have greatly prejudiced the French against Nietzsche, judging from the number of editions which have already been issued of some of the French translations, which have not, any more than the English translations, been issued in chronological order.

Wanted—Two Words.

SIR,—May I call attention to a curious coincidence in connection with the use (although now regarded as a misuse, or at all events a provincialism) of the words father-in-law and mother-in-law to express the double relationships of father-in-law and step-father, and mother-in-law and step-mother respectively. Evidently words were wanted to express the meaning of step-father and step-mother, and they were accordingly forthcoming; but may we not, therefore, consider ourselves fortunate as compared with our neighbours across the Channel? The French still not only use the words beau-père and belle-mère for father and mother-in-law, and step-father and mother, but, as far as I have been able to learn, have as yet no other word (single or compound) to distinguish the two relationships, as we have. So that, as I understand it, a Frenchman, if he happens to have a mother-in-law, and his father marrying again presents him with a step-mother (it does not matter which marriage happens first), has to use a circumlocution if he wishes to make a distinction between the two ladies in speaking of them to another person. In such a precise language as the French, surely this want should be supplied. There is a word that expresses the relationship of a step-mother (marâtre), but it is only used in a figurative sense.

Now, with regard to step-son and step-daughter, and son-in-law and daughter-in-law, the distinction can be and is made by using beau-fils and belle-fille for the first pair and bru and gendre for the latter.

In the case of step-brother and step-sister we can say frère consanguin or sœur consanguine (familiarily, frère de père, sœur de père) if desired to indicate relationship on the father's side only; or, if by the same mother only, the expressions frère utérin, sœur utérine, are available (fam, frère de mère, sœur de mère). Sometimes demi-sœur is used (half-sister), but where are the words for step-father or mother? For want of better, may I suggest the adoption of demi-père and demi-mère, or do these or other expressions exist after all? I should be pleased to hear that the lacunæ exist only in my imagination and that of the few French people of whom I have made fruitless enquiries.—Yours, &c.,

"The Supreme Question."

SIR,—In reading Mr. C. W. Saleeby's article, "The Supreme Question," in the ACADEMY of a week or two ago, I was struck with the warmth of feeling with which he argued for the Immortality of the Soul, combating Haeckel's thesis. For, after all, that is the only "Supreme Question," as if we are not to live again, it cannot affect us at all whether there be a God or no, or whence we came, or what will become of us as a race.

And yet it always seems to me that what a man really requires is not Immortality itself so much as a permission to believe in Immortality as a consolation for his troubles in life and as a palliative for his fear of death. In this sense he almost may be said to need this conviction, as a dream to sweeten his waking hours.

For it is only with his waking hours that the idea can have any concern. The desire to live again hereafter may occur to me with poignancy during the day, but the moment that I fall asleep, both the thought and the desire are immediately as though they had never been. Should God neglect for ever to awaken me again He would be doing me no injury, for I would have no interest in His action one way or the other. For I also am as though I had never been, and one cannot injure that which does not exist. It were as reasonable to assert that the Creator does wrong to unimaginable myriads of uncreated souls because He has not willed them into conscious life.

This is, no doubt, blunderingly expressed, but I may perhaps put it more briefly, thus: That, although to my conscious mind it may seem—owing perhaps to the innate instinct for self-preservation—of immense importance that I should live again, yet the moment my consciousness is in abeyance—whether in sleep, or swoon, or death—it is actually of no moment to me at all.—Yours, &c.,

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 181 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best original opening paragraph of an unwritten novel. Forty-one replies have been received. Many competitors seem to be in doubt as to the meaning of the word "paragraph"; some attempts consist of half a dozen paragraphs. We award the prize to Mr. T. McEwen, Ardlin, Bloomfield, Belfast, for the following:—

The Red Lion Inn, Kirkmaben, was the "howff" of all the "gangrel bodies" for twenty miles around. Here, one day in the height of summer at the humming time of day, foregathered Jingling Jimmy, the tipping tinker, Rob Affleck, the mole-catcher, dark and mysterious as his quarry, Jock Candlish, the wandering sweep, garrulous and jovial, and Steve Wallace, a man of no ostensible occupation, but who was known through all the countryside as the most skilful poacher that ever set a spring or tickled a roosting pheasant. With the blood of these men had mingled the wine of the hills that soaks through the pores of a man and flows in at his nostrils, his mouth and his eyes as he lies on the purple heather beneath the corn-ripening sun, or traps the moorland road drenched to the skin by the clinging mist and the driving drizzle. Every mother's son of them had found out long ago the secret of the heather ale, little though they knew it: but had they been conscious of its possession not one would have kept it inviolate against the bribe of a glass of whisky. During the short, scented summer nights they would rather make their beds beneath a dew-catching hedge than lie pillowed on down under any corniced ceiling, and out from the fragrant tracken they would creep when the earliest flush of dawn made rosy the mountain tops, while the burns in the valleys still ran noisy and dark. These men were neither saints nor rhymsters; they drank hard and cursed vigorously; but to look on the solemn mystery of dawn over the familiar moor and the quiet going down of the sun behind the mountains of home was as necessary to their life as the air they breathed.

Other replies follow:—

By the side of a rough track across a north country moor, there stands a small square slab of stone on which is graven in rude characters these words: "Here John Thorne was cast away in a heavy snowstorm in the night in or about the year 1735. The print of a woman's shoe was found by his side in the snow where he lay dead." On one side the moor falls away to a stream, flowing sluggishly in its dark channel, worn deep in the brown peat, past a solitary farm, whose gaunt gable timbers, shrunken and twisted by the course of years, suggest bones protruding from a withered body; and then rises to a bare ridge on whose summit stands the whitened trunk of a dead fir. On the other the dun heath, scarred with bare patches of black earth and strewn with grey boulders, sweeps up to where rugged crags stand out in weird fantastic shapes upon the skyline. In winter, spring, and autumn the north wind—

"Strange ministrant of undescribed sounds
That come aswooning over hollow grounds,
And wither drearily on barren moors."

scours the dreary waste, or the packs of mist stealing noiselessly onward cover everything in a white shroud: in summer the sun bears down pitilessly till the barren earth quivers in its scorching rays, and the raw scent of the peats rises in hot waves, while the all including silence is broken only by the wail of the curlew that wings its heavy flight above.

[E. W., West Didsbury.]

This is the man as he was known—one whose very existence was not suspected by the more human part of this so-called human race; yet one whose very existence was felt, and being felt, was hated by the secret societies of three continents. He was known by the sign "XA" which marked his path and sealed his ultimatum. By this was he known on the proscribed list of each of the eleven deadly all-enfolding snakes of that vast decaying empire of the far East. In a like manner was he known to those cliques that terrorised the commercial life of the Western World; and to each of the secret societies that existed in every country of Europe. I have said his existence was known; but beyond that fact there was an unfilled gap, a blank space, in the knowledge of those from whom so little else was hid, yet, whose circuit of intimate and binding acquaintance with the affairs of their own particular sphere being broken at this one point, could produce but fitful disconnected sparks and no continuous current of activity. His sign stood on the list of the proscribed, yet, while others were placed there for a short time and then removed for ever, the sign of "XA" remained to mock the efforts to overthrow the man whom it represented. He has now passed beyond the reach of these his enemies, unconquered to the end; to me has he bequeathed the task of opening to the world the story of his life, his work, and its results.

[R. L. C., Liverpool.]

A large hall, with rusted iron, rotting wood, a bare floor paved with shattered stone flags. Over everything the sense of damp, the dreadful smell of mouldering things. The walls were no longer white, and you would think that blood had once streamed thickly down. A gruesome fancy—and yet those falling brown stains were such as a man knows for blood long-dried. Round the room ran a frieze. It was made of skull-less skeletons loosely hung in dangling chains; and as the wind moaned through the rent walls, a skeleton would stir and touch another, creaking and clanging, and the other would touch a third, and the third a fourth, and so till twenty creaked and clanged in concert, and the din swelled ever, sounding like the frenzied laughter of a fiendish host that drags a sinner down to the straining flames. Then the noise sank a little, and failed slowly, till there was nothing save a sad, quiet creak like the catch of tears in a throat. But from another side the felon wind startled another skeleton to motion, and the grisly jest was played through again. And as the noise died, a third time the wind stirred. Suddenly a hollow rattle at the door; bars fell, the door groaned thrice and swung wide. A rout of men broke clattering in, sabots on their feet. They were all little men, all deformed, all, in the dim light, swarthy. Their faces terrified me, faces too malevolent for Hell. Last of them, and least, came one carrying a low brazier; the legs were wrought of thigh-bones, the bowl of a human skull inverted. He shuffled up and set the brazier, smouldering lurid red, so close to me that I was scorched. Then I must have swooned.

Competition No. 182 (New Series).

This week we offer a Prize of One Guinea for the best description of "My Luncheon Hour." Length not to exceed 300 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 18 March, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.
